John Bercow: As a general principle, there should be even-handedness between the treatment of the private sector and the public sector. Or, to put it another way, it is certainly not reasonable to impose on the private sector financial costs that it is not judged proper to impose on the public sector. In that context, does my right hon. Friend agree that it would be useful to know, in regard to clause 13(4), whether the Government intend to apply the provisions to persons in Crown employment?

Mrs. May: Perhaps the Minister will clarify that point for my hon. Friend when he winds up the debate. The power in clause 13 would certainly give the Government the right to do that. I accept my hon. Friend's overall point about the need to ensure that we strike a balance between the public and private sectors. Indeed, many people are exercised at the moment about the balance between public and private sector pension entitlements. There is a significant and growing gap there, and the Secretary of State has recently made decisions that will encourage that gap to grow. It is incumbent on the Government to look upon themselves as an employer, and to ensure that their house is in order. Another area in which I am afraid they do not come up to the standard that we would expect is that of equal pay. I understand that, while the pay gap in this country is generally between 17 and 18 per cent., it is 21 per cent. in the civil service. The Government really need to look at these issues, and to put their house in order.

On the regulations that the Government will use to introduce the rules on leave entitlement, it is important that they should discuss with business the impact that any sudden change would have, and that they ensure that any change is introduced in a way that would reduce the severity of that impact on business. A balance needs to be struck between meeting the needs of employees and ensuring that any new provision does not have a detrimental impact on keeping the business environment competitive.

Families are increasingly looking to us in Parliament to provide a framework to help them cope with the pressures of modern life. Businesses are looking to us to ensure that we do not tie their hands and make them unable to compete in a fiercely competitive global market. It is up to us in this place to ensure that we strike the right balance between being family friendly and business friendly. We on this side of the House will work constructively to achieve that.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. May I remind right hon. and hon. Members that Mr. Speaker has imposed a 10-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches in this debate?

6.52 pm

Liz Blackman (Erewash) (Lab): Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker for calling me. I do not think that I shall use up all my allotted time this evening.

I e-mailed an officer from the National Autistic Society—which supports the aims of the all-party group on autism—for a briefing on the Bill. He e-mailed me back to say:

"We focus on clause 12 on flexible working, and it is short because we are basically happy with it!"

I should like to tell the Secretary of State that I am pleased, too. Clause 12 builds on the flexible working provisions in the Employment Act 2002, which confers on parents of children under six, or of youngsters up to 18 with a disability, a statutory right to request a change in their terms and conditions, so that they can move into either part-time or home working, or some other mode of flexible working that fits in with their needs. The Act places on employers a duty seriously to consider such requests, while also providing them with certain grounds for refusing them. It is worth reading those provisions. They aim to protect the employment base and have increased the confidence of employers to move into flexible working, which has led to greater productivity in the business world.

It was inevitable that the provisions in clause 12 would be introduced after they had been signalled in 2004, and they are the result of extensive consultation. They extend the right to request flexible working to those people who care for sick and disabled adults, and they will come into force in 2007. That represents a ground-breaking change, and it has been introduced in response to the relevant evidence. According to the Equal Opportunities Commission, there are 4.4 million carers of working age in this country, one in five of whom have either left a job or been unable to take one because they could not balance all the different responsibilities involved. Some 2 million people take on a caring responsibility each year, and the demographic trend forecasts that more and more of us will become carers. This provision in the Bill will give such people the right to balance their lives.

There is also a sound economic case for businesses to take such people into their work force under these conditions, given the wasted potential of carers with skills and talents who could be contributing to the economy in a tight labour market. It is grossly wasteful not to use them. The provisions will also offer carers, many of whom are on low incomes, the opportunity to boost their income and to put aside a little more for their pension provision.

Several hon. Members have mentioned the fact that we must get right the definition of carers, and I am extremely pleased that this knotty problem is to go out to significant consultation before any definition is decided on. Such a definition needs to capture the full army of carers whom we are seeking to encompass in the Bill. The preferred definition of Employers for Carers, the Equal Opportunities Commission and the National Autistic Society is:

"Carers are employees with significant caring responsibilities that have a substantial impact on their working lives. These employees are responsible for the care and support of disabled, elderly or sick partners, relatives or friends who are unable to care for themselves."

I understand that there is no point in having a consultation if we alight on a particular definition right at the outset, but I hope that the Secretary of State will consider that definition as the basis of a working consultation process.

How are the provisions working at the moment? It is one thing to introduce a good piece of legislation; it is another for it to translate into effective action. Many employers already offer flexible working to groups outside the scope of the existing law. According to the Office for National Statistics, however, only a quarter of employees who are eligible to request flexible working have done so; four fifths of them have been successful. The Work Foundation report found that parents on low incomes were less successful in having their requests accepted. All those statistics illustrate that we still have a long way to go and that we need to be more proactive, particularly in helping carers who are not already in work or who do not belong to carers' groups. They fall below the radar, so we need to think more proactively about how we can inform them and engage with them.

Another aspect of the debate on clause 12 relates to including the carers of children aged six to 18 who do not fall within the disabled category in the right to request flexible working. The phasing in of different groups is sensible, but I hope that we can look at this issue sooner rather than later. Many children do not fall into the categories for which we are legislating, but need their parents to be around more than other children do. There are issues such as family breakdown, young children and older children with mental health problems, 16 and 17-year-olds who are beginning to develop schizophrenia, young girls who develop anorexia and teenagers with drug dependency.

That said, the Bill will make an enormous difference to carers because it will enable them to spend the time that they need with the people who are important to them, and either to stay in or to take up work. For them, that is not just an economic advantage; it provides a sense of self.

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): To pick up on the point made by the hon. Member for Erewash (Liz Blackman) about flexible working for parents of teenage children, as the father of two teenagers I am acutely aware of the pressures of being a parent of children of that age. There is a strong case to extend the right to that group of parents, as well as to carers, at some stage. I hope that the Government will consider the timing of introducing that.

It is a pleasure to return to some of the issues that we debated back in 2002, on the Employment Bill, when the Secretary of State was not in his current elevated position. It is fair to say that the introduction in that Bill, now the Employment Act 2002, of the right to flexible working has been a real success. That is because it has a light-touch approach, it does not impose too heavy a burden on employers and it has helped to change the culture of the workplace. That is a good thing.

The Liberal Democrats broadly support the Bill. We have questions about a number of aspects of it, and we believe that further measures can be taken to lighten the administrative burden, simplify procedures and simplify the law, which remains complex in this area. However, we broadly support the package of measures and will vote for it at this stage should there be a Division. Although there are reservations among the wide group of interested organisations, to which the Conservative spokesman referred earlier, it is none the less interesting that, with reservations, the CBI, the Equal Opportunities Commission, Citizens Advice and the Chartered Institute of Personnel and Development have all broadly welcomed large aspects of the Bill. That is a good thing.

Why is the Bill important? It is important because getting the balance right between work and family is critical. We would all recognise that the pressures on families have grown considerably. There has been a revolution in the workplace since the days when there was a sole male breadwinner and the mother was at home looking after the children. Now, more than ever, both parents work, which can mean insufficient time to look after and care for children. It is therefore in all our interests to do more to get the balance right. If the Bill helps in that direction, that is a good thing.

For children who need time with parents and for the increasing number of people who are now cared for at home rather than in institutions—disabled adults, elderly people and so on—the Bill is of great importance. It is also of importance in terms of maintaining the sanity of those parents and carers and trying to balance the pressures of work and caring, whether for a small child or an adult loved one. It seems to me entirely legitimate for the state to be concerned about setting the right legal framework to balance all those competing interests.

It is also important, as the Conservative spokesman rightly pointed out, to ensure that we balance the interests of employers in this area. Broadly, the step-by-step, light-touch approach is the right one. The right to request is the obvious example of how that applies, and it seems to me that trying to get employer and employee to discuss and reach agreement about flexible working is much better than the approach taken from the working time directive of seeking to impose an absolute limit on working hours, which the Government rejected, and on which I supported them. There are some questions around trying to lighten the burden on employers. Is enough being done to limit the bureaucratic burden, particularly for small employers? In terms of the cost and the time taken to recruit replacements for those who go on maternity leave, the burden is considerable.

As the Conservative spokesman suggested, more consideration should be given to the right to opt for a transfer of administration of the payment of maternity and paternity pay to the state, particularly for small employers. I was interested in the exchange about the costs of the private sector doing that as opposed to the state. More analysis needs to be done, and I am not entirely convinced that, as one other speaker suggested, the time cost to smaller employers is analysed sufficiently. I know what it is like for someone employing two or three people to have to cope, in terms of time, with the administration of those payments. Is the analysis to which the Secretary of State referred sufficiently robust in identifying what those costs really are to small businesses?

Mr. Prisk: The hon. Gentleman, the Secretary of State and I are all former members of the Standing Committee that considered the Employment Act 2002. That camaraderie aside, does he share my concern that the Secretary of State suddenly leapt up to the Dispatch Box with a set of figures of which, I suspect, most Members of the House and of the Committee are not aware? Does he agree that it is necessary for the House to have complete transparency in relation to the figures, rather than having the legislation apparently rushed through Committee by 25 December?

Norman Lamb: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I was not aware of those figures, and I hope that in the wind up the Secretary of State or the Minister will confirm that that analysis will be shared with the Committee from the start, so that we can debate those issues properly.

Another concern for employers has always been the complicated procedures and time limits for a woman seeking to return to work. It is welcome that the Government propose to extend the period required for notification of a return.

As I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks, the law remains complex in this area and there could be a much more comprehensive assessment of the legal provisions. For a long time, for example, there has been a provision with regard to indirect sex discrimination, where women are disproportionately affected by a particular rule. That has resulted in a lot of claims being brought by women seeking the right to return to work from maternity leave on reduced hours. In effect, it has created a right for many women to have reduced hours—not a right to request, but a right to have. That overlays the right to request, which is much more light-touch. Many employers simply are not aware of the extra burden of the law on indirect sex discrimination, and the juxtaposition of those two competing rights is a matter that the Government need to consider further as it causes complication for both employers and employees. It seems to me that entitlements only really exist if people understand what they are.

In raising concerns on the part of employers, it is worth acknowledging that the proposed changes are not necessarily all bad news. The Secretary of State suggested that, overall, the concept of embracing flexible working is good for the economy. In my constituency there is a company called Listawood, which, from the start, has embraced the idea of flexible working. It has enabled women to work different hours during term time and during the summer holidays. They have been able to change their shift patterns to facilitate caring for their children while they are on holiday. They have been enabled to take time out of work to watch their children playing sport at school, including sports' days. The concept from the start has been flexible working. Rather than that being a burden that has driven the company into liquidation, the process has been a fantastic economic success. The company has won award after award, not only for family-friendly policies but because of its financial acumen and financial success.

It can be a win-win for employers fully to embrace these measures, and there is the potential that they could lead to more motivated staff and greater productivity if people are working hours that suit them. There is also the potential for greater retention of staff and assistance with recruitment. If a company has a reputation for embracing the entire concept of flexible working, it is much more likely to recruit motivated staff. The idea of keeping-in-touch days and the clarification that the Bill provides of the ability to maintain contact during maternity leave are good things.

To an extent, the Bill depends for implementation upon regulations. The issue has been raised already by the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) in interventions. Although that provides the opportunity for some flexibility in that provisions will be able to be changed as time goes by, the process will make scrutiny more difficult. The devil will be in the detail of the regulations. The Secretary of State indicated that he would try to ensure that the draft regulations would be available before the end of the Bill's consideration in Committee. However, if there is to be a proper debate in Committee, surely we should have the draft regulations available at the start of that consideration.

Mr. Sutcliffe: We need to nail the point about regulation. The principles that we are trying to implement are set out in the Bill. The Government are criticised for not consulting widely on the detail of the impact on business. That is what the secondary process of legislation is all about. There is the opportunity during that process for the Government to be questioned on the validity of regulations. Surely that is a way forward for better scrutiny.

Norman Lamb: Indeed; it is to be hoped that that will be the case. Consultation can take place on the detail before a Bill is presented as well as before regulations. At this stage, while considering the Bill, we are not aware of much of the detail in the proposed legislation other than by way of indications and hints. I suggest that that is not entirely satisfactory.

Mr. Prisk: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman detects in the decent manner of the Minister that perhaps there is the scintilla of an opportunity in this instance. The need for the 20 December date is set only by a programme motion. If we are to have proper scrutiny, to which the Minister referred, does the hon. Gentleman agree that there could be merit in a small slippage in the timing of consideration in Committee to allow the statutory order to be before Members so that they might give it due consideration?

Norman Lamb: I entirely agree with that suggestion, which was well made. I hope that the Minister will respond positively to it. I am sure that he will.

Peter Luff: While the hon. Gentleman is making the point, perhaps he will explore the question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (John Bercow). The Secretary of State gave partial clarification in response to a helpful intervention. The regulations that will come under clauses 3, 4 and 6 are apparently not affirmative while the regulations under clauses 13 and 14 are affirmative. The reason for that difference escapes me.

Norman Lamb: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. He reminded me of something with which I wanted to deal. Clearly, the Minister must respond as the two responses by the Secretary of State were inconsistent. The right hon. Gentleman said that everything was subject to the affirmative process. Later, he confined the process to the paternity leave provisions. There is no logic to the affirmative procedure applying only to the paternity leave provisions and not to other provisions. If the Minister will confirm that the Secretary of State's first answer is the right one and that the affirmative procedure applies to everything, that would be of great assistance. I know that the Minister is always co-operative and helpful. I am sure that Conservative Members share my optimism that he will respond positively.

Peter Luff: I sense that the Secretary of State may be reading a note from the Box. I could be wrong on that. If I am wrong, so be it. I was trying to be helpful in giving him more time. As I understand it, affirmative regulations refer to annual leave in clause 13, and an increase in the maximum amount of weeks pay for certain purposes in clause 14, and not paternity pay. I could be wrong about that.

Norman Lamb: Perhaps I could give the Secretary of State an opportunity to intervene to clarify the matter. There seems to be complete confusion on the Government Benches. Labour Members seem remarkably reluctant to get to their feet. I am giving them the opportunity, here and now, to intervene. Let us hope that we will have a response when the Minister winds up. I am sure that he will have got his act together by then.

I shall deal with some of the key measures in the Bill. First, there is maternity pay. The provisions will extend the maximum period to a year. By regulation, that will be phased in with the introduction of 39 weeks from 1 April 2007. Representations have been made by a number of groups, and one of the issues is the level of income that maternity pay provides. For many women, the provision is at an inadequate level for them to take the full opportunity that the extension to a year provides. I share the view that has been expressed by the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) that a degree of flexibility would be a good thing. There should be the entitlement to take the full amount of pay over the entire period. Over a shorter period, there should be the entitlement to take that pay at a higher rate. That seems potentially to benefit employers because they will have the employee back in employment earlier. At the same time, it gives the employee a real opportunity to take advantage of their leave if they are unable to afford to take it at the rate of £106. For many people, that is an inadequate level to enable them to take advantage of the scheme.

At the last election, the Liberal Democrats proposed the introduction of a maternity income guarantee for the first child, which would have guaranteed at least £4,420 for the first 26 weeks. That would have helped lower-paid women in particular, and it is something that the Government should consider. There are also the proposed changes to adoption leave and pay, which mirror what is happening to maternity leave. That is entirely welcome. As the Secretary of State said, it is remarkable that it has taken so long for us to reach the point where people who adopt children have such rights. It is particularly important for them to have time to get to know their new child.

I move on to paternity leave and pay. I shall deal first with the existing entitlement of two weeks. There is a case for making that right more flexible in its take-up. Indeed, there is a fairly low take-up. The Secretary of State said that it is encouraging, but I understand that it is still less than 50 per cent. That is partly because the figure is only £106 a week. That is inadequate for many fathers, given the burden of paying a mortgage and so forth. I am told that many people lose out because they are unaware of the notice requirements. By the time that they decide that they want to take paternity leave, they have missed the requirements. If an employer chooses to be difficult, they can be denied the right to leave. There is something of a straitjacket, and if someone chooses to take one week rather than two weeks they will lose their entitlement to the second week. It is not a week that can be taken later. As the Secretary of State will know, there have been many calls for an extension to the entitlement rather than for the substitution entitlement. As part of the assessment to determine whether the substitution entitlement is workable, the regulations will have to be analysed closely. Many people fear that it will be administratively burdensome. At least two employers—more than two if people have two types of part-time employment—will have to liaise and exchange paperwork to ensure that the father is entitled to take paternity leave because the mother has returned to work for another employer.

The Secretary of State said that the Bill is unlikely to have an enormous impact, but that is because the pay is only £106 a week. The regulatory impact assessment suggests that as few as 9,000 people a year may take up the entitlement to paid paternity leave. Inevitably, they will tend to be those who are better off. People on lower incomes will not be able to afford it. Again, I think that the Government should consider allowing people to claim the total amount over a shorter period at a higher weekly rate. It might well suit someone to take a month of paternity leave at a higher rate of pay. Some fathers will not benefit because the mothers were not working when pregnant and were therefore not entitled to maternity leave. Four out of 10 mothers are not in paid employment during pregnancy. The Equal Opportunities Commission has suggested extending entitlement to fathers whose partners return to work after the birth but who are not eligible for maternity leave. Would the Government consider doing that?

[Norman Lamb]

Although the provision for circumstances in which a mother dies after childbirth will affect only about 300 couples, it is a valuable and long-overdue measure, allowing fathers to take the full equivalent of maternity leave. As for the flexible working provision, it is, as I have said, a light touch, and is appropriate for that reason. I fully support the extension of the right to carers but, as many have pointed out—including the hon. Member for Erewash—it all comes down to the definition of "carer". The Secretary of State did not respond to my question about whether he intended the definition to be broad. If it is narrow, it will be of little value. It must be broad to meet the expectations of many people who have welcomed the new right in general.

On the concerns of the Parkinson's Disease Society, I understand why employers do not want a multiplicity of applications—but following the extension of the provisions to carers there may be circumstances in which the needs of a cared-for person change a great deal. Will the Government consider an increase in the frequency of applications, perhaps to once every six months?

Earlier, I mentioned the possibility of extending the entitlement to cover children aged up to 17. As has been argued by the Chartered Institute of Personnel and Development and many others, we may in time reach a point at which every employee will have the right to request entitlement. We heard earlier of the risk that employees without family or caring responsibilities might begin to resent all the new rights in the workplace. The right to request flexible working is light-touch, however, and the employer can refuse the request without fear of a legal claim. Employees will have a greater chance to discuss the matter with their employers in order to get the balance right and to secure a level of employment that will enable them to be fully committed and productive. Surveys show that most employers are already willing to consider applications for flexible working from a wider group than those who are entitled to request it, and I think that that is worth building on.

Overall, the Bill presents a good package that addresses the need for us to balance the needs of families with those of the economy. We will support it.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to comment briefly on what I consider to be a good Bill. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that it is good for families, employers and society as a whole. I am sometimes bemused by the rather grudging tone of the Opposition, who present themselves as the party of the family but who, when we try to give families more rights, sound as if we are doing something dreadful.

Let me begin by making the business case for what we are doing. It builds on what the Government have already done, but, as my right hon. Friend said, it is also good for businesses. Employees perform better when they know that their child care needs, or the needs of those caring for their dependants, are being taken care of so that they can focus on their work. It is also much more valuable to businesses to keep staff whom they have trained and skilled than to lose them and have to re-employ and retrain others. Skills will be kept in the business.

The needs of society as a whole must also be considered. If we want to create a good society, we must first create good citizens. That means investing time in our young people. We do that through education and, I hope, through the youth service, but it is most important to do it through the family. As a parent, I know that the most important thing we can give our children is time. That is particularly true during the important first year of life, but it is also true when children are ill, have special needs, or are particularly dependent on us in any way.

The Bill represents an important step. It will help people to balance the demands of work and family life. One of the Government's great achievements has been to get so many people back to work. My constituency, parts of which were experiencing second or third-generation unemployment, now has almost full employment. Rightly, however, people are demanding more of us. They demand the ability to manage work and family responsibilities sensibly. The Bill will help us to provide that, and I welcome the extensions of maternity, paternity and adoption leave.

I also welcome the clause that allows the Secretary of State to make provisions relating to annual leave, but I want to ask a question about it. I understand that it arises from the need to ensure that everyone is entitled to bank holidays, and that such holidays are not deemed to be part of annual leave. Currently, about 2.75 million people are not granted the bank holidays that most of us take for granted. I would be grateful if the Minister told us whether it is his intention that there should be a right to paid bank holidays, so that people who take a bank holiday as a day's leave receive holiday pay for it, and those who have to work on a bank holiday are entitled to a paid day's holiday in lieu.

I want to raise a couple of questions on what is happening with maternity leave. Currently, six months is classed as ordinary maternity leave, and six months is classed as additional maternity leave. The right to additional leave is not much used at the moment, but I believe that it will be when three months of it becomes paid from 2007. However, I cannot see why we maintain the distinction between ordinary and additional maternity leave. I understand the need to protect the first six months to ensure that the mother is not pressurised to go back to work too early, but maintaining the distinction brings a number of unintended consequences that are a problem, particularly for poorer families.

For example, a mother has the right to get her job back if she returns to work after ordinary maternity leave. If she returns after additional maternity leave, she has that right so far as is reasonably practical and, if she cannot have her old job back, she is entitled to one that is not substantially less favourable—I think that that is the phrase. Apart from creating a lot of work for employment tribunals that try to define those terms, evidence is accumulating that, particularly in the retail trade, women are being offered jobs on very different hours from those that they had previously worked and, often, it is difficult for them to manage on those hours. Therefore, they are being forced to reject those jobs and are falling into the poverty trap. I do not think that that is what the Government intended and we should examine that.

The other problem is that, although those on ordinary maternity leave are classed as being in full-time work and therefore entitled to tax credits, those on additional maternity leave are not. Again, that impacts on poorer families, single parents, a parent whose partner works for fewer than 16 hours a week, or even parents who wish to go back to work part-time for fewer than 16 hours—many mothers may wish to do so, particularly if they are still breast-feeding—and whose partner then cannot claim the tax credits when the leave is transferred. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will undertake to examine those issues as the Bill goes through the House.

On the tragic cases of mothers who die during child birth or shortly after, I am not sure that the comments of the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) were accurate. As I understand it, currently, a father in those tragic circumstances is still entitled to only two weeks' paid paternity leave and four weeks' unpaid. The problem is that, when a family has been tragically bereaved, there are real problems not only in finding child care but perhaps in caring for other children. It is difficult to find child care for babies under three months old, and even with children over three months one usually has to make plans very early on, so we are forcing more stress on families that are already under great stress.

Those cases are rare. I think that there were only 261 child birth-related deaths between 1999 and 2002—229 babies were born and more than 500 other children needed care. For that reason, I am sure that it is possible to ensure that families in those tragic circumstances are catered for. Since the Bill enshrines the right to transfer some form of maternity leave, I wonder whether the Minister would undertake to consider in Committee fathers who find themselves in that tragic situation and to see whether it is possible to transfer the mother's rights to leave to those fathers. That would help those families at a very stressful time and prevent more families from falling into the poverty trap. If that is not done, fathers will often end up coming out of the work force to care for their children and find it difficult to get back into it.

As I said, this is a very good Bill. It builds on what the Government have done, but there are one or two issues that I hope the Minister will undertake to consider as the Bill goes through Committee. If those issues were looked at, it would make it an even better Bill, provide better services for families and help to protect some of our most vulnerable children.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): I am particularly grateful to be called at this point. I think someone on the Conservative Benches had a little word in your ear, Madam Deputy Speaker, as I am hoping to get home to say goodnight to my little boy, which I try to do every evening, although the demands of the House make it difficult on occasions. I wish no discourtesy to you and to the next hon. Member to make a speech, but I will be chasing off after my remarks. Obviously, I hope to be back to listen to the Minister's response to our concerns and to my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing).

On the whole, I welcome what the Government are doing. I echo the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) as to what the Government are seeking to do. The Government were right on taking office to extend the time for maternity leave and to extend payments for women seeking to take maternity leave. Labour Members always pretend that the gain would have stopped in 1997 and that the Conservative party might not have made equal progress on many of these matters, but time moves on and, given the wonderfully performing economy that was left at the time, clearly these things could have been more easily afforded.

Kitty Ussher: In that case why did the Conservatives oppose our policies on the working tax credit, the child tax credit, extending maternity leave to 26 weeks, two weeks' paid paternity leave, three months' adoption leave, the right to flexible working, increased maternity pay, giving part-time workers the same rights as full-time workers, four weeks' paid leave and the national minimum wage?

Miss Kirkbride: I am not sure whether new Members should always follow the Whips' brief, because I am told by my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest, who is sitting on the Front Bench, that we certainly did not oppose all those measures. If the hon. Lady had been listening, she would have heard that I included some of those measures in my remarks. We opposed some, but not all. However, as Back Benchers have a limited time to make their contributions and as I wish to get home tonight, I will proceed.

Kitty Ussher: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Miss Kirkbride: Not again, sorry.

It is important that mothers, where they wish to do so, take maternity leave. It is also important that mothers should not be pressurised into thinking that they are being neglectful or inadequate if they feel that they cannot take maternity leave and they wish to go back to work, whether for their personal and professional development or because their families cannot afford for them to take maternity leave.

I implore the Minister to take on board the ideas put forward by my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead and endorsed by the Liberal Democrat Front-Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb), that more flexibility should be attached to maternity leave. The Secretary of State pointed out that on the continent there are much more successful models of women being encouraged by family-friendly policies. There is a correlation between those countries where there are such family-friendly policies and the success of women at work. They are much more generous in maternity leave than we presently are in the UK. Therefore, a system whereby a woman can take six months' maternity leave but roll up the money she would receive to £212 a week, rather than the £106 a week for taking a year's maternity leave, might enable many more women to access maternity leave. That would begin to match the provision in other countries that are more successful at encouraging women to take maternity leave and to return to the work force at the level they left it without having to take career breaks, which inevitably mean that women fall back in the race for the top jobs.

It is desirable that, where women want to, they stay at home to look after their children. As my right hon. Friend said, it is a shame that this Bill and the Childcare Bill, the Standing Committee of which I will serve on tomorrow, were not put together. There is considerable and growing evidence of the importance of what is called the attachment theory, with which the Minister is doubtless very familiar. It is very important that babies and young children form a profound bond with their primary carer in order to have proper emotional development later. The studies on this subject are quite frightening, given the mistakes that have already been made in not encouraging such bonding to take place. Attachment theory is subject to no class or income barriers; it is as relevant to professional families as it is to low-income ones.

We should recognise that women who are able to afford to take such time off and to work on their relationship with their baby might find their baby quite frightening to begin with. For those of us who have been used to living a professional life—having things done when we want them to be done, and having our entire environment work to a time scale that we are in control of—being at home with a child is a truly different experience. We should enable women to deal with that situation in a less stressful environment. Of course, the same point applies to paternity leave. The average male wage is some £505 a week, so in calculating the average female wage, we can take 20 per cent. off that figure, which gives us a female wage of about £400 a week. Given those figures, it is much more realistic for women to take such time off.

Although I am in favour of more flexibility and enabling women to take time off work, I want also to put a little of the employer's case. The hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) encouraged the Minister in somewhat the wrong direction in this regard. I do not dispute her motive in wanting women to be able to return to work without being required to accept more onerous and less attractive terms and conditions, but I want to draw attention to an issue that many employers mention to me. When a replacement employee comes in while someone is away on maternity leave, that creates a problem; particularly for small companies, which have much less flexibility in terms of the role played by other employees. This is a cost that society and business has to bear, and it is a fact of life if we want to carry on reproducing. However, extending maternity leave entitlement to one year creates an added difficulty. The person employed to take over that job for a year gets employment rights, because they are in post for the requisite period. Such rights cannot be got rid of—at least, not without a cost.

The Minister is trying to work around this problem by doing something of which the hon. Member for Warrington, North is somewhat disapproving; nevertheless, I urge him to be cognisant of this issue when framing his proposals. After all, small businesses cannot afford to take someone on, only to have to get rid of them in an expensive and uncomfortable fashion because they have to maintain the right of the original employee to return to work. I am not saying that there is an easy answer to this problem; I am simply pointing out that the problem is a very real one for small businesses, and that in framing the law, we need to consider it.

I welcome the Government's initiative enabling women to keep in touch with the workplace. Many women who are at home with their babies genuinely want to be kept in touch with the normal world that they were used to. It is good to be kept aware of what is going on in the company, rather than simply gossiping with one's old friends. The two-month, rather than one-month, notification period for returning to work will also help in dealing with the difficult issue of the replacement employee.

Like other Members, I agree that the Government's giving carers the right to request flexible working has proved a very good idea, and I applaud their creating this opportunity for parents. There is no doubt that it has been successful, so we should say "Well done." It was successful because the Government were flexible—they are not always flexible—and created not a right to flexible working, but a right to ask for it. That helped to foster good relations between both parties, and to create an environment in which the employee can continue at work while dealing with their other responsibilities, and in which the employer can gain the value of their skills.

It is right that carers, who have similar responsibilities, be included under this provision; however, the Government are right to phase in such rights. We live in a society in which many people have caring responsibilities, and that they fulfil them is wonderful for all concerned, but we need to consider how swiftly to phase in these new rights. I urge a little caution on the Minister; we must not swamp the system. It is right that such requests be annual, rather than frequent. Frequent requests would be unfair, given that employers have other considerations on their minds.

We should extend the right to request flexibility to all the work force, as some employers already do, given that we will always come up against difficult child care cases. Children up to the age of 17 might well be dependent on their carers because they have schizophrenia or other mental health problems, for example. Of course, such problems do not go away: they continue into adulthood, and the parent may feel that they still need to care for their son or daughter well into their adult life. We want society to go in that direction, and some employers have already been successful in that regard; others should be given a little gentle encouragement to do the same.

In concluding, I apologise to the next speaker for my having to rush off.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): I am very pleased to welcome another progressive Bill. Last week, we considered the Childcare Bill, and we recently considered the Equality Bill. All these Bills will contribute to a healthier, happier society and to the country's economic prosperity by ensuring a diverse and more contented work force; they will also ensure that the diverse needs of parents and carers ar .nore recognised than ever.

I want in particular to discuss clause 12 and the part of the Bill that deals with carers of adults. I am very pleased that the existing law will be amended so that carers of adults can apply for flexible working. I must declare an interest, in that I have been the carer of my 94-year-old mother for five years, since she was severely disabled by a stroke. I have managed to continue in the very demanding job of Member of Parliament with the help of an army of paid carers—I pay tribute to the people, mainly women, who work in the caring professions—and with a lot of understanding and support both here and at home. However, I meet many carers who are isolated and are struggling to do their best for their relatives, often at the expense of their own health and well-being. It is well recognised that the health of carers suffers; most reports on carers have shown the strain that caring for somebody can impose.

Many carers are in employment and have to give up their job because they cannot manage both roles. There is now much greater recognition of the importance of caring for older and disabled people, but, as I said in an earlier intervention, many carers do not think of themselves as carers in a formal sense; they think of carers as being paid people. They are doing what they regard as their duty, and what they want to do for members of their family—for people whom they love. Nor do the many people who are working and caring for adults recognise their huge contribution to the welfare state—the billions of pounds that they save the welfare state. The Carers (Equal Opportunities) Bill, which was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Aberavon (Dr. Francis), recognised the need for carers to have access to the education and employment opportunities enjoyed by those who are not carers. This Bill partly addresses that issue.

The Employment Act 2002 introduced flexible working rights for parents of young or disabled children and, as everybody has said today, that has been a success, despite concerns that it granted only the right to make the request. I was very concerned at the time of the debate on the Act that the provision would not be strong enough and that employers would not respond properly. The employer has to consider the request and take certain factors into consideration when deciding whether to allow flexible working. In any case, as many hon. Members have said, the Act has been a tremendous success and only about 10 per cent. of requests are refused.

The Government did the right thing, because the Act has made it much easier for parents of young or disabled children to continue to work. It has also brought benefits for the employer. I declare an interest, as my two daughters have benefited from the provision. After they had children, they requested flexible working and benefited from it. It is logical, therefore, that the right to request flexible working should be extended to carers of adult relatives or others, and I am pleased that the Government propose to introduce that right from April 2007. Several hon. Members have suggested that the right to request flexible working should be extended to all employees, and I believe that the consultation by the Equal Opportunities Commission has reached that conclusion.

When we talk about family friendly policies, we tend to think of the family as a unit with dependent children, but in the UK more adults care for elderly relatives than for children. The Government have concentrated on work-life balance as one of their priorities, the benefits of which are as great for the carers of adults as they are for the carers of children. Many hon. Members have mentioned the benefits to employers of family friendly practices, such as reduced sickness absence, better staff retention, greater productivity, and better morale and commitment. Those are real and important points.

I remember the stress of juggling bringing up children and working as a local authority social worker. When the Government first took office, we undertook a major consultation of women, and it revealed that work-life balance was one of the primary concerns. Women wanted us to do something about it, and all the measures in the Bill will help. They will also involve fathers more meaningfully, and I very much welcome the paternity leave provisions.

I am glad that the Government recognise that families are not just those with children. My hon. Friend the Minister and other hon. Members spoke of the importance of the definition of "carer". I hope that the definition will be flexible and will take into account the many varied ways in which carers cope and provide support. I was pleased to hear my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State say that a carer does not necessarily have to live in the same house as the person for whom he or she cares. I can think of many carers in my constituency who hold down full-time jobs yet support elderly or disabled parents in their own homes. I hope that such carers will benefit from the Bill.

It is also important that the Government consult closely with carers' groups. The UK has some well established carers' groups, such as Carers UK, whose members know the reality of caring. We will have to consider their needs when we examine how clause 12 will work in practice. One of the big issues for carers who care for adults is lack of sleep. We all go through sleep deprivation when we have small children and, like many, I am used to getting up frequently in the night. However, if one has to do it for an adult, one knows that the situation will not change—indeed, it may get worse, not better—but children grow out of it and allow their carer to have a good night's sleep. However, it is difficult to give one's best to one's job without a good night's sleep and we need to talk about that issue with carers. The lack of sleep is one of the major issues raised with me by carers in my constituency. We must take such issues on board.

People cope with caring in many varied ways, and we have to try to address that. It will not be easy, and the regulations will have to be as flexible as possible. Presumably, we will have to consider the amount of time that people spend caring. Some, for example, are not actually physically present, but keep in frequent phone contact to check whether everything is okay. They may get a response that means that they have to alter the pattern of their day, so we will need to be flexible to address that issue.

I congratulate the Government on the Bill, especially clause 12, and I think that we are making progress towards a society in which everyone can make a greater contribution than they have been able to make in the past. The Bill will be of benefit to society as a whole.

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the civilised speech from the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan) and I am glad that, like earlier speakers, she emphasised the role of carers. This is an important issue and I agree with much of what she said. Having said that, I fear that my speech will probably fall into the category that the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) described as "grudging".

It is important that work is made family friendly, that mothers can take a decent amount of maternity leave, that fathers should spend a decent amount of time with newly born or adopted children, and that carers should have the right to flexible working hours. It is important that the House protects those rights. As the son of a single mother, I benefited from the flexible arrangements that were possible in our small family stationery business, which largely meant that as a latch-key child at the age of eight or nine I could attend my mother in her place of work—the ultimate flexibility. I understand, therefore, the benefits that flow from flexibility in such circumstances, but I am not as clear as Labour Members that the House is always best placed to judge what employers should do to protect their economic interests.

We must be careful about balancing the needs of employees against those of employers. Indeed, I met two very senior ladies from a FTSE-100 company this morning who expressed the same reservations about the Bill. I am concerned more by the summary of the regulatory impact assessment than by the RIA itself. The summary often cites the benefits that will flow to those affected by the Bill to justify the costs being imposed on employers. My understanding is that the RIA should be much more neutral in its tone and consider the costs imposed on employers and the state by such regulations. I am disappointed by the way in which the RIA so regularly seeks to justify the Bill by reference to the benefits that will flow to employees.

I recognise that much of the Bill will bring benefits to business, as well as employees, such as the keeping in touch days, which will ensure reasonable contact between employer and employee; the extension of the period of notice that a woman has to give when returning from maternity leave; and the detailed changes to the payment of statutory maternity pay, on which the Secretary of State placed so much stress. However, some people are sounding notes of caution. Richard Smith, employment services director at Croner, which is an expert adviser in employment law, warns that the pendulum may have swung too far. He says:

> "Employers are facing a legal maze of parental legislation over government proposals in the Work and Families Bill. The law could be shifting too far in favour of family needs, bringing into question a basic principle of employment law that supports the employer's need for the work to be done."

My right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), in her opening remarks, talked of the reservations of bodies such as the CBI. A Library research paper tells us that the CBI said, in its response to the consultation on the Bill:

> "CBI members accept in principle the Government's desire to extend family friendly rights further but believe there should be compensating changes to reflect the increased burden on employers."

That is really my central point. The Bill probably does good, important and useful things that the House should support, but every time we add new legislative burdens to business, especially small and medium-sized businesses, we should operate the one in, one out principle. What real relief will be given to employers for the new burdens they will have to bear under the measure?

Some say that one consequence of the Bill and similar measures will be an increasing reluctance by businesses to employ women of child-bearing age. When that point was made earlier, the cry came from the Labour Benches, "It's illegal". It may be illegal, but that does not mean that it is not a problem. The recruitment industry says that many businesses, particularly small ones, now routinely avoid women in their late 20s and early 30s precisely because of the increased costs of maternity leave and temporary cover. It may be against the law, but it is happening.

The Recruitment and Employment Confederation recently reported that 75 per cent. of its members had been told by a business not to send them female job candidates in their late 20s or early 30s. More than one in 10 said that they discriminated against pregnant women or those likely to be planning to have children. That is actually happening and it is difficult for the law to catch.

I have a rather cynical view: perhaps the measure is the beginning of an attempt to level up fathers' rights to make it less unattractive to employ women. I was interested to hear the Secretary of State say that only a few men in small businesses would be eligible for parental rights. I have a horrid fear that in a couple of years we shall be told that as so few men are taking advantage of those rights, we shall make them even more attractive for men, thereby further increasing the burden on businesses. I hope that my cynicism is misplaced.

The hon. Member for Burnley (Kitty Ussher) reeled off a list of things—regulatory burdens imposed on business, as I would describe them, even though there might be good reasons for them—and challenged us to say whether we would support them. I was one of those who opposed the minimum wage. I now accept that the level at which it was introduced did not cause a problem for business, but it is slowly being ratcheted up. Only this morning, the newspapers reported that the British Retail Consortium is expressing concerns about the latest increase, saying that it will lead to job losses. The minimum wage was brought in at a benign level that had little if any economic impact, but it is now being increased. We must be extremely careful about such issues.

I pay tribute to the Government for their attempts at robust protection of British business from the impact of the working time directive, but I have in my hand a list provided by the Engineering Employers Federation that I will rattle through. For the benefit of the Hansard writers, I shall give them a full copy. These are the reasons for which employees can currently have days off [illegible] sick leave, annual leave, reasonable time for [illegible] duties; if they are a member of a local authority, a statutory tribunal, a police authority, the service authority for the national criminal intelligence service or the National Crime Squad, a board of prison visitors, a health authority, a "relevant education body", the Environment Agency or a water customer consultation panel. They can have time off for antenatal care and reasonable time off for trade union duties or training. There is time off for pension scheme trustees, for employee representatives, for members of European work councils and for domestic information and consultation representatives.

There is not enough time to read out the whole list. It is a jolly list and depending on how we count up the categories, there are 21, 30, 34 or 36 different existing rights for employees to have time off from their place of employment. In fact, I am told that the No. 10 policy adviser in this field was recently reported to have said jokingly that one day the Government would have to legislate for employers to have the right to request employees to come to work.

Alison Seabeck: Can the hon. Gentleman pick out from the list that he half read out which of those rights would be an unreasonable request?

Peter Luff: That is the problem. Each and every one on its own is perfectly reasonable, yet their sum total is unreasonable. To govern is to choose, and some of them will probably have to go, or some other regulations that are burdens on employers will have to go in their place. My contention is that the burden is getting dangerously heavy.

Kitty Ussher: I am delighted that I made such a huge impression on the hon. Gentleman. He said that regulations would have to go. Which ones? Can he be more specific?

Peter Luff: I shall not do that in the short time available, although I would happily discuss it with the hon. Lady over a drink later. When the Government are imposing new burdens in a heavily regulated area they should adopt the principle of one in, one out. We have reached the point when that principle should be respected. The CBI was asking for that. The hon. Lady looks disbelieving, or disapproving, but that is what I believe.

Britain faces huge competitive challenges in the world economy, yet in this Chamber we often behave as though they do not exist. Under the Government, we have already slipped from fourth to 13th place in the world competitive table compiled by the World Economic Forum, and it is no laughing matter. We face huge competitive challenges and we cannot afford to be complacent in the face of them. We cannot afford to behave as though the world owes us a living: it does not. We owe ourselves a living and it is only by our own hard work that we shall actually get things right.

My concern is that there will come a moment when some legislation will be introduced to give new rights to employees that is the straw that breaks the camel's back. I do not know when that point will come. I have cried wolf before about this—I plead guilty—but the moment will come. I am fond of cricket, Mr. Deputy Speaker, like one of your colleagues. It is odd that when one watches a game of cricket one thinks that one side is winning, but in retrospect one realises that the other side has started to win. One cannot quite pin down the moment, but it happens. There will come a moment when Britain's competitive advantage has eroded so much that we shall start to lose in the world economy.

These questions are important and I do not deride the Bill. I respect what it seeks to do. I am a passionate believer in the family, and as has been said I do not believe that we can do everything through the fiscal system. There is a need for rights in this field, but the issues are complex and I am perturbed about the short timetable for the Committee, especially if the draft regulations are not available. Often, I respect the reason for drawing up Bills that leave so much to secondary legislation, but in such an important field it would be much better for the Committee to have access to the regulations. The Bill will be out of Committee before Christmas and that is too short a time.

The Bill is literally motherhood and apple pie—perhaps fatherhood and apple pie. Apple pie is a good thing, especially if made with fine Worcestershire apples, but if the meal that comes before it is too large, there may not be room for it. We need to eat a little less of the other courses to make room for something else that is desirable. That is the fundamental point. Bad legislation and bad regulations are always unwelcome, but sometimes good regulations are unwelcome, too. This may be one of those occasions.

There is too little time for the Committee to consider such important questions, and the Bill would have been much better if it had been accompanied by a clear statement from the Government of which other regulations they were removing from the shoulders of British business.

8.7 pm

Ms Diana R. Johnson (Kingston upon Hull, North) (Lab): I listened with particular care to the contributions of Opposition Members. I was pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Kitty Ussher) listed the approaches that they had taken in recent years on the range of employment legislation that has been introduced. It was enlightening and very different from several of the contributions that have been made.

I want to talk about the context for the measure. I was a lawyer before I entered the House of Commons. I worked in law centres, mainly advising low-paid and non-unionised employees about their employment rights. Statutory employment rights were important to that group, as they did not have the benefit of strong contractual terms and conditions. One of my clients was a security guard in his 30s, with a young family. He came to see me after he had worked for nine months without a day off and asked whether he had a right to annual leave and time off. I had to advise him that he had no rights because the then Government did not want to introduce the social chapter. His only rights were those he had negotiated with his employer and at that time the security industry was, to a large extent, non-unionised. I had to tell him that his rights were minimal.

Good employers have always recognised the right to annual leave and time off, but bad employers have not. That gentleman, whose name was Andy, had to wait until 1998 when we introduced the working time regulations, which gave the right to annual leave and a limit to the working week. It is outrageous that less than 10 years ago a person could have been in his position. Since 1997, the Government have been committed to fairness at work, which includes recognition of the need for not only economic efficiency but social justice in the workplace. As I said earlier, I am very pleased that we had read into the record a list of the legislation that the Conservative party has opposed since 1997, including rights in respect of annual leave, flexibility in the workplace, part-time workers and extended maternity leave.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Johnson: No, I will continue because I have only a short amount of time.

Peter Luff: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It may help the hon. Lady to know that, if she gives way, extra time is added to her speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I am sure that the hon. Lady is aware that, if she gives way, time is added to her speech, so she does not miss out by giving way twice, after which, things are rather different.

Ms Johnson: I am grateful to you for that information, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The Bill is important in setting out a floor of statutory rights.

Mrs. Laing: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Johnson: On the basis of the information that I have just been given, I will gladly give way.

Mrs. Laing: I thank the hon. Lady for giving way so graciously. I wonder whether she will explain why she is so intent on talking about past times and past legislation. The Conservative party does not oppose the Bill. Should we not get on with making the Bill better, rather than harking back to the past?

Ms Johnson: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for that intervention. When debating such Bills, it is important to consider the context and to ask why we want to implement such provisions. We need to set the record straight about how we have reached this point. It is great credit to the Government that, since 1997, employment rights have been extended while economic efficiency has grown and more people are in work than ever before.

Clause 13 is an enabling provision to introduce the right for the additional public and bank holidays to be included in addition to the 20 days' annual leave to which employees now have the right. As I said when I gave the example of a client that I had years ago, unscrupulous employers have included the eight public holidays in those 20 days. Those who legislated on the issue were clear that that was not what they intended. I am very pleased indeed that clause 13 includes the right to have the additional eight days' public holiday.

Clauses 1 to 6 extend maternity and paternity leave and the right to adoption leave with pay, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said clearly in his opening remarks. It is shocking that employers still discriminate against women who are pregnant. I have been appalled by some of the comments made in the debate about the actions of certain employers who have either not interviewed or not considered pregnant women or women of child-bearing age for employment. That is very wrong and clearly a very poor business decision. Such employers miss the talent of a whole group of women. I am very concerned that certain Members think that that is acceptable.

Peter Luff: I wish to put on record that I have never suggested that that was acceptable. It is never acceptable to break the law. I agree with the hon. Lady that many businesses face an economic cost if they take such a foolish decision, but my point was that the evidence shows that things are happening in substantial numbers.

Ms Johnson: With the greatest respect, the hon. Gentleman was not the only hon. Member to raise that point. I am glad that he was able to clarify his position, but other Members seemed to imply earlier in the debate that they understood why decisions were taken that clearly amount to discrimination that should be challenged in tribunals.

I am very pleased indeed that we recognise that maternity leave should be extended to nine months from April 2007 and, I hope, to one year by the end of this Parliament. Of course, that will benefit about 400,000 women in this country.

Clause 2, as other hon. Members have said, brings into line the rules about adopting parents. All hon. Members would agree that parents who adopt should be given the same consideration and rights as other parents.

Clause 6 deals with the entitlement to additional paternity pay, about which the Equal Opportunities Commission has carried out extensive research. About 70 to 80 per cent. of new mums and dads support the opportunity for paternity pay to be used over a six-month period if any of the woman's maternity pay entitlement is unexpired. That is obviously very useful.

A number of hon. Members have spoken about clause 12, and it is absolutely right that carers are included in the provision to request flexible working. There are more than 6 million carers in this country. As time goes on, the right to flexible working will be extended to other groups, but the Government are taking the right approach by extending such rights piece by piece.

Hon. Members have put forward various arguments about business efficiency and the problems of small businesses in dealing with maternity and paternity matters. The provisions on the keeping-in-touch days for women on maternity leave are welcome, but some consideration must be given to the reasonableness of those days. Obviously, we do not want to overburden women during their maternity leave, and I hope that those days will be determined by agreement and used positively and constructively.

The view that a written statement of the rights and responsibilities of employees and employers should be given is very positive. It is certainly my experience that people find great difficulty in understanding the complexities of maternity and paternity law, so clear written statements would be useful. I agree that the request that a woman should give two months' notice of her return date is the right way to do things. That will provide clarity on both sides.

The Department of Trade and Industry has indicated that it will work to try to reduce that bureaucratic burden of SMP, SPP and SAP. Again, that is absolutely right. There is a need to make the calculations easier—in particular, I remember trying years ago to work out when statutory maternity pay should start. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has indicated, SMP does not necessarily start on the same day that maternity leave commences. Those matters must be simplified and sorted out. Overall, the Bill is very welcome. It adds to the range of employment rights that we need. It is good for business; it is good for employees; and it is very good for families.

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Ms Johnson), who clearly showed the House her expertise as a former employment rights lawyer, and I am sure that all hon. Members welcome her contribution.

This is indeed a Bill of good intentions. For that reason, I support many of the intentions that were expressed so ably by the Secretary of State at the beginning of the debate. He was right to suggest that the concept of fairness should be at the heart of such legislation. That is why I say, with some disappointment, that there is a large group of families for whom fairness does not appear to be at the heart of the Bill. I refer to the 3 million or so families who run and own small businesses. All too often in such legislation, we tend to talk about families generally and we forget the peculiar circumstances of an owner-managed enterprise. I say that as both a grandson and a son of the owner of such an enterprise. It is therefore my intention in the short time that I have available to try to express the views of that group of families, rather than the others to which hon. Members have already referred.

It is true to say that the Bill comes in a long line of similar legislation. We have had many employment and similar regulatory measures in the past few years. Indeed, since 1997, there has been a 53 per cent. increase in the regulatory burden on businesses, small and otherwise, and the net result is an additional 15 new regulations every working day. The cost to business, which the Government have accepted and is recognised among the leading experts in business, is now equated to £14 billion. That figure comes from the British Chambers of Commerce. Given that 97 per cent. of all enterprises are small businesses, it is clear that the brunt of those costs fall on those firms.

When we consider regulations, it is important to remember that these kinds of measures have a disproportionately large impact on the smallest firms. I highlight that in the context of the Bill by referring to an excellent survey by the Federation of Small Businesses on the amount of time that firms spend trying to comply with Government requests for information and regulations. Prior to the past six months or so, that figure had reached 28 hours for each firm every month. Each firm thus loses 336 hours a year.

We normally discuss the productivity and competitiveness question, but we should also consider the time lost to the families of those who own and manage such enterprises. Families lose evenings, and fathers and mothers are sometimes unable to be part of a family Sunday. I used to run my own business, so I well recall the number of Sunday afternoons that I lost filling in the dreaded quarterly VAT return and a raft of other forms. I am worried that although we often—quite rightly—talk about the need to engage parents in bringing up their children, we forget that such legislation not only has a monetary cost for small businesses, but leads to people losing time in which they can participate in their children's upbringing.

The irony is that the small firms to which I am referring often have the flexibility for which the Bill tries to legislate. They are the ones that lead because their owners know their employees. I can think of at least three businesses in my constituency that are owned and managed by people going back through several generations and have employees going back through several generations. The owners know about their employees' family situations, so they are able to work around them and to be flexible and engaging. I suspect that the response of the small businesses who read the Bill will be to say, "Hang on a moment. We are already doing this. Please don't restrain us by the dead hand of legislation." Of course there are enterprises that do not do such things, and they need to be examined and encouraged to change their habits. However, legislation is all too often a pair of handcuffs that does not enable change in the way in which I suspect that hon. Members would wish it to.

Let me refer to several specific aspects of the Bill. We have debated the question of maternity leave, but I do not think that the scale of the change has been truly considered. We are talking about increasing maternity leave through two steps from six months to 12 months, which is a doubling of the amount and thus a significant change. The previous Bill, for which the Secretary of State was the Minister, increased the time period from 18 weeks to six months. That was manageable, but an increase from six months to 12 months is a different ball game altogether. The crossover to other legislation and the change in rights that that might well create have been referred to.

I suspect that the Government did not take account of several matters when they considered the change. If a firm with two or three people loses a key worker for a year, it is tremendously disruptive. One must also take account of the cost of training a new individual, let alone the agency fees that are often incurred when employing that person. Of course, there will also be training costs involved when people return to work. I am not sure whether the Government have seriously considered the full costs involved. When the Minister winds up the debate, will he confirm whether the costs to which I have referred are specifically included in the regulatory impact assessment? I could not see that they were, but perhaps he has a sharper eye than me. I ask that question simply because if we are genuinely to understand the benefits and costs of the Bill, we must have the full information before us.

Let me turn to what is loosely described as the transfer of parental leave. I appreciate that the provisions in the Bill do not reflect the Labour party's original intention. The concept of mothers and fathers sharing parental leave is good in principle, but what about the practicalities? It is likely that a mum and dad will work for different employers, so we must ask how the measure will be implemented. The Federation of Small Businesses said:

"we fear that the plans will be highly complex and virtually impossible to enforce, with small employers facing an administrative nightmare as they try to comply."

I have a question in my mind as the consultation proceeds. At the moment, it appears that the onus is on small businesses to manage the process, but why should that be the case? Small businesses are already asked to be unpaid tax collectors and unpaid benefit offices. Why should they now administer the Government's social policies? There could be a dangerous precedent. I do not want to make wild forecasts—the Minister knows that I will not try to do so—but I would like to know whether the Government have really thought the measure through.

Given the inherent complexity of the measure, would it not be fairer if the Government took some responsibility for their own policies and introduced direct payment of both statutory maternity and paternity pay from state to employee? I know that the Minister touched on the matter earlier in the debate, but I would welcome any clarity that he can bring to our deliberations.

Peter Luff: My hon. Friend makes an important point. The full regulatory impact assessment seems to cost in remarkable detail the burdens on Government, but the burdens on small and medium-sized companies are set out in sketchy detail.

Mr. Prisk: I wish that I were surprised, but I suspect that on closer examination—when the Committee gets its teeth into the matter—we will find further omissions. My hon. Friend makes a sensible point.

I have repeatedly raised the question of the cost of the Bill during the debate. Hon. Members might not have noticed this, but apparently the Government expect to spend £369 million more each year, as an employer, as a direct result of the Bill. It is thus expected that during the next Parliament, there will be a £1.8 billion increase in the cost of employing the same people who are employed today, although I suspect that there will be no noticeable change in the delivery of public services.

There are costs for private employers, too. The cost will be £208 million in the first year, and that will rise to £284 million in each and every year following that. As the mathematicians among us will realise, that represents £1.3 billion over the course of the next full Parliament, which is a substantial sum. Given the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff) has just made, our earlier exchanges with the Secretary of State and the omissions that we have clearly identified, I am worried that the Bill will lead to substantial costs. I have identified £3.1 billion of costs to begin with that do not seem to have been fully considered during the deliberations on the Bill. However, I know that the Minister is a reasonable man and will want to make sure that we have such information, so I look forward to receiving it.

I have had insufficient time to consider many of the Bill's positive aspects. I make no bones about that because it is important that we try to tease out the weaknesses of legislation during our scrutiny. I fully accept that there is a need to balance our work and family lives, but we need to make sure that that balance extends to all families, especially those involved in small business and those of entrepreneurs. The Secretary of State promised us in his opening remarks that the Bill would be good for business and good for families. Conservative Members agree with those sentiments, so we intend to ensure that he keeps his word.

Alison Seabeck (Plymouth, Devonport) (Lab): We heard my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State explain the Government's intentions in introducing the Bill, including extending the maximum period for which maternity pay, maternity allowance and adoption pay are payable from 26 weeks to 52 weeks during the course of this Parliament, as well as introducing a new scheme that provides certain employees with a new entitlement to take leave to care for a child. In listening to the Secretary of State's remarks, I found myself drawn back to the time when my daughters were born and the position in which I, along with other mothers and, indeed, fathers, were in. I hope that the House bears with me if I draw a little on my personal experience. My daughters were born in 1981 and 1985, when the Conservatives were in power, and my entitlement was just 29 weeks post-confinement, supported by a payment of 90 per cent. of income over just six weeks. I was employed in a further education college and my husband was a town planner. Neither of us earned generous salaries and there was clearly a need for both of us to work. However, because I wanted to stay at home initially with my first child, I resigned from my full-time post and had to face finding a suitable part-time job and child care when the financial imperative kicked in and I needed to go back to work. After the birth of my second child, I returned to work immediately at the end of the statutory period, but I would have welcomed the keeping-in-touch days that are proposed.

In a perfect world, I would have preferred to have had the option of remaining at home for a longer period or, indeed, of allowing my husband to take part of the leave to care for our children, a subject raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Kitty Ussher). Although the evidence suggests that the number of fathers wishing to take up the option is small, there are, none the less, those for whom it would be a very welcome option. Some 24 years on from my experience, there is clear evidence to show that both mothers and fathers believe that it should be the norm for there to be greater paternal involvement in the early months of their child's life. Indeed, in a recent Equal Opportunities Commission survey, seven out of 10 women and men agreed or agreed strongly that women's and men's lives are becoming more alike in terms of their need to balance work and family life.

Opportunities to improve the work and caring balance have been lost in the past. For example, in November 1985, shortly after the birth of my second child, there was a debate in the House on parental and family leave. The then Conservative Government could have accepted a European Economic Community directive extending paternity rights, but they chose simply to note the directive. As that great campaign for equal rights, the late Jo Richardson, commented at the time, it showed how out of touch they were with the day-to-day reality of people's lives. Unfortunately, one or two Conservative Members are still a little out of touch, although I acknowledge the positive comments from the Front Bench.

A significant number of fathers probably want to take paternity leave but are unclear about their rights early enough in the process to plan properly. Evidence suggests that, in parallel to the powers in the Bill, an information campaign needs to take place to inform them of their rights. I am concerned that fathers whose earnings are below £20,000 per annum are less likely to find out about their rights prior to the birth of their child than those fathers whose income exceeds that figure.

Given the findings of the Equal Opportunities Commission's survey "Dads and their babies", which was funded in part by the Department of Trade and Industry, I would welcome the Minister's comments on whether he accepts that there is a real job of work to be done to ensure that fathers are properly informed of their paternity rights from formal sources, rather than simply relying on friends and family for that information. Given that many of these important proposals require change via regulations, I also seek reassurance that there will be no significant delay in introducing them, allowing, of course, for the caveat that we need to consult on some of them.

The Bill addresses not only the period immediately following the child's birth, but the need for further amendments to existing legislation to allow a wider range of individuals greater flexibility of working. Clause 12, which has been mentioned by a number of hon. Members, gives carers the right to request flexible working for the first time. We know that in the region of 3.5 million carers are struggling to work as well as care. I share the support that my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Liz Blackman) and the National Autistic Society have given to the clause. Without that flexibility, we lose a number of highly skilled workers who have to make a difficult decision between work and caring. Our economy can ill afford to lose the expertise of those workers, especially at a time of skills shortage. The cost to employers of recruiting and training new employees to fill their shoes is a burden, and I refer the House to the figures given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Enabling people to remain in the workplace also has the added advantage of enabling them to continue to build a better pension for themselves. I also welcome the proposed extension of rights to carers of adult dependants, but hope that in due course that freedom will be extended to parents of older children through the use of the regulatory powers in the Bill.

It is still a little unclear where the age definition will fall, something that was mentioned by hon. Members on both sides of the House. We need greater clarity on the definition of the relationship between the employee and the child or person over 18 who requires care. A number of employers, both large and small, already encourage flexible working, but there are different definitions of what they understand a carer to be. Let me give some examples. In Centrica's view:

"If you are a carer, you have responsibilities, which have an impact on your working life. You will be responsible for the care and support of a disabled, elderly or sick partner, relative or close friend who is unable to care for themselves as they are ill, frail or have a disability."

According to British Telecom:

"A carer is an employee with significant caring responsibilities, which have a substantial impact on their working life. These employees will be responsible for the care and support of a disabled, elderly or sick partner, relative or friend".

and HSBC defines carers as:

"Employees who are the prime carer of a sick child, elderly, disabled or chronically sick relative or other close dependant."

Each has a slightly different understanding of what a carer is, so it is important that we provide as simple and as flexible a definition as possible.

That said, I warmly welcome the Bill and look forward to the Minister's closing remarks.

8.35 pm

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): The Scottish National party and Plaid Cymru welcome the Bill. We recognise that the rights it gives are an important step forward for men and women in employment. I should like to comment on one or two aspects.

I join in the general welcome for clause 12. The extension to carers of the right to ask for flexible working is extremely important. I have met many carers in my time as a Member of Parliament and I have been struck by how many had to give up work to look after sick children or relatives and ended up relying on state benefits. When, sadly, their elderly relative dies, they often find it very difficult to get back into work. If the clause helps people to stay in work, it is very welcome and long overdue.

I also welcome the provisions on paternity leave, but I ask the Minister to consider creating greater flexibility. I know that it will be difficult, but several hon. Members have mentioned that point. I look back to the time when my children were born. I was self-employed and was able to change my work patterns to tie in with what was needed and to be with my wife when our children were just babies. It was an important and useful thing to be able to do. As I see it, the problem with the Minister's proposal is that there no cross-over period—the mother will have the first six months and the father the second. We should find a way to work in a little flexibility to allow both parents to stay at home, especially when a child is first born. That could be very important, because it is often difficult for new and young parents, or in some cases not-so-young parents, to come to terms with the changes in their lives that a baby brings.

It is also important that employers understand the rights in the Bill. Although we give employees rights, enforcing them is often a different matter. Good employers will always try to keep good employees and will bend over backwards to give them the consideration they need, but that is not true of all employers, and that is a problem. Other hon. Members will have received Citizens Advice's excellent booklet on the Bill, "Hard labour: Making maternity and paternity at rights at work a reality for all". Some of the case studies it contains are disturbing, but Citizens Advice also makes the valid point that "the Government's strategy in relation to these and other statutory workplace rights must include steps to ensure more universal compliance by small employers, including more pro-active enforcement against rogue employers."

Although it is possible to take employers to an industrial tribunal, it is often not easy to do so. It is time consuming and many employees find the process of taking an employer to an industrial tribunal extremely difficult and daunting. I know from my experience as a solicitor representing people at industrial tribunals that it can also take a very long time.

One group that does not appear to be adequately covered at present is those who are, as the Library note puts it, somewhat coldly,

"commissioning parents in surrogacy arrangements."

I was encouraged by the Secretary of State saying in response to my earlier intervention that he would look again at that matter. My interest was prompted by a constituency case. My constituent could not obtain a decision from her employer about what, if any, rights she had to take time off to spend with her new baby. The case did not appear to be covered by either maternity or adoption leave legislation, and the couple were left in limbo. When they approached me, I thought that the matter should be treated in the same way as adoption, with which it had many similarities. However, that is not the case under the existing legislation, and there was no automatic right to leave or pay. I intervened with the employer—a major public sector employer—which, to its credit, accepted that the situation should be treated in the same way as adoption and agreed to do so. However—and this is the point I wish to make—that was at its discretion, and my constituent did not have any automatic rights, which is unfair.

I took the matter up with the Minister, who confirmed the legal position in a letter:

"There is no specific statutory right for parents who have a child through surrogacy to take time off following the birth of their child, and currently no plans to change this."

To be fair, he explained that maternity rights were originally a health and safety issue, but things have moved on. We are now talking about a work-life balance for families, and surrogacy is an important issue. The number of people involved is low, but the matter should be given due consideration.

The Bill does not change the position, as the Minister accepted. When the Bill was published I asked the Library to prepare a briefing note, which confirmed that nothing has changed. That note now appears in the Library research paper, so perhaps I have secured my place in history by achieving a mention of the subject in such a paper. I urge the Minister to consider the particular circumstances of surrogacy as parents in that category appear to suffer discrimination.

When I first became involved in the matter I assumed, perhaps naively, that some form of adoption would be required, but there are several different methods of dealing with surrogacy. The Library briefing cites the submission to the Government's original consultation by the National Association of Schoolmasters Union of Women Teachers, which puts the matter very well:

"In these circumstances the commissioning mother usually has the baby soon after the birth but cannot formally adopt until six weeks after the birth. Clearly she will need to take leave from the date she receives the baby but currently she has no statutory rights to any pay or leave, even after the formal adoption."

If that is indeed the case, the mother is in a disadvantaged position. Had there been no surrogacy agreement but only an adoption, she would have been entitled to rights under adoption regulations. However, because of the surrogacy she has no rights whatsoever.

Various legislative proposals apply in surrogacy arrangements, and different means by which parental rights are given to the intended parents and the parental rights of the surrogate mother extinguished. As well as formal adoption, parental orders can be imposed, allowing a married couple who commission the surrogate birth to apply for an order so that they are treated in law as the parents of the child. That is not necessarily a quick process because, as in all cases that involve children, the court would have to be convinced that the welfare of the child was secure. Similarly, it may be possible for a commissioning father to apply to the courts for a parental responsibility order by virtue of the fact that he is the genetic father of the child. I am not sure of the position in English law, but in Scotland such an order would have to be accompanied by a residency order to specify that the child is to reside with the father and his wife—the child's putative mother. If that order was not granted, the original order would not do much good. In any event, the parental responsibility order would not give any automatic rights to the wife of the applicant. Even though she would almost certainly be the main carer, she would not necessarily obtain any benefit though time off or pay. Those procedures may not work as intended.

It is particularly strange that that point has not been covered by the legislation as the legal frameworks for surrogacy and adoption are closely related. It is iniquitous that parents in a surrogacy arrangement should have no automatic legal rights, but must rely on their contract of employment. In my constituent's case that worked out—it might not in other cases—so I urge the Minister to reconsider the matter and ensure that all families are treated equally. After all, in his letter to hon. Members of 19 October, the Secretary of State specifically stated that the Bill would "deliver our commitment to give parents more choice about how they balance their work and family life".

That should be as true of those seeking a family through surrogacy as it is of those seeking a family through any other means. For the sake of fairness and completeness, I urge the Minister to re-examine the matter and introduce proposals to include such a measure in the Bill.

Kitty Ussher (Burnley) (Lab): I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in this debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I add my name to those of other hon. Members who support the Bill—I believe that supporting this legislation is something of which we should all be very proud. The Bill provides legislative support for what we all know deep down to be true: all parents, regardless of gender, may want to spend time with their young children—many do. It is crucial to our fight against discrimination that it should be seen as normal for both men and women to take time off for a new baby.

This evening, we have discussed whether the Bill will make it more or less likely that women of childbearing age will be discriminated against. The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff) is no longer in his seat, but I note that he said that he has evidence of that practice taking place, in which case I hope that he will give it to the police.

I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman is not here, because I wanted him to have the opportunity to withdraw his comment, which I found rather condescending, that we should have a drink and discuss the issues. A few minutes earlier, he did not even know my name—I wonder whether it is normal for him to invite ladies to go for drinks when he does not know their names.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I do not know whether the hon. Lady knows that my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff) is Chairman of the Trade and Industry Committee, which is probably why he was interested in her views.

Kitty Ussher: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that clarification. I am sure that the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire will mention it to me in person, if we ever discuss the matter.

I believe that the legislation will reduce discrimination against women of childbearing age, because if more men of the same age act as role models by taking greater paternity leave, it will become normal for all parents to do so. That is one of the reasons why I support the Bill, which will help us move towards a culture in which all people—male and female—can organise their lives to suit their caring responsibilities without fear of stigma in the workplace.

I am in the unusual position of agreeing with something that the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) said—she said that the business case for the legislation is proven, which is true. Businesses will benefit by having higher staff retention if they make it easier through this legislation to allow their employees to balance their work and family commitments, and anecdotal evidence shows that productivity rises in such cases. They will also have access to greater talents not only among their existing employees, who will not have to leave their jobs when the time comes to look after their families, but among a larger pool of potential employees, because more people will want to apply for work, realising that they can more easily balance their work and family commitments.

I particularly support the measures in the Bill that give greater parental rights to fathers, which the evidence shows that they want. An Equal Opportunities Commission survey conducted earlier this year found that two thirds of fathers intend to take up their paternity rights, and nine out of 10 fathers take time off when their children are born. Crucially, half of fathers say that the existing legislation is not sufficient.

The Bill is good for men, but because it is good for men, it is potentially good for women, too. It will end the pernicious cycle by which young adults who form a couple and who are equal on the career ladder before they start a family inevitably end up in a situation in which the woman experiences a pay gap after the first or second child. At the moment, because only the mother can take a substantial period of time off when a child is born, it becomes financially logical for the father to work longer hours and seek promotion and for the mother to remain at home. Fathers often work harder when their child is in its first year until their pay rises. When the mother returns to work after six months or one year, a wedge has begun to be driven between the salary of the man and the salary of the woman.

Norman Lamb: I agree with what the hon. Lady is saying about redressing the balance between men and women as women become increasingly unequal as a result of time off relating to childbirth. Does she recognise, however, that the Government estimate in their regulatory impact assessment that it is possible that as few as 9,000 people will take advantage of the right to paid paternity leave because, at £106 a week, it will be uneconomic for many fathers to do so? Does she see some merit in giving a father, like the mother, greater flexibility in taking a shorter time than the maximum but with a higher weekly rate than £106?

Kitty Ussher: I do not favour that, because it would send out the wrong signal. We should either support someone on parental leave or not support them. I note the hon. Gentleman's general point. I hope that take-up by new fathers will be high, because fathers and families would benefit from that. However, it is not up to the Government to tell families how they should organise their lives. We should provide an enabling environment so that they can make the choices that work for them.

The Bill will allow both parents to be equal at the end of the first year, if that is what they want. The mother can take the first six months off, during which time the father continues to work. The father can then take the second six months off while the mother returns to work to seek promotion opportunities and whatever else she wants to do. That is a wholly advantageous move that we should all support.

I want to take my example a little further. Earlier, I asked the Secretary of State about a situation in which a woman wants to go back to work after three months. We should not force her to do so, but I can imagine many situations where she might want to, perhaps because she likes working or because she is in a sufficiently senior position in the organisation that she is genuinely worried that there will be negative business effects if she does not go back—or, God forbid, she is a Member of Parliament whose constituents could not tolerate the idea of her having six months off. Colleagues will know that I have some experience of that.

It would be wrong if the mother wanted to go back to work when the baby was three months old and the father wanted to take over but the legislation or regulations did not allow it. The mother would have to remain at home for the second three months to wait for the father to be allowed to take over, thereby damaging her business, or they would have to employ another form of child care for that period. It would be unnecessarily disruptive for the child if both parents wanted to share the year between them. When I mentioned that to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, he said that it was not favoured in the consultations. I have read those, however, and some groups did favour it, particularly Fathers Direct, which claims to speak for a large interest group on this matter and should not be ignored.

Earlier, my right hon. Friend said that World Health Organisation guidelines suggest that women should breast-feed for six months—so does the Department of Health, but it also recommends several other things including not smoking, not drinking too much, and eating five portions of fruit and veg each day. In the end, it is up to individuals to decide how they wish to interpret such advice. If the Government really think that women should breast-feed for six months, they should legislate to that effect, but I am sure that they do not think that women should be forced to do so. In fact, the Government have, I am proud to say, introduced regulations that require employers to provide areas where women can breast-feed or—without troubling the House with too much technicality—express milk and so on. I therefore urge my hon. Friends on the Front Bench to consider as they consult further whether greater flexibility should be allowed on the matter.

[Kitty Ussher]

In summary, the Bill will transform the culture of our workplaces, and that is excellent. It will help to provide male and female role models to whom young parents can look when they decide how to balance their work and family lives. It will lead to less, not more discrimination. It will be good for small and large companies as they realise that the measure requires them to think beyond their existing talent pool. That is good for our economy and for families in this country.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Burnley (Kitty Ussher), who made such a powerful speech. I agree with many of her points. However, I hope to deal with matters that have been touched on only briefly in the debate.

I read the Work and Families Bill with interest. It details how parents should have more choice through flexible working to create a better work-life balance. It advocates a longer period of paternity pay from 26 to 39 weeks from April 2007. It allows regulations to be made for additional statutory paternity leave and ties in with the Government's 10-year strategy for child care. That is all good and to be welcomed. However, the measure is incomplete—it is half a Bill. It does not mention those mothers who want to stay at home to bring up their children. What about mothers who are forced back to work for financial reasons but would prefer to stay at home to look after their children?

The measure is simply another Government initiative that will break down the family model, forcing parents to go out to work instead of giving them the genuine choice of looking after their children at home. It is a proven fact that children do better when they are brought up in a family environment and even better when one parent is at home to give them constant care and attention in the early years of their lives.

I have run the Listening to Wellingborough and Rushden campaign in my constituency for many years. It aims to seek the views of local people, groups and organisations and campaign on their behalf for change. I listen to people through surveys, public meetings, door-to-door canvassing and visiting local residents. Throughout the time that I have run the campaign, the length of maternity pay, paternity leave or flexible working has never come up. However, families' concern about the amount of tax that they have to pay comes up all the time. They are concerned about the detrimental effects of the inefficient and inconsistent tax credit system. They are worried that they would be financially better off if they lived apart.

The Government are determined to get parents back to work as soon as possible after a birth. They have now realised that they need to extend maternity and paternity leave. However, they still believe that, after a few months—whether nine or 12—parents should return to work. They have given no thought to mothers who decide not to work but to bring up their children.

Many parents are frustrated because there is no option to stay at home in the early years of their children's lives. I must declare an interest. I have a son, Thomas, who is nearly five years old. I also have two older children who are 23 and 21. My wife has spent time at home to bring them up. She returned to full-time working only since Thomas started school. As with our other two children, Jennie and I believed that it was vital that she was with them in the early years. We were in a position to do that, but the Government have ensured that that is not an option for most families in our country. Such woolly-minded, liberal thinking will lead to disaster.

The Government's desire to control everything, whether through their nought-to-five curriculum, their insistence on getting children into school as soon as possible or the pressure on mothers to go back to work, constitutes nanny-state, centralist intervention. It is socialist planning that might go down well with Labour Back Benchers, but it is not good for 21st century Britain. It has more in common with the state planning of the former Soviet Union than with a modern, 21st-century country. When will the Government trust families and allow them personal responsibility? When will they allow children to be brought up by their parents, rather than by the state?

I have no illusions; we are living in a changing world, and work and family life are very different from what they used to be. I completely understand that many women now choose to pursue a successful career, and that should be welcomed. However, my concerns rest with those women who want to be full-time mothers. The Government have removed the choice for such women to stay at home and bring up their children.

The Government have also discriminated against the family by introducing measures that benefit couples living apart. In a recent report published by the charity Care, the tax credit system is blamed as one of the drivers forcing mothers out to work even if they would prefer to look after their children at home. The Government do not regard running a home and bringing up children as a worthwhile career option. They do not believe that it constitutes work, let alone hard work. If Ministers were to spend a few weeks trying to run a home and look after two young children, there could be a rapid rethinking of Government policy.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I do not want the hon. Gentleman to run away with the idea that Ministers do not have parental responsibilities. I have three boys, and I also have three grandchildren. I am well aware of the roles that parents and grandparents can play.

Mr. Bone: I am grateful to the Minister for that comment. However, if he had had to bring up those children at home, rather than working in the House of Commons, he would understand that it was actually rather hard work. When my wife was bringing up our first two children and I was working away from home, she was working exceptionally hard on something that was of great benefit not only to our family but, ultimately, to the nation.

The balance has now swung so far in favour of making people go out to work that there are huge financial disadvantages for the traditional family. The Care report examined 74 couples, and found that 64 of them would have been better off financially if they lived apart. It also showed that, on average, a couple lost £50 a week by staying together rather than living apart. One of the families studied, with average earnings of £25,000 a year, would gain £206 a week—yes, £206 a week—by splitting up. Where are the incentives in the Bill to keep families together? Children will always do better if they are brought up in a loving and secure family environment. I am not saying that financial reasons are the only factor involved when a couple split up, but they certainly play a big part.

The tax credit system is, by its very nature, flawed. Since coming to Parliament in May, I have been inundated by worried constituents who have been victims of a system that is so ambiguous and complicated, with so many forms to be filled in, that many of them have been penalised. Let me give the House a specific example. I have had a mother crying in my office, fearful that the family would have to sell their home because they had had their tax credits stopped and had received a demand from the Inland Revenue for thousands of pounds in overpaid tax credits. When I looked at the situation, I found that my constituents had done nothing wrong; it seemed to be a gross error by the tax credit office. However, that did little to relieve the despair and hurt caused to my constituents by the tax credit system.

The problem with this Government is that they believe that all mothers want to return to work for a career. They do not even consider the possibility that some mothers want to stay at home to bring up their children; that is not in their psyche. The Bill is only half a Bill; it addresses one issue but totally ignores the other.

9.4 pm

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): It is a pleasure to speak in this debate on a welcome and important Bill. The research paper suggests that it has come on the back of a raft of policy documents and consultation papers. I am delighted that it also comes on the back of a manifesto commitment that came via the Warwick agreement, and I am glad that the Government are pursuing it so early in this Parliament. I look forward to seeing more manifesto commitments with regard to the Warwick agreement, such as an end to two-tier work forces and increased protection for migrant workers. One step at a time—

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): Is it not embarrassing that in this place we have a two-tier work force for domestics, one of which is employed by this place and earns a good salary, while the other is employed by a private contractor and is clearly being exploited?

Mr. McGovern: I agree with my hon. Friend entirely. I am against two-tier work forces, regardless of where they exist, and the sooner we get the situation sorted in this place, the happier I will be.

The Bill is crucial—I am afraid that I must use the jargon—to the work-life balance in the 21st century. A recent ICM poll suggested that three out of five women today believe that it is more difficult for them to attain an acceptable work-life balance than it was for their mothers 30 years ago. Obviously, there are a number of reasons for that, not least of which is that many more women are working now than 30 years ago. I welcome the progress that the Government have made on variable working hours, job shares and part-time working, but there is much more to be done. I also want to remind the Minister that flexible working is not sustainable without addressing the pensions issue. In the light of last week's Turner report, I hope that any future debate on pensions will take due cognizance of the pension rights of women and carers.

Any Bill that will provide extra flexibility in relation to the period for which women can take maternity leave and in relation to fathers taking paternity leave must be welcomed. Obviously, the way in which families have been viewed in the context of work has undergone a massive sea change in the past 40 years. Again, there are many reasons for that. All too slowly, but at least surely, women have gradually gained more rights in the world of work.

My older sister was born in 1955 in a hospital in Dundee—unfortunately, the hospital is no longer there. My father went to work as normal that day. When I was born 14 months later in a hospital in Glasgow, my father again regarded it as a normal working day—he had to—and went to work. Five years later, when my mother was again due to give birth, she decided, to coin a phrase, on a "home delivery", and my father had to take the day off work, because he had to look after my sister and me. While my father, Tommy, my sister, Carol, and I sat in the kitchen—we were living in what was known as a room and kitchen in Maryhill road, Glasgow—my mother, ably assisted by our GP, Dr. John Fitzsimmons, who, incidentally, was also the Celtic football club doctor at the time—[Interruption.] I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Devine) comments from a sedentary position that that explains a lot. [Laughter.] My mother, ably assisted by Dr. Fitzsimmons, gave birth to my younger sister Angela, and my father had to take the day off, but simply lost a day's wages.

The hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) said that in those days the man was expected to be the breadwinner, and the woman was expected to stay at home and look after the children. That was certainly how my father viewed it, and I am slightly ashamed to say that I do not think that his view has changed much since then. Obviously, however, as in most father-son relationships, we agree to differ on certain issues. I am glad that the days when women were regarded as going out to work for pin money are long gone. In most cases, women's work is now a requirement.

[Mr. McGovern]

There are many reasons why a man would want to take paternity leave, and evidence seems to suggest that many men take their annual leave in the first few months of a baby's life. Obviously, that is not just to get to know the baby but to support the mother. There is also evidence that at least 20 per cent. of women suffer some sort of post-natal depression, so I would regard it as the father's right to be with the mother and the child at that time, and I hope that that can be considered. I am not sure whether I made myself clear in intervening on my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in his introductory remarks. However, many contributions since then seemed to confirm what I was trying to say. If a father can take paternity leave only on the second sixth months of the first year of the child's life, and that is dependent on the mother returning to work, that puts undue pressure on the mother to return to work, perhaps earlier than she would otherwise wish. I hope that the issue will be clarified when the Front Bench spokespersons respond. If the mother were allowed to take her additional maternity leave for the second six months and the father were allowed to take paternity leave, that would be a better proposition. My preferred option is that, if they so choose, both parents should be allowed to take their maternity and paternity leave concurrently, during the first six months of the child's life. If we are legislating for choice, surely we should not deny both parents the choice to be with the new addition to the family in the earliest stages of its life.

Discrimination has been mentioned. The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff), who is no longer in his place, envisaged paternity leave being talked up to the same level as maternity leave, resulting in women no longer experiencing discrimination because they were of child-bearing age. I agree with the hon. Gentleman on that. I think that that is desirable, but I am not sure that he would agree with me. I do not think that that is the point that he was trying to make.

I welcome the provisions that deal with redundancy. Before being elected to this place, I was a full-time trade union official. I dealt with numerous instances of long-serving employees being denied equal redundancy packages because they were six months over the age of 64. Anything that would remove such blatantly unfair practices is welcome.

Mention has been made of the eight statutory public holidays being added to the minimum of 20 days' annual leave. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to re-examine that. Some employers do not recognise public holidays. Employees of such companies will find that the change in the legislation will mean nothing to them. Perhaps my hon. Friend will consider two options. We can move to 28 days' minimum annual leave or we can add eight public holidays as a legal entitlement to the 20 days of annual leave; otherwise, there will be a large loophole.

The hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) mentioned the CBI's desire to see extra days phased in over a period. As a former negotiator, I feel that if we closed the loophole on bank holidays, we could accommodate the CBI in phasing on the basis of two days each year.

I welcome the Bill. I ask right hon. and hon. Members to support it. I look forward to it being debated again early in the new year.

9.12 pm

Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): It is a great honour to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. McGovern), especially with his story of his father's management of the birth of his sister. Only recently, I had a discussion with my mother, who is 91. I talked about the birth of my younger sister and of overhearing my father saying to his employer over the telephone that he could not come into work because I had been misbehaving. He said that I had been behaving very badly following the birth of my younger sister. I told my mother that I had been shocked to hear that call. I had been given a wonderful present of some whimsies and I thought that I had been behaving well.

At 87, my mother told me rather belatedly, "Good grief, you were not behaving badly. It was just an excuse to get him off work because I needed him at home to look after you. We did not have all this leave in those days and your father had run out of his leave." For years, people had been lying to employers, managing employment situations and falsely creating impressions to manage family responsibilities. It is ludicrous that we lived in that world.

Last night, I watched Ian Hislop, who appeared in a programme about the way in which the role of women in society was changed by the great war, when they were needed to take on jobs and responsibilities because men were at the front. Years of suffrage had not secured women the vote. The experience of seeing how women rose to the challenge of the workplace led to suffrage being extended to women. That extension of suffrage changed British society. I see the Bill as being very much part of another great change that is taking place in British society. We need to recognise that parents and carers are critical to our future, and that as a society we should support them.

We heard from the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) that the Government were trying to force women into the workplace. There is an element of truth in what he said. We have a falling birth rate. We have a falling number of people in the pool of those available to work, because we have high levels of employment. We have an ageing society, and an increasing number of people need care and support. If we are to provide for those who want to work, those who need to work and those whose lifestyles have been limited by poverty, social isolation and caring responsibilities, we must engage in a new way of working. We must engage in a new relationship between society and working people, be they parents or carers of older people. We need to build into our work force regulation both flexibility and choice.

Last week I was in the Chamber debating the Childcare Bill, which recognised the importance of quality-based care for children, parents, employers and Government. Speaker after speaker acknowledged the importance of parents' spending time with their children in the early years. The Bill introduces a change in maternity and adoption pay, which will enable parents to remain at home for 39 weeks by April 2007. The goal of eventually providing a year's maternity leave is one that we should all embrace and welcome.

I ask the Minister, however, to consider a possible change. If we are to support the 61,000 people who adopt children each year, we must ensure that maternity pay and adoption pay are of equal value, recognising that the role that they play as parents is equally important. Statutory maternity pay is currently 90 per cent. of salary for the first six weeks, and £106 a week for the next 20 weeks. Statutory adoption pay is £106 a week for 26 weeks. I should like the first six weeks of statutory adoption pay to be 90 per cent. of salary, which would bring it into line with maternity pay and send adopters a clear message that their financial recognition as parents is equal, like their status in law.

I welcome the change that allows parents, particularly mothers, to return to work for training or appraisals while receiving maternity or adoption pay. For adopters in particular, a placement may be sudden. They and their employers must have time to adapt to their leave to take on child care responsibilities. That flexibility and choice is imperative for natural, birth parents and for adoptive parents.

I do not want to be seen as the Member of Parliament who always quotes from The Western Mail—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh, go on."] It is too late. Last week, The Western Mail—every Welsh Member's morning reading—reported that, according to the Equal Opportunities Commission in Wales, many women in Wales are still affected by poverty, isolation and exclusion. David Rosser, director of CBI Wales, admitted that women still dominate in child care responsibility, and that until men take equal caring responsibility in society, that will prove difficult to address. In 2005, we are still talking about women having a disproportionate experience of poverty, isolation and exclusion.

Paternity leave was the first step of both Government and society to move towards giving men equal caring responsibilities. I hope that we can introduce changes to make the two weeks' paternity leave more family friendly. Too many fathers are excluded from paternity leave because of the need to give 15 weeks' notice, which employers do not really need. Fathers can take paternity leave up to eight weeks after the birth. However, a father's support and care may be more appropriate later than eight weeks after the birth. The child may become ill. The mother may remain ill in hospital. As we all know, doting grandparents flock in after the birth. It may be more appropriate for the father to be around later on. Perhaps we could look at breaking down the two-week period into two separate one-week opportunities for a break. It would create no additional costs for employers, give employers and families greater flexibility and could be of far greater value to families.

In the Childcare Bill debate, I spoke of how families with children with disabilities are one of society's most disadvantaged groups, with 55 per cent. living in poverty, in serious debt and with both parents and children living in loneliness and social isolation. That picture of poverty and isolation can be extended to most people with caring responsibilities. I welcome the Bill's extension of the right to seek flexible working to all carers and adults. However, I believe that that right should be extended to cover all children until they have left school. As all parents know, children need the support of their parents at different stages of their lives. A child could be going through a period of illness, of difficulty at school or that most difficult of periods, adolescence, when they need a parent at home to give them the support and structure to guide them through that difficult process. If we do not have that flexibility, we are not building in the support that families, children and parents need.

There are 6 million carers in the United Kingdom, 3 million of whom are working, who will welcome the opportunity that the Bill provides to tackle the stress, social isolation and, for many, the poverty created by caring. The peak ages for becoming a carer are 45 to 64. Eighty per cent. of carers fall within that working age band. Their experience, skills—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady has had her 10 minutes.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): To finish the sentence of the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mrs. Moon), it is likely nowadays that someone may be a carer and a parent of young children at the same time. It is a serious matter that we must all recognise.

We welcome the intention of the Bill and we want it to work but we have, of course, some concerns about its detail. There are two points in particular. First, the Bill must be kept simple. If it leads to an explosion in red tape and bureaucracy and extra rules for businesses of all sizes and for employees as well as employers, it will not work because people will not have confidence in it. Secondly, we do not want the pendulum to swing so far that the Bill becomes counter-productive. As some of my hon. Friends have mentioned, it would be wrong if rights were created that required so much of employers, particularly small businesses, that they were unwilling to employ people who had family duties, particularly young women of child-bearing age. If that were to happen, and I hope that it does not, the Bill would backfire and it would not work. We want it to work. In everything I say, I want to ensure that the Bill is improved, so that those concerns are taken care of and the legislation will work.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) said earlier, the economic case for such a measure is proven. In today's work force, for the economy to work with maximum efficiency, it is absolutely necessary that every single person who is willing and able to work, and who has the experience and talent to do so, is able to use their abilities to their fullest extent.

Unusually, the Minister for Women and Equality, the hon. Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Meg Munn), is not here, although I am not surprised, given the burden of legislation that she has had to deal with in the past few weeks. I pay tribute to her for bringing to light a fascinating statistic, which I have mentioned several times in recent weeks in this Chamber and in Committees considering similar legislation. If all the women in the UK work force were working at the height of their capacity and to the best of their talents—instead of taking jobs of a lower standard because they want to work part-time; or taking a career break and subsequently being unable to slot in at their previous level—our gross domestic product would improve by 3 per cent. That is a stunning statistic: 3 per cent. of GDP is equal to our annual trade with Germany. That is an enormous sum and I am sure that the Chancellor would welcome such an improvement, given the awful figures that he was forced to announce to the House today. That said, I stress that we want this legislation to work.

The hon. Member for Bridgend made a very good point about people often having to tell white lies, let us say, in order to cope with a situation about which they should not have to tell lies. When I discovered last week that the Bill was to be given its Second Reading today and that I would have the great honour of winding up for the Opposition, I had to change some of my arrangements for this evening, which had included attending a very worthwhile charity event. I also had to change arrangements with my nanny, who looks after my small son. I told her this morning that unfortunately, I would be unable to go to the ball because I had to be here this evening, and she said, "Can't you just call in sick?" I had to explain that it does not work that way here, but at that point it occurred to me that, of course, that is what people have always done. People call in sick when in fact, if the employment arrangements were reasonable and flexible, there could be far more honesty, and both employer and employee could be above board about what is actually going on.

The hon. Member for Bridgend told a very good story about her father, but my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mr. Benyon) takes the prize in this regard. Just a few weeks ago, his wife gave birth to—a child. [Interruption.] My helpful hon. Friends tell me that it was a boy: my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury has a new son. Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (John Bercow), who had to explain to the Whips in rather difficult circumstances that he intended to take paternity leave, my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury simply fell over on his way out of the hospital and broke his leg. [Interruption.] I am inaccurate in that as well; apparently, he broke his foot, as my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) helpfully points out. The principle is that it should not be necessary for people to find excuses to be there for the first few weeks of their child's life, whether they are the mother or father.

We have had a constructive debate this evening. The hon. Member for Erewash (Liz Blackman) spoke passionately about carers and she was right to highlight the predicament of parents who have children who are in need of extra care but who may not be categorised as having special needs. They may still have extra needs that should be taken into consideration as far as their parents' employment is concerned. The hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb), who spoke on behalf of the Liberal Democrats, was right to talk of the need to get the work-life balance right. I hope that that term has not become jargon, because it is important. We are trying to achieve a reasonable balance and, for once, I did not disagree with everything that the spokesman for the Liberal Democrats said. We may have a constructive time in Committee.

The hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) is right about the business case. She made a good case that was similar to what my hon. Friends and I have said, so I do not understand why she claims that the Opposition are unsupportive of the Bill. We welcome these provisions. She has listened to a small number of my colleagues, but not to me. Nor has she listened to my hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride), who made a powerful speech. She understands these issues very well and she is right to have spent some time with her son this evening. We forgive her for not having been here for the whole of the debate, because that is what she was doing.

Miss Kirkbride: I am sure that my hon. Friend would like to know, as a good friend of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bracknell (Mr. Mackay), that before I got home, bath and tea had been provided, by someone who is not noted as a new man. Jimmy-jammies were on and it was straight to bed.

Mrs. Laing: I am amazed and gobsmacked. The Bill has already had an effect if it has made my right hon. Friend the Member for Bracknell (Mr. Mackay) deal with putting his son to bed. I am extremely impressed.

Peter Luff: I have to let my hon. Friend into a secret. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bracknell (Mr. Mackay) has already expressed his pleasure that the Trade and Industry Committee intends to visit India a week after his Committee goes elsewhere, so that he can look after the baby while his hon. Friend—in every sense of the word—the Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) is away. He is really becoming a new man.

Mrs. Laing: I am not sure that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bracknell will be pleased to be called a new man, but he is clearly becoming the perfect father, and we should all commend him for that.

Mr. Devine: Is it not silly to be talking about work-life balances when we are sitting here at half-past nine at night?

Mrs. Laing: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point, but each hon. Member has a different hour at which they want to be somewhere else. The fact that I want to be at a charity ball right now is not the point—[Interruption.] I am not used to playing Cinderella. The time that mattered most to me was 7 o'clock, just before my hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove left the Chamber having explained what she was going to do. I could not, of course, take that amount of time away from the debate, so I had to telephone my four-year-old son to say goodnight. As always, he asked me what I was doing and I said that I was about to make a speech at Big Ben—as he calls this place. He asked what the speech was about and I replied that it was about mummies having more time to spend with their children. He said, "Great, so you'll be able to come home and read my story then." That makes extremely well a point that others have made.

It annoys me that just because Conservative Members speak up for small businesses and analyse the economic effect of proposals such as these, some Labour Members suggest that we do not understand the needs of children and families as much as they do. We do.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): I am very much a new man. Indeed, it was my daughter Charlotte's ninth birthday today and I managed to get home to south Hertfordshire for 45 minutes at 4.30 pm to wish her a happy birthday, so I am in favour of the work-life balance.

Mrs. Laing: I am most impressed, although I will not encourage any more of my hon. Friends to display their new man credentials. The Bill has already had an effect.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan) made a powerful speech about carers. She is absolutely right and we should pay attention to her example. It is worth looking further at whether the right to request should be extended to all employees. It is difficult to work out where the line should be drawn. I make no commitment to the Minister about exactly what our position will be, but the matter is certainly worth considering.

Mr. Sutcliffe rose—

Mrs. Laing: I will of course give way to the Minister as long as he understands that my speech will go on longer due to interventions.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for giving me the opportunity to intervene. I am sorry that she has missed the ball, as she has mentioned twice.

The hon. Lady is making an important point about the extension of the right to request and the work-life balance, and I welcome what she says, but we have been told by Opposition Members about the role of business and the CBI, so is she committing her party to supporting an extension of the right to request, even though organisations such as the CBI are opposed to it?

Mrs. Laing: No. I am glad the Minister asked that question. I am not committing my party to anything; I was saying that it was worth looking at the point further. I am not ruling it out. It would be just as easy for me to say, "No, we absolutely rule it out", but we do not. The hon. Member for Cardiff, North made some important points and I hope that we shall have an opportunity to consider them further in Committee.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff) was right to stress the importance of the balance between employees and employers. He made the important point that just because discrimination against women is illegal does not mean that some employers will not find a way around the law. That is what lawyers are for, so I stress again the importance of keeping the legislation simple and balanced.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) put well the case for small businesses. It is vital that the Government respect their position. After all, most employees work for small businesses.

The hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Alison Seabeck) was right in what she said. I do not disagree with the detail of the contributions made by Labour Members. We are all trying to achieve the best from the Bill and I hope that we can go into it in more detail in Committee.

The hon. Member for Angus (Mr. Weir) raised an issue that the Government had not taken into consideration: surrogacy. I hope that we can amend the Bill in Committee to take account of what he said. It is right that a child born of a surrogate mother should be treated appropriately, not exactly in the same way as the child of a birth mother or an adopted child, but not left out of the provisions altogether.

The hon. Gentleman also addressed the issue of enforcement through tribunals. We do not want to encourage more litigation as a result of the Bill. It is much better to have reasonable, balanced law that need not be broken by either side.

The hon. Member for Burnley (Kitty Ussher) also speaks with authority, because she probably has the youngest child of any female Member.

Kitty Ussher: I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Derbyshire (Natascha Engel) had her child first.

Mrs. Laing: The hon. Lady speaks with authority on this matter because she has a very small baby, and it is quite understandable that she will not have time to discuss any matter with my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire because she cannot possibly have time while balancing her duties in the House and in her constituency with such a small baby.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) mentioned some vital aspects of the Bill. Parents' time with children is an essential part of helping to create and nurture children and therefore the next generation. Parents who have jobs are doing two jobs, especially the mothers of small children who also have a job outside the family, and we should respect that fact, but my hon. Friend is right: looking after a home and children is an important and extremely hard job. In my own humble opinion, it is the hardest job that there is, and I am glad that I do not have to do it full-time. We must respect women who choose to stay at home and look after their families. They must also have rights.

The hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. McGovern) gave us a very good historical canter around what used to happen. I am glad that we live in more enlightened times.

Much of the Bill is reliant on subsequent regulations that we have not yet seen. This is the third Bill in a month to which I have spoken from the Dispatch Box—I assume therefore that this must apply to many more—for which there has been a very short period, usually eight days, between the debate on Second Reading and the beginning of consideration in Committee and for which the Committee stage will be commenced too early and be rushed. We have had to examine Bills in Committee without the benefit of having the regulations before us. I hope that that will not happen with this Bill. It is hard to imagine why the Government are in such haste to push the Bill through. Another couple of weeks so that we could have the regulations in front of us to give the Bill proper consideration would have been much better.

In conclusion, we all want the Bill to work, so it must have flexibility and balance between employer and employee because we have jobs to talk about in the context that we have been discussing them this evening only if we have a successful economy, and we have a successful economy only if we have competitive businesses. So if anything in the Bill undermines the competitiveness of businesses, the Bill will backfire. I do not want that to happen; I want the business community and families to have confidence in the legislation that we have examined this evening. We want to examine the Bill further in Committee. We therefore want it to have a Second Reading. We will not oppose it this evening, but we look forward to improving it.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I have listened with great interest to the contributions of hon. Members from both sides of the House. We have heard contributions from the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb), my hon. Friends the Members for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) and for Cardiff, North (Julie Morgan), the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff), my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Ms Johnson), the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk), my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Alison Seabeck), the hon. Member for Angus (Mr. Weir), my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Kitty Ussher), the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone), my hon. Friends the Members for Dundee, West (Mr. McGovern) and for Bridgend (Mrs. Moon) and, latterly, the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing).

All hon. Members who have contributed to the debate understand what the Government are trying to achieve through the Bill. The Government have clearly set out their strategy in their three terms and they will develop it further in their fourth. Given the legacy of the previous Government, our first term was about getting people back into work. The second term was about fairness at work and getting the balance of fairness in the workplace right. The third term has been about the world of work.

All hon. Members who have spoken in the debate have said that the world of work has changed dramatically. This country faces demographic changes due to a reducing birth rate and the fact that people are, thankfully, living longer. We need to ensure that we get as many people back into work as possible. I was grateful and delighted that the Conservative Front-Bench spokesmen said that the business case had been made for the Bill because it is right and proper that that is the language in which we talk.

All hon. Members agree that every child deserves the best possible start in life. The Bill attempts to achieve that by providing more choice and flexibility for families when balancing work and caring responsibilities. However, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, the Bill includes measures to help employers to manage the administration of leave and pay and to plan ahead with greater confidence and certainty. It will enable better interaction between parents and employers, which was surely the point that the hon. Member for North Norfolk made when he said that it was important to get employers and employees to sit down together so that they can work through the needs of the business and their own needs, too.

That is the context of the different style of approach on employment relations in this country that the Government have tried to introduce. We have tried to move away from the adversarial times of the 1970s and 1980s and towards more consensus. We face global challenges and demographic changes. There is a need for employers to understand the needs of their employees because the labour market is tight, more people are in work than ever before and we have such a low level of unemployment. However, employees must also understand the needs of business because they can change due to globalisation. The business case for the Bill has been made and it is important that there is a new regime of understanding by both employers and employees.

We all know that enabling people with caring responsibilities to work means that the UK economy benefits and that employers can recruit from a wider talent pool and retain the people in whom they have invested. The Bill will not only result in more choice and flexibility for families, but help to achieve greater equality by enabling men to spend more time caring for their children and encouraging women back into the workplace.

Many people have put their credentials as new men or women on the table, so I will put my credentials on the table. I am a parent of three boys and I have three grandchildren—[HON. MEMBERS: "Surely not."] I know that it is hard to believe. I was thus a little taken aback when the hon. Member for Wellingborough said that Ministers do not understand the needs of youngsters and children and the requirements when bringing them up. I accept that some women make the choice to stay at home and bring up their children. Indeed, some men now want to stay at home to look after their children, especially in the first year of their lives. As the whole House has agreed, there is a benefit if people are with their children during those first 12 months.

The package is good news for working parents and employers. It represents a big step forward on giving children the best start in life and enabling all families to have genuine choices about how they balance their work and family caring responsibilities. The changes will support employers in recruiting and retaining the best people, thus keeping much needed skills and experience in the workplace. In February, we published the consultation document "Work and Families: Choice and Flexibility" and consulted widely on how to take forward the commitments set out in our 10-year child care strategy.

Miss Kirkbride: I hope that the Minister will address the point made by Conservative Members about flexibility and allowing women—or men, for that matter—to double up or increase the amount of money that they get a week by reducing the amount of time that they take off work. Will the Government consider that proposal?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I hope to come on to that point later in my speech. However, we do not accept that the proposal that the Tories put forward at the last election would have been of any benefit to either employees or employers.

We consulted widely on choice and flexibility. Our aim was to establish and maintain a balanced framework of rights and responsibilities for both employers and employees. As well as providing more choice for employees, we are introducing measures to ease administration burdens for business in line with the Government's better regulation agenda.

The majority of the costs fall to the Government, as the Treasury reimburses business for statutory maternity, adoption or paternity pay at 92 per cent. for large businesses and 104.5 per cent. for smaller businesses. That is worth around £390 million a year.

The net cost to business of the package is small once we take into account the savings and the increased productivity as a result of the measures. It will be about £40 million to £90 million in year 1 and £35 million to £70 million in year 2.

Throughout the consultation, we considered how we could help business to offset administrative burdens in line with the Government's better regulation agenda. We set up an external advisory group, made up of people with human resources expertise, to examine how to ease the compliance for employers. As a result of the Bill and subsequent regulations, the notice that mothers must give to their employers when changing the date of their return from maternity leave will be doubled from four weeks to eight weeks, and statutory maternity pay will start on the same day as maternity leave and be calculated on a daily basis, if that suits employers, to ease administration and align payments with employers' usual business practice.

Women will be able to come into work for a few days during their maternity leave without losing a week's statutory pay and can end their leave early if that is what they and their employer want. That will help them to keep in touch and to ease their return to work. Again, many hon. Members accepted that. It will be explicit in the maternity leave regulations that employers may make reasonable contact during maternity leave. We will improve the guidance provided to employers and employees.

Norman Lamb: The Minister mentions regulations. I am sure that he is about to get to it, but will he confirm precisely which of the regulations will be subject to the affirmative process rather than the alternative?

Mr. Sutcliffe: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will let me make my own speech and get to those points when I can.

We have had a great deal of dialogue on the Bill. It is not a case of pulling something out of thin air. We consulted a range of stakeholders, including employers, both large and small. Only my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West mentioned the role of trade unions. It is important that we have full buy-in from both sides of industry in ensuring that the Bill's contents are supported.

The right hon. Member for Maidenhead broadly welcomed the Bill, as did the hon. Member for Epping Forest. However, actions speak louder than words. The hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) said that had there been a Conservative Government in 1997, they would have eventually got around to measures on work and families.

The Secretary of State for Health (Ms Patricia Hewitt): Eighteen years was too soon for that.

Mr. Sutcliffe: It took the Conservatives a long time to get anywhere, and they did not get to the stage of benefiting working people.

We have ensured that there is the opportunity for broad consensus on the measures because of the change in economic circumstances and the need to get people back into work, if that is what they want to do. The right hon. Member for Maidenhead said that we should have put the provisions alongside the measures in the Childcare Bill that has come from the Department for Education and Skills. She will know that the scope of the Bills is different. The Opposition would have attacked us for not taking into account the interests of business had we put them together. She will understand why there is a separate Bill and why we need to look at it in detail.

The Bill sets out minimum standards. The reality is that most good employers already see the business case for ensuring that their employees are well treated and that they retain employment. Surely the Government's role is to set out a series of minimum standards so that people do not fall below what is expected.

My hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Liz Blackman) was grateful for the Government's work on the role and value of carers. She raised a particular issue on the definition of carers. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, we will consider that in great detail and ensure that we listen to hon. Members on both sides of the House and to the various bodies that need to give us their view on what the definition should be. We need to balance the responsibilities and rights of employers and employees.

The point was made that some employers will not employ women of childbearing age. That is a disgrace. We need to highlight the bad business sense of doing that and ensure that people know that it is illegal to discriminate in that way.

My hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North welcomed the Bill and asked whether the bank holiday entitlement would be paid. Our manifesto commitment was that bank holidays should be an additional, paid entitlement. She also asked us to consider what should happen in the tragic cases in which the mother dies after childbirth. I shall do that and I shall be interested to hear what my hon. Friend and others have to say about what we can do in such circumstances.

Unusually, the hon. Member for Bromsgrove welcomed the Government's progressive policies on work and families, but she asked for more flexibility in maternity leave. She explained the role of management and middle managers, who have to understand the need for maternity leave and for good employment practices to ensure that people are looked after. She asked about the changes to employment law relating to a replacement employee who might be in place for up to 12 months. She said that that person would get employment rights and asked what their situation would be. Clearly, a contract would be entered into at the outset of the replacement explaining the reasons for that period of employment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North also asked about the definition of carers. She gave a moving account of how she cares for her 94-year-old mother, with the help of an army of carers, mainly women. She made an important point about the way in which caring responsibilities affect carers' ability to advance their careers, or to obtain employment in the first place. She acknowledged the success of the Employment Act 2002, but also raised important issues relating to sleep deprivation and other factors that affect the work-life balance.

The Chairman of the Trade and Industry Committee, the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire, spoke of his experience as the son of a single mother, commonly known as a latch-key kid. He emphasised the balance that we have to strike between the role of the employer and the role of the employee. He read out a list of things that he said are contributing to a lack of competitiveness in the job market by cumulatively putting a burden on business. The most notable item on that list was the national minimum wage, although he repented of having voted against the National Minimum Wage Act 1998. Good businesses want to ensure that they are not at a disadvantage compared with bad or rogue employers, and our debate has focused on what good employers should do and on ensuring that they are not disadvantaged because poor employers do not do those things. That is why the legislation is important.

The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford was scathing about the fact that the Government have not taken into account the costs of the Bill. He wants us to delay its implementation, but that is not appropriate. We have tried to ensure that the costs are reflected in the regulatory impact assessment and I am sure that the details will be examined in Committee.

A range of detailed issues have been raised this evening, and in the time allowed I cannot answer all of them. However, as is my wont, I shall write to hon. Members on those detailed issues. I know from previous experience that we will have the opportunity to discuss them in Committee. The good thing about tonight is that we have had the opportunity to discuss the Bill in the round. I commend it to the House.

Health Services (West Cumbria)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Tony Cunningham.]

10.1 pm

Mr. Jamie Reed (Copeland) (Lab): A preponderance of health-related issues and debates is raised at this time of year, and I am sure that that will be especially true if the forecasts of a harsh winter are even remotely accurate. The issues that I wish to raise are, sadly for west Cumbria, neither seasonal nor unusual, but endemic to the area. As one of the youngest Members in the House and as someone with the privilege of representing the constituency in which I was born and raised, I know that they have been a problem for 20 years. Stability in the west and north Cumbrian health economy is desperately needed, as two decades of uncertainty and anxiety have eroded the morale of staff and the confidence of patients throughout the area. That must change.

West Cumbria consists of approximately 150,000 people who are dispersed in towns and villages covering a huge geographical area that is served by a poor road infrastructure. Car ownership is in the lowest bracket in the country, and public transport is woefully inadequate. As a result, urban towns and rural villages, although often technically close to one another are isolated by the difficulties associated with the communications infrastructure. As regards health services, west Cumbria is covered by the West Cumbria primary care trust, the North Cumbria acute hospitals NHS trust and mental health and ambulance trusts established in the same area. All those trusts recently informed the public that they must fundamentally examine the way in which services in west Cumbria are delivered.

The PCT did so on 18 November, when it circulated to some staff, but not all, proposals for changing services in west Cumbria, including the closure of all beds in community hospitals in Millom, Keswick, Workington, Maryport and Cockermouth. The community hospital in Workington is brand new, and was opened by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Tony Cunningham) about a year ago following new investment of £12 million. The proposals were sent to staff in the PCT, and an accompanying press release was sent to the media. Neither my hon. Friend nor I was notified, and we still await official notification. In the absence of that basic courtesy, I have relied on members of the PCT who have sent me anonymous copies of the proposals, and the reporting of the local and regional media. That is a scandal, which I utterly condemn.

Most importantly, given the difficulties posed by geography, the sparsity of population, low car ownership, poor public transport and an ageing population, the proposals to remove hospital beds from west Cumbrian communities were a disgrace. Moreover, they were made at a time when the NHS, both nationally and in north and west Cumbria, has received record levels of investment. It is not an exaggeration to say that our local health service has more money than it has ever had, and has received record injections of investment since 1997.

To avoid accusations of politicking, in preparation for our debate my office asked the House of Commons Library—an independent, non-partisan resource—to provide figures for investment in the West Cumbria PCT and its predecessor since the Government were elected in 1997. I was delighted to find that allocations for west Cumbria have increased by 96 per cent. over that period—effectively, they have doubled.

My hon. Friend the Member for Workington and I began working for the withdrawal of those proposals as soon as we learned about them, and in doing so brought the matter to the attention of Health Ministers, including the Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Byrne), who is present tonight. There are a number of reasons why Health Ministers were as aghast as me. First, the proposals make no sense given the record funding since 1997.

Secondly, the proposals do not reflect our manifesto pledge, which we made in May this year, to "develop a new generation of modern NHS community hospitals ... These state of the art centres will provide diagnostics, day surgery and outpatients facilities closer to where people live and work."

Thirdly, the proposals are entirely contrary to the very precise thrust of health policy in this country. The forthcoming White Paper will outline the details in the spring, but let us be clear about the policy direction. The Secretary of State for Health recently told a meeting of the NHS Alliance that "we need to focus on primary health and community services—where 90 per cent. of people's contacts with the NHS take place".

In a truly refreshing and insightful address, my right hon. Friend also told the same audience that from the consultation undertaken by the Department of Health, it is clear that people "want more care and treatment closer to home, in community hospitals or health centres—although we have to become much smarter at engaging people at an early stage in designing and considering options that involve fewer beds and other changes to acute hospitals alongside better services in the community."

That point is particularly telling, because the PCT consultation in west Cumbria was also launched against the background of what is likely to lead to a new acute hospital for west Cumbria. Like any new hospital in the UK, it would be smaller in size—I stress that services should not be diminished—which is right for the model of health care that is being progressed through not only national policy but, more importantly, through the advocacy of patients and health care professionals.

In short, any new acute hospital in west Cumbria—or a comprehensive refurbishment of the existing hospital, for that matter—will rely on a network of fully functioning, fit-for-purpose community hospitals. Consequently, those proposals threatened not only the community hospitals themselves, but the delivery of a new acute hospital by a separate trust—a quite incredible state of affairs. Will the Minister consider whether the community hospitals are in the wrong trust? Perhaps the acute hospital trust would be a better place from which to run community hospitals throughout west Cumbria, which is an idea that certainly makes sense to me.

The acute hospital in west Cumbria, the West Cumberland hospital, which is in my constituency, is an issue to which I hope to return at a later date, but for now I inform the House and the Minister that any new hospital must be of an equal status to the other acute hospital maintained by the same health care trust in Carlisle, in order not only to achieve social justice in the provision of health services in west Cumbria, but to deliver equality of access and equal standards of health care throughout north and west Cumbria.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Reed: If the hon. Gentleman does not mind, I want to get on. If he has any telling or pressing points, we can discuss them outside the House or he can write to me.

I urge the Minister and his Department to pay close attention over the coming months to this unfolding issue and, in particular, to the principles that I have outlined: equity of access and of standards. At this point, I ask the Minister to assess the funding formula for the NHS within the forthcoming White Paper and ensure that issues such as socio-economic factors and sparsity of population are addressed.

Returning to the PCT, only this Friday I met clinical staff at Millom community hospital and the friends of Millom hospital to discuss the PCT's proposals. I expected anger, anxiety and dejection among those whom I was to meet, but I must extend to the Minister their sincere thanks and appreciation following his intervention. Like me and my hon. Friend the Member for Workington, the staff, friends and users of Millom hospital were delighted to learn about the Minister's intervention and are now hopeful for the future, given the plan that he has identified. The people of Keswick, Maryport, Cockermouth and Workington are also equally grateful.

The Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but the plan states that West Cumbria PCT is in line for a record cash boost over the next two years totalling more than £30 million, which is nearly twice this year's underlying deficit. Local health chiefs must spend that money wisely following a much needed detailed debate and consultation on how to redesign services for the better. Over the next three months, the consultation in west Cumbria, which, as I understand it, will be undertaken by the strategic health authority rather than the PCT, will explain how the existing infrastructure of community facilities will be expanded. The Minister will visit west Cumbria in the new year to ensure that all of the above takes place.

As a result, the PCT's proposals have, as I had hoped, been withdrawn. Let me assure the Minister that at no point did anyone believe that those proposals belonged to the Government. There is widespread acknowledgement of the fact that Labour is the only party with the interests of the NHS at heart. The Minister might be interested to learn that in my constituency at the last general election the Conservatives campaigned on a platform of reduced health spending and health service privatisation, and received their worst result for almost 100 years. The persistent and continual Conservative threat to the health services of west Cumbria rightly led to the Tories in Copeland receiving the lowest number of votes since the NHS was introduced. That damning condemnation of the Tories' health policy, and attitude, shows precisely how the people of Copeland and west Cumbria value their health services. I can put it no better than a farmer constituent who told me at the weekend that he would rather let a fox look after his chickens than let the Tories look after the NHS.

Two groups are central to any consultation and redesign of services in west Cumbria—patients and staff. Patients are not slow in coming forward with their views. Civic engagement is evidently lacking in several policy areas, but health is not one of them. However, sufficient consideration needs to be given to the views, hopes, concerns and often wise and insightful suggestions of front-line service providers in west Cumbria. Having spoken to a good number of health care professionals from across a broad spectrum of services and professional standing, I know that all too often they do not feel that their knowledge and experience is valued, or even considered relevant, when management boards launch consultations. I urge the Minister to ensure that the new consultation in west Cumbria pays sufficient attention and proper regard to the views of health care professionals, who will after all deliver the model of care that is agreed on.

West Cumbria PCT, against a background of record investment, is projecting a recurring deficit for next year of approximately £15 million. It is absolutely right that all trusts should be expected to balance their books. However, the fundamental question that lies at the heart of this debate is this: where has the money gone? I know that the Minister is as keen as me and my hon. Friend the Member for Workington to find the answer, and I hope that he can help us in that endeavour, particularly in the light of the effective doubling of investment since 1997. It is clear that the various trust boards serving west Cumbria are not working together. West Cumbria cannot sustain a viable health economy on that basis. I therefore ask for the Minister's help in achieving this for the benefit of all its health service staff and patients.

One of the most pressing medical issues in west Cumbria is its lack of dentists. I appreciate that that does not fall within the Minister's brief and is the responsibility of the Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), but it is entirely relevant to the scope of this debate. I was recently honoured to welcome the university of Central Lancashire to the Westlakes science park in my constituency, where the university has established a significant permanent presence. UCLan has an excellent academic and medical research record. On the strength of that, I approached the vice-chancellor and the dean of the Westlakes campus to discuss the possibility of the university's helping to expand dentistry provision throughout west Cumbria. I am pleased to say that it has, as part of a higher education consortium involving Lancaster university, the university of Liverpool and St. Martin's college, submitted a bid to the Department of Health, which if successful would see a dental school established in west Cumbria.

This week, my hon. Friend the Member for Workington and I will write officially to the appropriate Minister to express our support for the bid and to outline precisely the direct and exponential benefits that such a development would have in west Cumbria with regard not only to dental provision but to the wider health service agenda. I hope that the Minister will urge his departmental colleagues to give due detailed consideration to the bid.

I thank the Minister for the close personal attention and effort that he has given to this issue. I look forward to meeting him in west Cumbria in the new year, when I hope that we can progress the agenda of improving the health services serving west Cumbria in a sustainable, effective and permanent manner, while serving the needs and aspirations of patients and staff.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): I sincerely congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Mr. Reed) on securing this debate. He has not been in this House for long, but he has already established himself as a powerful advocate for his local community and as a voice on health issues in particular. It was in one of my first debates as a Front Bencher that I heard his contribution to the debate about dentistry. If he will forgive me, I will pass on the comments that he made this evening to the Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton).

My hon. Friend has come to the House tonight to ensure that health care provision in his constituency is debated on the Floor. In congratulating him, I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Tony Cunningham). His position on the Front Bench precludes his contributing to the debate, but he has contacted me on five or six occasions in the past week to give me counsel about how best to tackle the issue in his community. I should like to put on record my thanks to him for that. I also congratulate the Evening Mail and the Workington Times and Star on their excellent coverage of the debate. They have proved once again that they are a powerful voice for their local community.

In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland, I want to elucidate three lines of debate. The first is about the future finances for health care in his constituency. The second deals with the sort of health care provision that we might expect for that money over the next few years. The third is the manner and method whereby decisions about the future of health care will be made.

I should like to begin with a few words of thanks and praise for the front-line national health service staff in my hon. Friend's area who have seized the record investment and reform of the past few years to transform the health service locally. I was glad that he could celebrate their role so eloquently this evening.

The transformation of the NHS in my hon. Friend's constituency has been remarkable. Our funding for the NHS has been at great and record levels in the past few years. From £34.7 billion in 1997, we have increased spending by nearly £70 billion in 2004–05. What does that mean for my hon. Friend? He partly answered that question himself. In this financial year, West Cumbria primary care trust will get £145 million—a real-terms increase of nearly 6 per cent. in the past year.

If we compare such increases with those that we enjoyed—if that is the right word—under the previous Administration, we realise that, in their last five years, the average real-terms increase for the NHS was only 2.6 per cent. Indeed, in their entire 18 years in office, it was only 3 per cent.

My hon. Friend asked where the increased funding has gone. I am glad to be able to provide some answers. More than 150 consultants have worked in Cumbria and Lancashire strategic health authority area, in which his constituency sits, since 1997. More than 3,000 nurses and more than 1,800 health care assistants now work there, thanks to the investment that we have made since 1997.

With the extra staff come shorter waits. The number of people in Cumbria and Lancashire who wait more than six months for in-patient treatment has dropped by an extraordinary 90 per cent. since 1997. The number of people who wait 13 weeks for an out-patient appointment has dropped by more than 85 per cent. since 1998.

With shorter waits come better drugs, which, with the extra staff, have delivered longer lives. The mortality rate in west Cumbria from coronary heart disease has fallen by around 29 per cent.—an extraordinary fall. Cancer mortality rates are down by more than 9 per cent. since 1997. Good progress has been made but a great deal more remains to do. That is why extra investment is being routed to my hon. Friend's constituency.

My first line of argument is therefore about the increased resources to my hon. Friend's constituency. Funding in his PCT has increased from £112 million to £145 million. It is set to rise again from £145 million to £188 million in 2007-08. My maths makes that an increase of approximately £43 million. The underlying deficit at the beginning of the year was around £17 million; the increase over the next two years is more than two and a half times the current deficit.

I am glad that my hon. Friend mentioned the funding formula. He pointed out that it still contains a few imperfections in his constituency. He referred to socio-economic conditions and sparsity. It is right to review the formula again. I cannot promise answers in the forthcoming White Paper, but my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health will introduce amendments in due course. Great investment has therefore been made.

My second line of argument is about what the money should buy in my hon. Friend's constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Workington. Here we can see an extraordinary choice for the NHS over the next couple of years, in regard to how to use the new money to build local health services that meet the needs of constituents in a sustainable way. I would say to my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland that £45 million will buy some quite interesting choices, including how much to invest in hospitals, local doctors' services and community hospitals, and how much to spend on public health. Such choices have not been enjoyed by many NHS staff for some years.

My hon. Friend helpfully alluded to our manifesto commitment to deliver a new generation of community hospitals. We made a commitment to bring on line 50 new or refurbished hospitals over the next five years. These state-of-the-art centres will provide diagnostics, day surgery and out-patient facilities that are much closer to where people live and work. We made that commitment because we were aware of the great potential of community hospitals to enhance the delivery of health care for local people.

The new community hospitals will help us to move care and diagnostic services out of acute hospitals. They will also make it easier to put together primary and social care services, and encourage GPs to provide more specialist services. Modern community hospitals will provide safe services for people much closer to where they live, which is central to our vision for the NHS.

It is important, however, that these services should be provided in a sustainable way. My hon. Friend talked about the decades of uncertainty in his constituency; we must end that uncertainty. In May, the British people asked us to write a big cheque, but not a blank cheque, for the future of NHS reform. As we deliver care closer to people's homes and reduce the reliance on in-patient services, we must do so in a way that will stand us in good stead for the future.

The primary care trusts are planning to consult on proposals for changing the shape of community services, with the aim of delivering services such as an improved community nursing infrastructure that is better able to support people at home and will therefore avoid the trauma and cost of inappropriate hospital admissions. We hope that that infrastructure will make it easier to discharge patients following a hospital stay. We also want the services to include therapy units to provide multi-disciplinary assessment and centre-based therapy. This is all about putting care much closer to people's homes. My hon. Friend mentioned the role of acute hospitals in the future, and I hope that that issue will be reflected on in the consultation.

My third line of argument relates to the manner in which these decisions will be debated and, ultimately, made. In the months to come, the primary care trust will be seeking to understand how to take forward services in my hon. Friend's area. Its proposals will be judged against three simple criteria. First, are they safe, and will they improve patient care? Secondly, are they affordable in the short term, inside the envelope of the enlarged resources that we are making available? Thirdly, are they sustainable for the long term? I am pleased to say that the focus of the reshaped services will be on recycling community assets wherever practical.

I would add that, while health organisations must determine the broad strategies and face the challenges of matching the extra resources that we are providing to the provision of local services, it is essential that, as they go about answering those questions, they do not overlook the perspective of local service users. It is therefore intended that any proposals for change in community services in Cumbria will go to public consultation in the new year.

My hon. Friend alluded to the public listening exercises that we have undertaken as we have prepared the White Paper, "Your Health, Your Care, Your Say". Members of the public have been asked what improvements they wish to see in community health and social care. In the new year we will present our plans for reforming the way in which local health organisations are accountable to their local communities for shaping services, so that, we hope, these debates will have a different texture and tone in future.

Clearly, however—this is an important point for my hon. Friends—the debate on the outcome of the Cumbria consultation will have to include an analysis against recommendations included in the White Paper.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland is concerned about emerging proposals in the public consultation. I am glad to be able to tell him that in order to review those options properly, and in the light of our ongoing work in the new health White Paper, the launch of the consultation has now been moved to late January or February of next year.

It is unacceptable for my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland to have had so little involvement in the development of plans to date. It is not acceptable that he is briefed about plans only through friends and colleagues whom he might have in the primary care trust. I therefore assure him that there will be no fait accomplis, cabals or decisions made behind closed doors. The national health service is under statutory obligations in relation to the way that it runs consultation and its conversation with the public. I am therefore pleased that the director of corporate affairs at the strategic health authority, who is extremely experienced in consultation exercises, will support the primary care trust during the process over the coming weeks and months. I will take a watching brief on the development of the proposals, and I understand that before the document goes for public consultation it will be shared with my hon. Friends the Members for Copeland and for Workington. I plan to make a visit in the new year to see how the consultation is unfolding locally.

I encourage my hon. Friends to continue to battle the corner for their constituents, and to engage with their local NHS on the way forward. Some decisions will need to be thought through carefully, but I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland and his constituents will take the opportunity of the consultation exercise to make sure that their views and ambitions for the future are fully reflected in the blueprint that emerges.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

DEPARTMENT FOR TRANSPORT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Rail Services

1. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): If he will make a statement on rail passenger services in north-west Leicestershire. [34460]

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): The north-west of the county is currently served by rail services operated by the Central Trains and Midland Mainline franchises. In October, we announced a new structure of rail franchises, to be implemented following the expiry of the current franchises. Services will then be provided by a new unified East Midlands franchise.

David Taylor: The Burton-upon-Trent to Leicester route, including the third oldest rail line in England, runs through the heart of the national forest, crosses three counties, links two regions and serves Ashby-de-la-Zouch and Coalville in my constituency. Since Beeching killed off passenger services, our area has been transformed economically, socially and environmentally and there is huge support for the return of passenger rail services. Will the Minister indicate how a local community can proceed in the light of the fact that the county council's support has cooled dramatically since political control changed in 2001? Perhaps he could include me in the consultation on the successor franchise to which he has referred.

Dr. Ladyman: I am happy to commit to ensuring that my hon. Friend and other local MPs are included in the consultation on the new franchise. There are two routes by which a case can be made to return services to that line. One is to go back to the local council and convince it to include it in the local transport plan. The other is to have it included as a priced option when the franchise is let in a couple of years. The local community needs to proceed on either basis.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Midland Mainline, which runs through Leicestershire, also runs through Wellingborough. Is the Minister aware of the concern that it has put back the time the last train returns from London? It now leaves at 11.15 pm, which makes it difficult for people to come to London, for example, to see a show and get back to Wellingborough or Leicestershire. Will he use his good offices to encourage Midland Mainline to change its view?

Dr. Ladyman: We will certainly relay the hon. Gentleman's views to the operator, but I understand that the changes were made in response to passenger loading.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): I join my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) in wanting to see passenger services extended in north-west Leicestershire, as we achieved for the service from Leicester to Loughborough. Is the Minister aware that the future of the Ivanhoe line, which is part of the package to which my hon. Friend referred, will be in danger if Leicester city council, which has also changed political control, decides to withdraw its £400,000 subsidy to that service? Is not that a retrograde step when we are trying to increase passenger use, particularly on local trains and local runs, to reduce congestion both in Loughborough and in Leicester?

Dr. Ladyman: My understanding is that the city council has decided to withdraw its funding from the scheme, which I am sure local people will take into account when the council comes up for re-election. Continued support for the line now depends on the view of the county. We are still waiting to hear whether it wishes to continue to support that line.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Trains to Leicestershire on Midland Mainline run through Kettering. Is the Minister aware of the huge housing expansion planned for Northamptonshire up to 2021, and will he ensure that the next franchise for the area covered by Midland Mainline and Central Trains takes into account the future population increases for both Leicestershire and Northamptonshire?

Dr. Ladyman: The Central Trains franchise is changing anyway. Whenever franchises change and are re-let, there is widespread consultation and the franchise process takes into account issues such as further expansion in the area. Again, it will be for the hon. Gentleman to make representations to ensure that those matters are covered when that happens.

Regional Transport Forums

2. Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): If he will make a statement on the work of the regional transport forums. [34461]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Ms Karen Buck): In introducing regional funding allocations for transport, housing and economic development, we asked regions to provide us with advice by January 2006 on their regional priorities. We are aware that some regions have elected to establish regional transport forums to assist their work, but the structure and tasks assigned to such bodies is a matter for individual regions to decide.

Dr. Pugh: I thank the Minister for her answer. In just a few weeks, the regional transport boards, controlled by the Government offices, will submit what are virtually 10-year regional transport plans, prioritise millions of pounds of expenditure, disappoint many, but affect every community, business and council, with minimal consultation and limited democratic debate and feedback. Is such haste wise or necessary, and will not it produce divisive or poor outcomes?

Ms Buck: I am sorry to hear from the hon. Gentleman that he is not happy with the consultation. We took the decision not to impose a particular model of consultation on the regions, but as this is likely to be the way of the future it is important that regions make the best use of their consultation options, whether with businesses or communities. When we come to consider the plans again next spring, we will examine the matter carefully. We will want to see that they have demonstrated robust consultation processes.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Will the Minister ensure when cross-examining those regional bodies that they have come forward with projects that can tackle, at the least cost and in the best way, the underlying problem of shortage of capacity of all kinds in our transport system? I would rather she were consulting elected local government but, given that she is going to do it in that way, will she ensure that those bodies are asked the right questions and come forward with bottleneck-reducing schemes, particularly ones that can be privately financed?

Ms Buck: That is absolutely central to what those forums should be doing. We are asking them not just to look at their transport priorities—it will indeed be a question of setting priorities; there is never enough money to cover everything that everyone wants to achieve—but for the first time in this process to balance transport investment with housing and economic development, rather than taking investment decisions in silos, as they have done in the past. This is the first time that we have taken such an approach, but it is the future and I expect it to be built on as the years go by.

Road Humps

3. John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): When he expects to reissue guidance on the use of road humps. [34462]

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): The Department for Transport is developing a local transport note on traffic calming, and updating its code of practice on consultation with emergency services when traffic calming measures are proposed. Both documents will include references to road humps and are planned for publication early next year.

John Mann: I am delighted that new guidance is coming out, but will the Minister ensure that it deals with motorbikes' ability to go through the middle of concrete cushion road humps, on-street parking on such humps and whether emergency service vehicles such as the Nottinghamshire fire engine can straddle them?

Dr. Ladyman: I can certainly reassure the House that those issues will be taken into consideration when we prepare the guidance because my hon. Friend has been invited to be a consultee in that process, and he has doubtless made these very valuable points to the team putting the guidance together. I should point out, however, that no one set of traffic calming measures is right in every location; some will work and some will not, depending on the particular circumstances. It is important that local highways engineers make local decisions and pick the right traffic calming measure for the local area.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): I agree with the Minister that such decisions should be up to local engineers. Is he aware, however, that although some traffic calming schemes in my constituency have been a great success, other sets of road humps have been a failure and have given rise to collateral damage such as property subsidence? What advice can he give to local residents who have had problems with property subsidence and who want those road humps if not removed, then at least reconfigured?

Dr. Ladyman: The only advice that I can give is for the hon. Gentleman to work with local highways authorities to ensure that they get feedback on these matters and that the collateral damage, as he describes it, is known to them. It is perfectly possible for authorities to redesign an area once traffic calming has been shown not to work; that has happened in my constituency and it doubtless happens in many others. People such as the hon. Gentleman can campaign to ensure that local highways authorities remove such traffic calming measures if they are not working.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): May I commend the Department for Transport on supporting English Heritage and the Campaign to Protect Rural England in their efforts to improve streetscape and the design of traffic calming measures such as road humps? In particular, I commend the document entitled "Streets for All." Streetscape is a very important environmental issue, but the trouble is that the Department's good intentions in encouraging better design and reducing street clutter never get followed through because there is no funding incentive. Moreover, the Audit Commission and the local government ombudsman say that this issue has nothing to do with them. What financial incentives, along with guidance, is the Minister prepared to instigate so that councils throughout the country will try to improve our streetscape environment—speed humps, street clutter and everything else—and not just let things deteriorate, as they are currently doing?

Dr. Ladyman: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support for the Department's initiatives and I agree that streetscape is important. We should try to reduce clutter wherever possible, and when doing so ensure that that is compatible with road safety, which, as he will doubtless agree, has to be the No. 1 priority. There may well not be the financial incentives that he is looking for, but there are plenty of other incentives to encourage local authorities to act, not least of which is the local electoral process. If local authorities are not being responsive to this matter, they will not get re-elected.

Concessionary Fares

4. Mr. Stephen Hepburn (Jarrow) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the introduction of the concessionary bus fare scheme. [34463]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Ms Karen Buck): Free off-peak local bus travel in England for people aged 60 and over and disabled people will come into effect on 1 April 2006. The necessary order was laid in Parliament on 28 November. The Government are providing an extra £350 million in revenue support grant for 2006–07, which will be sufficient to fund the cost to local authorities.

Mr. Hepburn: My hon. Friend will know that the metro makes up a substantial part of the transport system in Tyne and Wear and is used by thousands of pensioners. While I welcome the news of extra finance, there will still be a substantial deficit in Tyne and Wear after the provision of free travel for pensioners. Will she review that decision?

Ms Buck: I am conscious of the representations that Nexus has made on that issue. The £350 million provided by the Chancellor is to fund free off-peak bus travel and is a generous boost to bus travel. It is up to local authorities to make the decision to make any additional provision for other transport modes or to extend the scheme in other ways. I am afraid that I cannot give my hon. Friend any assurance in the short term that there will be any extension of the scheme.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): Welcome though the scheme is, one problem in areas such as mine is that many constituents wish to travel to towns, to shop or visit friends, across district and national boundaries, and that limits the benefit of the scheme. The local authority, although it may wish to extend the scheme, may simply not have the resources. What help can the Minister provide?

Ms Buck: The idea of a fully national concessionary scheme is attractive, but it would cost an extra £160 million. If the hon. Gentleman is saying that his party is committed to providing that extra sum, perhaps he could advise us of that. Transport competes for priority in public expenditure with other services and, at the moment, we are working on the £350 million investment in bus travel that I have mentioned.

Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that First South Yorkshire has implemented fare increases of more than 30 per cent. in the past year, leaving south Yorkshire with some of the highest fares in the country? South Yorkshire passenger transport executive has now informed us that First South Yorkshire is not willing to sign up to the previously agreed deal to fund the concessionary travel scheme. What advice can my hon. Friend offer South Yorkshire passenger transport executive to correct that unsatisfactory situation?

Ms Buck: I am aware that in these processes some robust negotiation usually takes place between bus companies and local authorities about the concessions. The Government are funding bus services overall by almost £1 billion and providing an additional boost of £350 million. Inevitably, service levels across the country will vary, but I hope that that investment will be welcomed on both sides of the House as a major step forward in providing concessionary transport to an important and vulnerable constituency.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): In constituencies such as mine, community transport run by charities—such as those in Bakewell and Eyam, Ashbourne and Amber Valley—provides a valuable and essential service for older people. What arrangements are being made for those services to benefit from the scheme?

Ms Buck: It is for local authorities to decide, according to their resources, whether to invest in other forms of transport, be that community transport schemes or token schemes, which can be more applicable to rural areas. Some local authorities, such as that of my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Jeff Ennis), already fund the concessionary scheme above the present level. Local authorities across the country are taking decisions to meet the needs of local communities in different ways, and they will have to decide how to use the money that was announced by my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government yesterday.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East and Wallsend) (Lab): It appears that insufficient funds have been allocated to district authorities in the county of Tyne and Wear and, therefore, to Nexus to cover even the off-peak concessionary pensioners bus fare. If that turns out to be the case, what action will my hon. Friend take to remedy the situation?

Ms Buck: I do not accept that the sum available will create that shortfall. The £350 million that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced is more than sufficient to ensure that full off-peak services are available across the whole country. It is always inevitable in the development of any formula that there is a risk that not every authority will be satisfied. We consulted the Local Government Association about the formula and amended it to weight it more heavily towards the uptake of concessionary transport, and in so doing we went a long way to meet the concerns of Nexus, which we appreciate has a particular problem.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): In the Budget, with typical hyperbole, the Chancellor promised free bus travel for every pensioner, so I was surprised when, a few weeks ago, I received a letter signed by the hon. Lady revealing that pensioners in rural areas such as mine, who need to travel outside their district to reach hospitals and other vital services, will be obliged to pay. She has confirmed that today in answer to questions from both sides of the House. She also said that people using dial-a-ride and community bus schemes may have to pay, too, unless local councils divert resources from other key priorities. She really must correct the Chancellor's claim, or apologise for her letter, withdraw it and think again. Is this free travel for every pensioner or is it free only if they do not travel where they need to go?

Ms Buck: I absolutely refute what the hon. Gentleman says. Since the announcement was made in the Budget, it has been clear that the concession extends and builds on the existing scheme, which is free off-peak travel for pensioners within their local authority area. That has never differed, and it has been raised on a number of occasions in the House and outside—it builds on the existing scheme. To create a national scheme would require primary legislation and, as I said earlier, an additional £160 million. I confirm to the hon. Gentleman that the concession that was announced builds on the provision that I have outlined.

Mr. Hayes: The Chancellor said:

"free local bus travel for every pensioner".—[Official Report, 16 March 2005; Vol. 432, c. 269.]

So now we know: another of the Chancellor's forecasts has been downgraded. Local councils fear that the Treasury's grant will not meet the extra demand on the buses and that yet again they will have to rob other budgets or raise council tax to bail out the Government.

The explanatory notes to the statutory instrument say that "there is no information on take-up rates or trips per week", among, for example, disabled people aged under 60 who are now entitled to concessionary travel. Is not it true that local government will be underfunded and bus operators will be reimbursed only once they have paid out, that pensioners and the disabled will not know where they are allowed to travel free of charge, and that the Government do not have a clue about the financial effects of the scheme? Hapless, helpless, hopeless.

Ms Buck: The hon. Gentleman should tell us what arrangements his party has made to extend the scheme. It is a very generous extension to concessionary transport and builds on the existing scheme, which is for local transport. That is consistent with the announcement that my right hon. Friend made at the time of the Budget. It is consistent with the form of words that we have used throughout. At present, local half-price transport on buses is available to pensioners and people with disabilities and we are putting in an extra £350 million to take that up to a full concession. That is absolutely consistent with everything that has already been said and I am confident that pensioners across the country will welcome the scheme.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): It is such a good idea that I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me for saying that it would be most unfortunate if it got off on the wrong foot. It is important that the Department takes charge of the various schemes and ensures that they run seamlessly together. Otherwise, we shall be in the extraordinary situation where a good scheme, needed by pensioners and benefiting so many people, will fall into disrepute simply because of incompetence over which the Government are not in control.

Ms Buck: I am afraid that I do not accept what my hon. Friend says. At present, we have a scheme that works well across the country and which we are topping up with an additional £350 million. I see no reason why the scheme as it will be implemented from next April will not work and will not provide, as it is intended and funded to do, a much more generous concessionary scheme for disabled people and for pensioners.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): Although I welcome the extra investment in concessionary fares, in my constituency, it will actually make things worse for pensioners. My constituency neighbours Tyne and Wear, and many of my constituents travel over the border into Tyne and Wear for their services. Under the scheme as outlined, which is based on district council boundaries, they will not get free travel; they will have to pay more to travel across the border.

Ms Buck: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention, but I honestly do not see how it could possibly make anything worse. At the moment, the half-price concessionary scheme extends to the local authority border. We are now making that a free concessionary scheme extending to the local authority border, so I see absolutely no reason why this is anything other than an additional generous contribution to concessionary travel.

Railway Stations

5. Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): What assessment he has made of the relative benefits of railway stations inside and outside towns; and if he will make a statement. [34464]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): There is no general preference between town centre and out-of-town locations. Instead, stations are planned on a case-by-case basis.

Martin Horwood: I thank the Minister for his reply, but I find it slightly curious. Given that nearly 20 per cent. of households in Gloucestershire have no car and given the decline in walking and cycling, which I am sure he would agree is damaging for our health and our environment, would he not agree with my constituent Jonathon Porritt, the chair of the Sustainable Development Commission, when he says that

"new railway stations must be accessible by foot and bike and should not encourage unnecessary car use", and that therefore any diversion of services from existing town stations such as Cheltenham Spa to new stations outside towns would be harmful to our health and our environment?

Mr. Darling: What I think the hon. Gentleman is getting at is that Gloucester county council has put forward a proposal to build an out-of-town railway station, and he is right to say that it serves broadly the same market as the one at Cheltenham. He may also be aware that the councillors have submitted an application for funding for that station. One of the things that the Department would want to know is whether it would take passengers or services away from Cheltenham, which would clearly be unsatisfactory. In addition to that, of course I agree that we want to make stations as accessible as possible.

Andrew Gwynne (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): Railway stations either in town or out of town are fine if the trains can get into them. Given the serious capacity problems in the central and south Manchester hub, what assessment has been made by my right hon. Friend's Department with a view to increasing the Network Rail capacity of the Manchester hub, particularly through to Manchester Piccadilly station?

Mr. Darling: As I said at the last Question Time, I am aware of the problems in relation to capacity at Manchester's Piccadilly station, particularly in relation to some of the train services. Network Rail is looking at those. Part of the problem is that we are dealing with a network in that part of Manchester that was essentially built by the Victorians and does not lend itself that easily to being expanded without quite major engineering works, but we want more people to use the trains—indeed, more people are using trains now than at any time since the second world war—and Network Rail is aware of that and is doing what it can to build on capacity.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that parkway stations that are on the hinterland of the town have a part to play in providing more capacity for rail lines, and will he ask the Strategic Rail Authority to look at a new parkway station for Canvey island that would get more passengers and put more capacity on to the c2c Fenchurch Street line?

Mr. Darling: I would write to the SRA except that I abolished it, so I do not actually think that a letter would achieve the purpose that the hon. Gentleman hopes to achieve. However, I certainly agree with him that out-of-town railway stations can play an important part in attracting people to drive there, leave their car and take the train for the rest of the journey. I said at the start that there is no predisposition in favour of one type of station or another; each one needs to be looked at on its merits, and anything that encourages people to use the train must be a good thing.

David Lepper (Brighton, Pavilion) (Lab/Co-op): One of the main issues raised with me at a meeting this weekend, organised by Brighton and Hove city council to mark the international year of the disabled, concerned problems of access to many of our older stations, such as Preston Park in my constituency, by people with disabilities. What discussions has the Department had with the train operating companies and others on the question of making our railway stations fully accessible to all those people who would like to use trains?

Mr. Darling: There have been many such discussions, and there is a programme to upgrade stations systematically over the next few years to make them more accessible. Again, to return to the point made a few moments ago by my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Andrew Gwynne), a lot of stations were built long before anyone had any sense that we had to ensure access for people with disabilities. That takes a lot of time and is quite expensive, but we are determined to do it, and Network Rail and the train operators have a programme to achieve just that.

Airport Expansion

6. Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): If he will make a statement on the Government's policy on airport expansion in the United Kingdom. [34465]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): The policy framework for developing airport capacity to 2030 was set out in the White Paper that we published in December 2003. Progress has been made on meeting the commitments in that White Paper in a number of ways, and we intend to report progress on developments by the end of next year, as we promised to do.

Mr. Randall: I thank the Secretary of State for his reply. Different Departments will give different emphasis to airport expansion, so I wonder whether he can tell me what discussions he and his Department have had, for example, with the Department of Trade and Industry and the Treasury about airport expansion. In particular, have they discussed the possible expansion of Heathrow with a third runway?

Mr. Darling: Yes, of course, those Departments have because the White Paper that was published two years ago was an expression of Government policy, and therefore represents the Government's collective view. It is patently obvious that both of those Departments—the Treasury, in particular—take a great interest in all matters that might involve public expenditure one way or another. The White Paper sets out a measured, balanced development strategy, which takes into account not only environmental considerations but, crucially, the fact that we must have airports that will allow people to travel to different parts of this country and the world because that is essential for our future economic development.

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): Is not one of the problems the growth in domestic air travel in the UK for journeys that could be done much better and more appropriately by rail? Can my right hon. Friend think of some innovative ways to achieve such a modal shift—for example, by increasing airline passenger duty for domestic mainland flights in the UK and using the revenues raised to fund high-speed lines to cut journey times and make rail more attractive?

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend is right to suggest that we should encourage people to use the most environmentally efficient way to travel if we can. Let me give an example that is a bit further away from the city that both of us represent. Now that the west coast main line has been upgraded at a cost of £7.5 billion, the journey time on the train service between Manchester and London is just over two hours, and it is extremely efficient and probably a better way to get to London than going out to the airport and flying down. So that is a very good example.

As I have told the House before, the Chancellor and I have asked Sir Rod Eddington to look at some of the longer-term transport developments that we need in this country, one of which will be whether we should invest money in a high-speed rail link that runs from the north to the south. However, I certainly agree with my hon. Friend that we ought to encourage people to travel in a way that causes the least possible damage to the environment, although I draw his attention to the fact that any form of transport—high-speed rail links included—has an environmental consequence. High-speed railway lines draw a substantial amount of energy when people are travelling on them.

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): The pre-Budget statement was an opportunity for the Government to demonstrate joined-up thinking in relation to airport expansion. Instead, chapter 3 of the report talks of satisfying demand for a threefold increase in air travel by 2030, and chapter 7 talks about reducing emissions from aviation. Which of those two chapters did the Secretary of State co-author? Why, for the eighth year running, have the Government refused to make aviation pay its full environmental costs?

Mr. Darling: As the hon. Gentleman perfectly well knows, the taxation of aviation fuel is governed by international treaty and it is not open to any country to take unilateral action in that respect. I am sure that he will have noticed that last week, because of pressure brought to bear by the UK Government, the European Union signed up to including aviation in a EU-wide emissions trading scheme, which will go a long way to reduce emission. As I said just a few moments ago, the White Paper on aviation, which we published a couple of years ago, not only sought to strike a balance to ensure that people could fly to different parts of the country and the world, but was very conscious of our environmental obligations. The problem with the Liberal Democrats is that they are in favour of people flying, but they are against the means to enable them to do so.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): Having spoken recently to senior management at Glasgow airport, I know that they are extremely happy with the proposals in the White Paper on airport expansion. However, they are concerned about access to Glasgow airport, especially due to congestion on the M8 and the situation regarding the Glasgow airport rail link, responsibility for which is devolved to the Scottish Parliament. What discussions has my right hon. Friend had with the Scottish Executive to try to move those things forward?

Mr. Darling: I know that those associated with Glasgow airport, in common with many people involved in the aviation industry and others, welcome the fact that two years ago the Government did something that no Government had done for 30 years: set out a strategic development. I understand the importance of the rail link and that it is of great interest to those at Glasgow airport, as my hon. Friend says. The matter is devolved to the Scottish Executive. I have had discussions with the Liberal Democrat Minister who is responsible for the rail link, so I look forward to finding out when he will give it the go-ahead.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): Is the Secretary of State aware that one of the effects of the Government's airports policy is to encourage the development of Nottingham East Midlands airport as a national air freight hub? The development clearly brings economic benefits to both the businesses that use air freight services and the people who work in the airport, which is welcome. However, does he acknowledge that one of the effects of growing air freight activity at the airport has been an increase in night-flights activity, which has resulted in environmental burdens for the surrounding community? Would it not be right for a Government who are encouraging the development of air freight activity at Nottingham East Midlands airport for entirely understandable reasons also to accept responsibility for regulating the environmental impact by introducing a designation of the airport? The Government would thus accept responsibility for the environmental impact of the decisions that they are taking.

Mr. Darling: The right hon. Gentleman puts his case extremely reasonably. He is absolutely right that there is a tension between the development of Nottingham East Midlands airport, which of course brings huge economic benefit to the area as well as benefit to people who want to travel, and the fact that air freight almost necessarily involves night flights, which have noise associated with them. There was quite a discussion about that last Question Time. The Government are conscious of the matter and we will do everything that we can to try to mitigate the situation and put the right controls in place to ensure that noise is kept to a minimum. However, as the right hon. Gentleman recognises, the airport itself brings a lot of benefit to the area. We are trying to tread a fine line between the development of the airport and ensuring that we protect the well-being of people who live nearby.

East Coast Main Line

7. Mrs. Linda Riordan (Halifax) (Lab): What progress he is making on increasing the capacity of the east coast main line. [34466]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): The award of the east coast main line franchise to the Great North Eastern Railway provides for substantial increases in the number of services provided, along with opportunities for extensions to the electrified network.

Mrs. Riordan: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that if we are to encourage more people to use the railways, we need to provide better services and to increase capacity, especially on the east coast main line? That would enable thousands of people from the north to access the most popular routes, and it would not only protect the environment, but help to boost local economies, such as that of Halifax.

Mr. Darling: I agree with my hon. Friend. Under the new franchise that has been awarded to GNER, there will be about 65 services from Leeds to London each weekday, which is approximately one every half hour. Additionally, GNER is committed to working with the Department and Network Rail to examine electrifying the line between Leeds and the east coast. There have been improvements at Grantham to cut down the number of delays of trains coming from Skegness and the east coast. King's Cross station is due to be developed further to allow for greater capacity, and much further north the Scottish Executive plan to enlarge Edinburgh Waverley station. On top of that, I except that further improvements will be made to ensure that the line, which is one of the main arterial railway routes in the country, can carry more passengers.

Mr. Iain Wright (Hartlepool) (Lab): One improvement we could make to increase capacity is to introduce better planning and management of timetables. The present timetabling arrangements act as a block to alternative providers on the east coast such as Grand Central, which wishes to provide a direct rail service from Sunderland through Hartlepool to London. What steps will my right hon. Friend take to scrutinise timetabling arrangements to free up capacity?

Mr. Darling: First of all, long, bitter experience after privatisation tells us that timetabling must be realistic. There have been far too many cases, especially following privatisation in the mid-1990s, in which too many services were put on to a network that could not sustain them, with the result that there were more delays. We had to take action to try to ensure that timetables are more realistic. Secondly, the Government have to take a view on the effect that new operators on the east coast main line have on the passenger loadings of existing services, and the subsequent effect on any subsidy that is payable or, alternatively, the premium payments to Government. Grand Central railways has submitted an application to the rail regulator, and it is his job to decide whether it can gain that access. I understand that he is likely to make his decision in February next year.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend commend Hull Trains on providing extra services on the east coast main line, mainly to Selby and Hull, without any public subsidy whatsoever? Does he agree that the interest of GNER, the dominant operator, should not be used to frustrate other operators such as Grand Central railways, which would offer innovative services from York to London similar to those offered by Hull Trains from Selby and Hull to London.

Mr. Darling: I am very impressed by my colleague's new-found enthusiasm for competition on the railways, as it has not always been evident. Hull Trains is the only example of an open access operator running services between Hull and King's Cross. That service is extremely popular, and when we published our White Paper on rail development we said that we hoped that it would continue. However, it should be borne in mind that GNER will pay a great deal of money to the Department, which will thus be available for investment in the railways. As I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Wright), we must have regard to the impact of any new operator on the amount of money coming into the railways. The railways need to be operated as a whole, and, if new services start to operate, we must look at the implications for other services before reaching further conclusions as to whether anyone else should enter the network.

Ports Policy

8. Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): What plans he has to develop a policy on ports. [34467]

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): Existing policy is set out in "Modern Ports", published in 2000. In "The Future of Transport" White Paper, the Government committed to review the ports policy framework. We will issue a discussion document early next year, and set out policy later in 2006.

Dr. Whitehead: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply. When he issues that discussion document, will he look in particular at the strategic national role of container ports? Will he look at the role that ports play on both their land and seaward sides as well as the strategic access to ports, particularly for container traffic, provided by our rail network?

Dr. Ladyman: Yes, I can assure my hon. Friend that I shall do so. The review will be wide-ranging, and it will take into account all aspects of port capacity and the economic benefits that the nation derives from it. In considering trans-shipment, we must look at both economic benefits and environmental issues.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): May I associate myself with the remarks of the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) about the importance of a proper national strategy for the development of trans-shipment hubs? I declare a constituency interest, as there is an advancing project at Scapa Flow in Orkney, which I commend to the Minister. As there is a clear overlap between devolved and reserved responsibilities, will he work closely with Scottish Executive Ministers to ensure that we achieve a strategy that is right not just for the United Kingdom but for the whole of northern Europe?

Dr. Ladyman: I entirely accept the hon. Gentleman's points. The consultation will have to be national and we will need to involve the devolved Assemblies in the consideration. We must look at all the issues as openly as possible. The economic impact of the operation of our ports is unquestionable. We must maximise it and at the same time take account of the environmental and social issues.

Gwyn Prosser (Dover) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend remember the Prime Minister's visit to the port of Dover in April, at a time when the Conservatives were advocating the privatisation of publicly owned ports? Does he recall the Prime Minister telling reporters from the Dover Mercury and Dover Express:

> "I am totally opposed to selling-off the trust port because it then ends as a public asset"?

Does my hon. Friend agree with those wise words?

Dr. Ladyman: Far be it from me ever to question anything the Prime Minister has ever said. I recollect that at the time I closely associated myself with those very comments, and I do not see why I would resile from any of them now.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): This may be my last appearance at Transport questions: I can confirm that the Opposition have a new Leader—the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron). Given the significant impact on the regional economy caused by each individual decision to build or expand a port, does the Minister accept that the absence of a co-ordinated ports policy leaves his Department's efforts at joined-up government all at sea? Does he further accept that pursuing separate inquiries into each application—£45 million and seven years wasted at Dibden bay—is the worst possible arrangement for both the industry and individual campaigners, and leaves their future in deep water?

Dr. Ladyman: I take it from my parliamentary neighbour's comments that he did not vote for the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), but if that is his last contribution, let me give him some reassurance. The Government have a well thought-out policy on ports. We take account of market pressures. Our proper planning consultation process, which allows us to make decisions, has served us well over many years. However, we believe that certain aspects of the way we plan port capacity and take those decisions could be improved. That is why we are carrying out a review. Many of the points made by the hon. Gentleman will be fed into that review, and I have no doubt they will be taken into account when we produce our new ports policy later in 2006.

Carbon Dioxide Emissions

9. Ms Celia Barlow (Hove) (Lab): What steps he is taking to ensure carbon dioxide emissions are reduced in the transport sector. [34468]

11. Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): What steps his Department is taking to reduce greenhouse gas emissions from all forms of transport. [34470]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): I recently announced the renewable transport fuels obligation that will reduce emissions by a million tonnes of carbon, equivalent to taking a million cars off the road. The Government have introduced several other measures to reduce emissions and we are working to bring aviation within the EU emissions trading scheme. That, as I said a few moments ago, has been accepted by Ministers across the European Union.

Ms Barlow: I welcome my right hon. Friend's recent announcement on the renewable transport fuel obligation. However, I am concerned that we should do more to reduce the effects of carbon emissions and transport. Coastal constituencies such as mine in Hove and Portslade would, after all, be badly affected by rising sea levels. Can my right hon. Friend explain why the requirement has been set at 5 per cent. of all fuels sold in the UK by 2010?

Mr. Darling: We chose 5 per cent. because at that level the fuel can be supplied to the existing fleet of cars, without any alterations being made. If the amount of biofuels is increased beyond that, it would begin to become necessary to adapt car engines and also, at some stage, the pumps that supply the petrol. However, my hon. Friend may be interested to know that there is a pilot scheme starting in the west country next year with which the Ford Motor company is involved, which will be selling biofuels of up to, I think, 85 per cent., which is fairly common in Sweden, for example, and it will be interesting to see how those trials progress.

Mr. Jack: In his reply, the Secretary of State mentioned emissions from road vehicles and from aviation, but he did not mention discharges of greenhouse gases from shipping. What steps are the Government taking to extend their thinking on reducing greenhouse gas emissions from Britain's merchant fleet and to conduct such thinking on a wider-world basis?

Mr. Darling: The right hon. Gentleman is correct in that ships burn particularly heavy fuels, which account for substantial emissions. However, there are many fewer ships than other forms of transport, which reduces the scale of their contribution. Another complication is whatever we do must comply with our international obligations, which, as I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will recall, are complex. I am not unsympathetic to his point, but I cannot promise him anything immediately.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend consider the effects of pollution on residential areas that are close to motorways? In particular, there are plans to widen the M1 in South Yorkshire, and the residential area of Tinsley is close to that motorway. Will my right hon. Friend consider the results of experiments conducted in the Netherlands, where a 50 mph speed limit was trialled on motorways in residential areas? Pollution levels fell substantially as a result of those experiments, with great benefits to the people who live next door to those motorways.

Mr. Darling: We will, of course, examine the environmental impact, as we are required to do by existing European directives. I am aware of measures that have been taken in different parts of the world, but we have not reached a decision on widening the M1.

CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was asked—

Patronage

20. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): What recent representations he has received on the extent of his powers of patronage. [34452]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Cabinet Office (Mr. Jim Murphy): The Duchy office has received no representations on the extent of the powers of patronage held by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. The Courts Act 2003 ended important powers on the appointment of magistrates.

David Taylor: In May this year, the then Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster reputedly used his power of eminence bleu patronage to secure a peerage and ministerial post for an unelected No. 10 adviser, Andrew Adonis, who was the progenitor of privatised city academies and the author of the barmier ideas in the recent education White Paper, including divisive and elitist trust schools. Given that track record, does the Minister agree that the next Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster should divest herself—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."]—of every scintilla of patronage and influence on Government appointments at a very early stage in her career?

Mr. Murphy: I thank my hon. Friend for that helpful question and that vote of confidence. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster takes responsibility on behalf of Her Majesty the Queen as patron, either solely or jointly, of 42 Church livings. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster also presents suitable candidates to the bishop of the diocese and has power over ancient livings. I have been informed that there are two such livings in Leicestershire—one in Whitwick and one in Thringstone. The living in Thringstone is currently vacant, and I will do all that I can in conjunction with my ministerial colleagues to suggest that a suitable candidate is sitting on the Back Benches.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I am glad that the sole incumbent of the Cabinet Office believes that the ancient livings patronage is in good hands. Does he believe that consideration by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster of matters such as patronage might interfere with other duties, such as control and responsibility for the Civil Contingencies Secretariat? Might not people in this country be rather surprised that nobody has been in charge of emergency planning during what we are told is a war on terrorism for nearly five weeks?

Mr. Murphy: That point was made recently in another place. The Civil Contingencies Secretariat is closely monitored and works in partnership with Ministers across Government. The Home Secretary is the lead Minister responsible for a lot of the responses to emergency crises and contingencies. I shall take this opportunity to thank those involved in that secretariat for their fantastic work with Ministers across Government.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Unfortunately, we have to live with the curse of patronage. There are 30,000 public appointments, many of the most important of which—the chairman of the BBC, for example—are made using patronage powers. Before such appointments are made, would it not be a good idea to have confirmation hearings, here in the House of Commons, along the lines of those in the Senate?

Mr. Murphy: If we were to subject all those appointments to some sort of confirmation process in the House of Commons—

Mr. Prentice: Not all of them—the most important ones.

Mr. Murphy: The Government are not attracted to that suggestion. We have set up a process according to which there is an independent commissioner for public appointments and all appointments are made in line with that code of practice. There is also a new House of Lords Appointments Commission. I think that we have got the balance about right as regards the way in which these matters are handled. However, if my hon. Friend has specific suggestions about some of the detail, ministerial colleagues and I would be happy to listen to him.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Does the Minister recall that before the general election we had a separate Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister for the Cabinet Office, both at great public expense that was not revealed until after the election was over? Now that it is no longer required to pay so much money to someone to run a general election campaign, does the Minister accept that it is likely that the Prime Minister will use his patronage to appoint new Ministers to the Duchy of Lancaster and the Cabinet Office rather more slowly than my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) will use his powers of patronage to appoint an entire new Front-Bench team?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): What did they do with the Short money?

Mr. Murphy: The hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) has made that point on numerous occasions. The Cabinet Office continues to work on the agenda of better regulation, civil contingencies, transformation in Government public services, and modernisation, regardless of how many Ministers are in the Cabinet Office.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), as ever, offers good advice from a sedentary position as regards the use of public finances for political purposes. There has been a vast increase in the amount of Short money used for the Conservative Opposition, spent entirely ineffectively, unaccountably and with no discernible outcome. In future, we should cast a more careful eye over the way in which taxpayers' money is used to subsidise unpopular political parties.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): To return to ecclesiastical livings—not that I have any intention of doing so myself—is it not a bit of a 19th-century anachronism still to have a politician involved in the appointment of people to livings? In fact, it is not even 19th century, but 17th century or 16th century. We might even end up with a Roman Catholic or an atheist naming people to Church of England livings. Would not that be a little curious? Is not this a load of old Trollope that we should put an end to?

Mr. Murphy: I do not wear my faith on my sleeve but, as a Roman Catholic, I am interested in that suggestion. My hon. Friend is right to say that this is part of an historical tradition. It dates back not to the 19th century but to the time of the English civil war and other periods of English history. We are in a process of continued modernisation across Government. In the Courts Act 2003, we surrendered important powers in the appointment of magistrates. I suspect that the new Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, perhaps in conjunction with my hon. Friend, may wish to consider some detailed continued modernisation of those historical—some would say quaint—powers.

Hampton Report

21. Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): If he will make a statement on progress in implementing the Hampton report on reducing the number of Government agencies. [34453]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Cabinet Office (Mr. Jim Murphy): The Hampton report is a central part of the Government's better regulation agenda. Good progress has been made on implementation. The timetable for change set out in Philip Hampton's report will be met.

Dr. Cable: I welcome the Government's commitment to cut the number of inspection agencies from 31 to seven—11 to four in the public sector. However, can the Minister answer this question, which Philip Hampton posed but never got an answer to: how many forms are circulating in public sector agencies that private individuals and companies have to fill in?

Mr. Murphy: I thank the hon. Gentleman for asking the most helpful question so far. He is right to talk about the reduction in the number of inspectors and regulators that the Government are determined to achieve. The reason no answer can be given by Mr. Hampton and others is that no one in Government has known in the past or knows today. That is why we launched the administrative burden inquiry, which is continuing to identify the level of bureaucratic burden across Government. Once we have done that, we will set ambitious targets for annual reductions. We will have more to report on that in due course.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): Later today, we shall discuss the London Olympics Bill. Does my hon. Friend agree that the lessons of Hampton should be extended to the sports world? Will he ensure that when money is paid through Government agencies for, in particular, grass-roots sport, the burden is lifted so that people—especially volunteers—can deliver the services that we want rather than having to spend their time filling up forms and dealing with unnecessary bureaucracy?

Mr. Murphy: My hon. Friend is, of course, right. We were elected on the same day, and in the seven or eight years since then he has continued, in a dogged and determined way, to champion local and national sport. That is, quite properly, recognised in his constituency. He is also on the ball, if I may put it like that, when it comes to the regulation of charities and voluntary and public sector organisations. It is important to lighten the load—the bureaucratic burden—and to reduce duplication, not just in the private sector but in the voluntary and charity sectors, and among those who are working on the 2012 Olympic plan.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Four weeks on, there is still no Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. Does that not show that the Government simply are not serious about deregulation, modernising public services or cutting bureaucracy? Does it not show that the Chancellor in No. 11 is in charge, and is the roadblock to reform? Will the Minister promise us that when the Government do get around to implementing the recommendations for a reduction in the number of agencies, they will not just carry out a shuffle and a merger but will cut the costs, cut the regulations and cut the forms? Can the Minister tell us how many fewer forms there will be, how much money will have been saved and by how many million of pounds the burden will have been reduced in a year's time?

Mr. Murphy: "Four weeks on, there are still no better questions" is another way of looking at the position—or "no better rant".

We are learning the lessons of the failures of past Conservative Governments. By their own admission, the bureaucratic burden soared, and the right hon. Gentleman himself is on record as recognising detailed and strategic failings on better regulation. The Cabinet Office has consulted on a Bill on better regulation, and we will publish the outcome of that consultation shortly. Work is being done to reduce administrative burdens, and we have introduced a system enabling businesses themselves to suggest simplification measures. Within a year, each Department will present the details of simplification proposals. The Department of Trade and Industry has published a plan that will save £200 million a year, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has also published a plan, and the Treasury has announced specific ways of reducing the bureaucratic burden.

May I end by saying—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the Minister will write to the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood).

Government Workers (Redeployment)

22. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central) (Lab): What level of retraining and reskilling he proposes to offer to Government workers who will be redeployed. [34454]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Cabinet Office (Mr. Jim Murphy): The Government have implemented and are currently embedding a common approach to the handling of consequences of the efficiency and relocation reviews. Departments offer advice, support, retraining and reskilling to staff to help them prepare for future career moves.

Jim Cousins: At the Department for Work and Pensions alone, 14,000 jobs have gone. That affects areas such as Tyneside. We now know that it is the lowest-paid and least qualified workers who lose their jobs. The most that the Government offer those workers—and very few of them get it—is the opportunity of refresher courses. When will we see the programmes that can relaunch working lives, and build the skills and qualifications that those low-paid, loyal workers need for the future?

Mr. Murphy: My hon. Friend is right: we have a responsibility both to those who are currently employed in the civil service and to folk who, as a result of the relocation agenda envisaged in the 2004 spending review, may no longer be so employed. That is why we have organised training and reskilling, and are working with recruitment organisations throughout the country.

If my hon. Friend has specific concerns about what is happening in the DWP in the north-east, I shall be happy to meet him and discuss them or to take them up with ministerial colleagues, but the Cabinet Office has a corporate set of rules on reskilling, and is responsible for advising Departments on their implementation.

Benefits Uprating and Welfare Reform

3.34 pm

The Minister for Pensions Reform (Mr. Stephen Timms): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on benefits uprating in the context of the Government's continued fight against poverty and our ambitious programme to renew the welfare and pensions systems.

I shall place full details of the uprating in the Vote Office and arrange for the figures to be published in the Official Report. I can confirm that most national insurance benefits will rise by the retail prices index, which is 2.7 per cent., and that most income-related benefits will be uprated by Rossi, at 2.2 per cent.

From next April, retirement pension will go up by £2.20 a week for single pensioners and by £3.55 a week for couples. When we were elected, the pension was just £62.45 for a single person. From April, it will be £84.25 for a single person and £134.75 for couples. That is a real-terms rise of 8 per cent. since 1997. Next year, the guarantee credit of pension credit will rise in line with earnings, so that no single pensioner need live on less than £114.05 a week and no couple on less than £174.05 a week. The threshold for the savings element of pension credit will be uprated so that it remains equal to the basic state pension. That means that a typical single pensioner will now gain from pension credit with an income of up to £158.75 a week, while a typical couple will gain on income of up to £233 a week.

Nearly 3.3 million pensioners are now in receipt of pension credit, with an average weekly award of around £43. We are reaching more people and ensuring that they get their entitlements. Following the introduction of pension credit, about 2 million pensioner households now qualify for more help, or qualify for help for the first time, with their council tax or rent. From this week, pensioners can make a single phone call to claim all three: pension credit, housing benefit and council tax benefit. That will be a very welcome simplification.

By targeting resources at the least well-off pensioners, we have succeeded in lifting nearly 2 million pensioners out of absolute poverty since 1997. We now spend an extra £11 billion a year on pensioners, with almost half of the extra spending going to the least well-off third. Had we simply increased the basic state pension in line with earnings, only just over a quarter of that extra spending would have gone to the least well-off third, who would have been £30 a week worse off than they are under these measures. On average, pensioner households are now £1,400 a year, or £27 a week, better off in real terms than they would have been under the 1997 system, with the least well-off third of households £1,900 a year, or £37 a week, better off in real terms.

As well as tackling the dreadful legacy of pensioner poverty that we inherited, we have also helped all pensioners and will continue to do so. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor confirmed yesterday that the winter fuel payment would be £200 for every year of this Parliament. He also announced that he would be setting aside an additional £300 million over the next three years, so that the Government's warm front programme can offer pensioner households on pension credit free installation of central heating, and all other pensioner households without central heating a contribution of £300 towards the cost of installing it. He also announced further help with the cost of insulation. I believe that the whole House will welcome those announcements.

We have now reached the unprecedented position in which pensioners are no more likely to be poor than any other group in society. That is a particularly remarkable achievement after a period in which earnings have grown so fast, thanks to the stability and steady growth that we have enjoyed in the economy since 1997. We need now to introduce further reform to ensure that our pensions system continues to deliver for future generations of pensioners, as it is doing for today's. So we warmly welcome the broad framework of the Pensions Commission's proposals and options, which were published last week. We believe that they will provide the right basis for building the consensus that we need, but there is still a great deal to be discussed and debated about the detail.

Yesterday, I issued a challenge to the pensions industry. It believes that it can produce an industry-led model that will meet the Turner objective of enabling everyone to save for a pension at low cost, while outperforming the one proposed in the report. I have therefore asked the industry to work up the details of its alternative approach by early February, ahead of a joint national pensions debate event between industry and Government, when those proposals can be closely examined. In the same way, as we embark on a major new consultation exercise involving every section of our community, we shall scrutinise the commission proposals and options, debating the best ways to achieve the objectives that the commission set out and to deliver a lasting pensions settlement.

If we are to meet the challenges of an ageing society and permanently eradicate poverty in retirement, we also need to address the inequalities during people's working lives. That is why our record in tackling child poverty is so important. It is why we are committed to supporting families in work, why our welfare reforms and our aspiration for an 80 per cent. employment rate are so important, and why we want to see a modern, active and inclusive welfare state. We have lifted more than half a million children out of relative low income since 1997. Twenty million people, including just over 10 million children, are benefiting from tax credits, and the child tax credit, which will also increase by earnings, is benefiting 6 million families.

The standard rate of maternity allowance and statutory maternity pay will be increased by the RPI to £108.85 a week. Whereas in 1997 the maximum maternity pay and child benefit payment for mothers at home with their first baby was just £2,610 for the first year, by 2007 it will rise to £8,300—a real-terms increase of more than £5,000. In addition, the Work and Families Bill, which received its Second Reading yesterday, introduces a new entitlement to statutory paternity pay to enable a father to take time off work and to receive statutory pay instead of his partner if she returns to work early. That gives parents greater choice in how they balance their work and caring responsibilities in the first year of their child's life. For the sixth successive year, we are freezing non-dependent deductions to relieve the pressure on low-income parents who are accommodating their adult children.

Work is the best route out of poverty. There are now more people in jobs in Britain than ever before—2.3 million more than in 1997. Unemployment is at its lowest for nearly 30 years, with long-term youth unemployment 90 per cent. lower than in 1997. In just 12 months, employment has risen by 330,000 to 28.8 million, and is the highest in the country's history. It has risen in every region and nation of the UK. The lone parent employment rate has increased by 11 percentage points since 1997, and nearly 1 million lone parents are now in work, while the number on income support has fallen by more than 200,000 since 1997.

As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said yesterday, we are not going to abolish the new deal; we will strengthen it. We will offer learning agreements for teenagers in eight areas of the country, extend the new deal pilots to help lone parents back to work, and pilot personal action plans for those unemployed for six months or more. Our new deal for disabled people has seen nearly 75,000 job entries since its launch in 2001, with 200,000 disabled people helped into work through our total package of new deal programmes.

We are seeing very encouraging early results from the pathways to work pilots. In the first year of those, the number of recorded job entries for people with a health condition or disability almost doubled compared with the same period the year before. Their continued success has driven a significant rise in the proportion of customers leaving incapacity benefit in the first six months of their claim, compared with non-pilot areas. Overall, on a national basis, that early success would be equivalent to about 150,000 incapacity benefit claimants being helped into work each year. That success has underpinned our achievements in helping people off incapacity benefit, with new cases now down a third since 1997 and the first falls in the total count, which fell by 41,000 in the year to May 2005.

In March, the Disability Discrimination Act 2005 completed the most far-reaching programme of disability rights legislation that any European country has put in place. It fulfilled our manifesto commitment to deliver enforceable and comprehensive civil rights for disabled people, and is a major landmark in enabling disabled people to live independently, fully recognised and respected as equal members of society.

Last week, on the international day for disabled people, we launched the new Office for Disability Issues. From this week, the Disability Discrimination Act extended protection from discrimination to another 250,000 people. However, we are not stopping there. In January, our Welfare Reform Green Paper will go further in tackling exclusion from economic activity and independence across the working-age population.

In April, we shall take further steps to break down the barriers that face older workers. The radical tax simplification that comes into play on A-day will do much to help. The Pensions Act 2004 continues to improve the rewards for those who choose to delay taking their state pension—even for only a short period—and, in April, the first people will benefit from the new option of a lump sum for state pension deferral, which could be worth more than £5,000.

In the spring, our White Paper will seek to lay the basis for a consensus on a lasting pensions settlement. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor also announced yesterday a change to the treatment of charitable, voluntary and personal injury income payments in income-related benefits. They are already disregarded in pension credit and pension-age housing benefit and council tax benefit. To simplify the system further and encourage the work of charities, they will be disregarded from October next year in assessing all eligibility for income support and jobseeker's allowance. There will also be a 52-week grace period for lump sum personal injury payments when assessing entitlement to income support, jobseeker's allowance and working-age housing benefit and council tax benefit.

This year's uprating continues our commitment to promoting opportunities for the many, not the few. It contributes to our programme of reform, which balances rights with responsibilities and offers everyone the opportunity to build a decent income for their retirement. It takes another big step away from the legacy of pernicious poverty, which we are determined should never return.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne) (Con): I thank the Minister for his customary courtesy in letting me have an advance copy of the statement.

I imagine that many of my colleagues are somewhat preoccupied with announcements that relate not to benefits but to the Conservative party and its future. I should like to take the first opportunity in the Chamber to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) on his overwhelming election as leader of our great party.

As a party, we naturally support any uprating of benefits. When the time comes, we shall not vote against them, unlike the Liberal Democrats, who memorably once voted against an uprating.

Perhaps the Minister could tell me in his response how much more the basic state pension would be next year if it were increased in line with earnings, not prices, as my party promised at the last election.

The statement is badged as being on welfare reform, yet, nearly nine years after the Government were first elected, we continue to hear the tired old rhetoric. The statement referred to the Government's "ambitious" programme and a "programme of radical reform", but where are those ambitious or radical proposals?

Perhaps I can understand Ministers' natural caution. After all, when the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) was appointed the first Minister responsible for welfare and pension reform, the Prime Minister told him to think the unthinkable. He was promptly sacked for doing so.

The Government continue to dither about the reform of incapacity benefit. After a delay of many months, we are now promised a Green Paper in January. The problems of the Child Support Agency remain dire, with the recent revelation that the agency is spending more on its recovery department than it is recovering. When will Ministers decide that enough is enough? Only the other day, the Prime Minister revealed his view that root-and-branch reform was needed. I appreciate that he is less and less able to influence events, but when can we expect a statement on the CSA's future?

[Mr. Nigel Waterson]

As if that were not bad enough, many families throughout the land have been caused unnecessary worry by overpayments of tax credit and the insensitive pursuit of their repayment. It seems to have become a ritual on such occasions for Ministers to go on about the successes—or the alleged successes—of the new deal. It remains a stain on the Government's record that 1 million young people are not working or in education or training. When will Ministers make that tragic wasted talent a priority?

On pensions, I should perhaps declare an interest as I have some private pension provision. The Chancellor attempted to torpedo Lord Turner's report before it was even published. In a leaked letter, he said to Lord Turner:

"'you should not assume' that the current link of the pension credit to earnings will continue beyond 2008."

Will the Minister confirm that pension credit will continue to be linked to earnings beyond 2008? In the part of the letter dealing with the Turner report, it was said:

"We warmly welcome the broad framework of the Pensions Commission's"— that is, its report—

"and we believe they are the right basis . . . But there is still a great deal to be discussed and debated about the detail."

Presumably, that is especially with the Chancellor. That is not exactly a ringing endorsement of an exercise that has taken three years and has cost £1.6 million.

Let me ask the Minister a direct question. Can he assure the House, with an entirely straight face, that he and his right hon. Friend are approaching the Turner report with a genuinely open mind? Was all this excellent work and analysis to be discarded on the say-so of the Chancellor? Does the Minister at least accept one of Lord Turner's central conclusions: that means-testing needs to be reduced? At present, nearly half of all pensioners depend on means-tested benefits. By 2050, that proportion will have risen to more than 70 per cent. Yet there are still 1.7 million pensioners entitled to pension credit who are not claiming it. The latest figures show that despite all the money that is being spent in the form of advertising and given all the efforts of the Pension Service, take-up is hardly increasing at all.

I shall make a prediction. I believe that, just as the Government have done with the measure of poverty or the timing of the economic cycle, they are about to move the goal post on their previously stated targets for pension credit and announce that in reality, the actual target should always have been lower. That is the Government's preferred method of tackling a difficult problem—just change the target or the methodology. We know that the take-up for other benefits, such as council tax benefit, is even more lamentable. The latest statistics show that in 2002-03 alone, pensioners were failing to claim up to £2.9 billion in means-tested benefits. No wonder 2 million pensioners are still living in poverty.

Only yesterday, the Chancellor of the Exchequer made it clear that the payment to help older people pay their council tax bills was a one-off for one year only. As it turned out, that was election year. Despite the amounts spent on local government finance, many councils, especially in the south-east, are predicting further sharp rises in council tax in addition to the massive rises that are already being suffered under the Government. Do Ministers not realise the terror that many pensioners have of receiving a council tax demand or a utility bill?

How can we ensure that older people keep warm when gas prices, especially, are soaring? The Government's lack of an energy policy is as glaringly apparent as their lack of a pensions policy. In its comments on yesterday's announcements, Age Concern referred to winter fuel payments, which it welcomes. It referred to the fact that, sadly, 31,000 pensioners died last winter as a result of the cold. It added that "the Government needs to reform the basic state pension so that all pensioners know that they will have enough money in their pockets to pay their basic costs."

The growth in dependency on the state does not seem to bother the Chancellor. Does it bother the Minister, perhaps, that across British society as a whole, one third of households now rely on the state for more than half their income? If it does not bother him, it should.

Does it not add insult to injury to those in the private sector, and those who have no occupational pension, that the public sector are to enjoy the same pension terms, including retirement at 60 or even earlier, for the next 40 years?

Will the Minister tell the House where we are on error and fraud in the system? According to the Public Accounts Committee, about £3 billion a year could be lost through fraud and error.

Yesterday's statement, and the reaction of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to Lord Turner's report, proves—if proof were still needed—that it is the present incumbent of No. 11 who is the roadblock to reform in the welfare system, as well as across the whole of public services. For far too long the Department of Work and Pensions has behaved like a wholly-owned subsidiary of the Treasury. Is it not high time that Ministers started to come up with some ideas of their own for welfare reform?

Mr. Timms: The hon. Gentleman asked me about the uprating of the basic state pension. I have not been able to do the calculation that he asked about, but I can tell him that, as a result of this announcement, the basic state pension has risen since 1997 by 8 per cent. in real terms, as opposed to 1.7 per cent. after 18 years under the previous Government, so those who are concerned to have a higher basic state pension would do well to support the Labour party, rather than the party that he represents.

The hon. Gentleman talked about the radical reform of the welfare system. That is why the number of people in work is up by 2 million. That is why we have been able to lift 2 million pensioners out of poverty since 1997 and consigned abject pensioner poverty to the history books. Those are dramatic, radical and important changes, and we are determined to build on them in the next phase of welfare reform.

I can confirm to the hon. Gentleman that, in our response to the Turner commission, we do have a genuinely open mind. Nothing has been ruled in or out by the Government. The hon. Gentleman asked me that question directly and I give him that answer directly. We will bring back proposals in the spring, which I hope will be on the basis of as broad a consensus as possible across the House and across the country.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman welcomed the announcements by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor about additional help for 16 and 17-year-olds to move into work. I hope as well, given the points that the hon. Gentleman made a moment ago, that he welcomed the announcements about the expansion of the warm front programme to help pensioners to install central heating and installation. All those announcements directly address the issues that he raised.

The hon. Gentleman has a point about the rather low take-up of council tax benefit among pensioners. That is why the Pension Service is ringing up pensioners in receipt of pension credit to encourage and help them to apply for council tax benefit and housing benefit if they are entitled to them, in order that we can increase the take-up of those benefits among those who are entitled to them.

The hon. Gentleman asked about public sector pensions. It is worth making the point that, in not much more than 10 years, the number of people in public sector schemes with a pension age of 65 will more than halve, so the agreement that has been reached on public sector pensions will lead to substantial changes much more quickly than some people have realised. I think that that puts into perspective the point that he made about that.

On error and fraud, the extent of fraud has gone down by two thirds since 1997 in the most vulnerable benefits: income support and jobseeker's allowance. That is welcome progress. When the Conservative party was in office it did not even measure the extent of the problem. We have made dramatic progress.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Does the Minister accept the Opposition's line that large numbers of pensioners are eligible for but not claiming the additional help with pension credit? Does he share the experience that I have? I find almost no one in Birkenhead who for any length of time is eligible and not claiming pension credit. Has not that benefit proved itself to be extremely effective in channelling help to our poorest pensioners? Is not the problem one of long-term sustainability rather than non-take-up? One cannot run a free society by budgeting for 75 per cent. of pensioners being on means tests, and one is unlikely to get elected if it costs 13p on the standard rate of tax to deliver that benefit. Does not that make his comment about consulting about the Turner commission report that much more important? While every hon. Member welcomes the announcement that the Government are talking to people outside the House, might they talk to people inside the House and might he ask the normal channels for a debate on the Adjournment, so that hon. Members on both sides of the House can give their views on that important report?

Mr. Timms: My right hon. Friend's characterisation of the position regarding the pension credit is much fairer than that of the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson). It is true that some people who are entitled to pension credit are not yet receiving it, but it looks as though the total number eligible is rather less than we first thought, which has doubtless had an effect. Of course, some of those entitled to but not receiving pension credit are entitled to rather small amounts. The evidence is that the overwhelming majority of those entitled to substantial amounts are receiving it, which is why it is having such a big impact.

I very much agree with my right hon. Friend that the pension credit has been an extremely effective intervention in addressing the problem of long-term pensioner poverty, effectively making abject poverty a thing of the past. I would welcome a debate along the lines he suggests, as would my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions. Such discussions are doubtless under way as we speak.

Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): I thank the Minister for his courtesy in giving us advance sight of the statement, many aspects of which Liberal Democrats welcome. In the light of recent leaks to the press, we particularly welcome the news that the pension credit will continue to be uprated in line with earnings. Does he agree that, whatever the Chancellor may have said in advance of Lord Turner's report, it would be unthinkable for a Labour Government to break the link between the pension credit and earnings? Will he confirm that continued uprating of the credit in line with earnings over the long term is shown by the Treasury to be a reasonable assumption in the table on page 39 of the long-term public finance report published yesterday? Does he therefore agree that Lord Turner's proposals represent an affordable alternative to the progressive expansion of means-testing? As the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) said a few moments ago, the choice is therefore between a sustainable scheme and one that is unsustainable in the long term. We also welcome the uprating of many other benefits, and I congratulate the Minister on continuing the freezing of non-dependent deductions.

The Minister says that 3.3 million pensioners are in receipt of the pension credit. How many are entitled to it but are not receiving it? The state pension will increase by £2.20 a week, but how much of that will be consumed by council tax rises in the coming year? Does this not highlight the need for a decent state pension for everybody as a guarantee against poverty? We should not be content to celebrate the fact that pensioners are now merely no more likely to be poor than anyone else in society.

I welcome the Minister's decision to look at an industry alternative to the national pension savings scheme suggested by Lord Turner, but does he agree that, to be viable, the cost of such a private sector scheme must be at, or under, the level set by Lord Turner for the state-backed scheme? Although it is important to ensure that benefits are uprated fairly, is it not also important to ensure that they are delivered effectively?

In last year's corresponding statement, the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions said:

"Our reforms through Jobcentre Plus have been remarkable."—[Official Report, 6 December 2004; Vol. 428, c. 912.]

Does the Minister agree that they have indeed been remarkable—for the range of serious problems that claimants now face in getting their money, whether uprated or not? It is now taking an average of 13.5 days to clear a jobseeker's allowance claim, compared with the target of 12 days, and nine centres have returned to manual processing. Will the Minister take steps to ensure that claimants can get their benefit by the time today's uprating comes into effect?

The Minister will also be aware that a very cold winter is forecast, so it is disappointing that no provision has been made for extending the winter fuel payment to severely disabled people, as we proposed in our manifesto. Will he re-examine this proposal, which recognises the additional costs and problems for severely disabled people arising from cold winter weather?

We welcome confirmation that a statement on welfare reform will be made next January, the encouraging signs coming from the pathways to work pilots, and the proposed increase in back-to-work support for lone parents. However, the Minister said nothing about the welfare reform desperately sought by families throughout the land: reform of the failing and discredited Child Support Agency. Will he confirm that a statement will be made on this issue by the end of the year, as previously promised by the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions?

The inclusion of the words "welfare reform" in the title of this statement may have caused a frisson of excitement in some parts of the House that eight years of waiting for serious proposals on welfare reform were perhaps about to be brought to an end this afternoon. I note from the Chancellor's statement yesterday that the money raised from the windfall tax to pay for welfare to work has now all been spent. When welfare reform proposals are made in January, will the Minister ensure that, despite the tightening fiscal position, they are properly funded, so that the 1 million or more incapacity benefit recipients who would like to work again are not once more disappointed by this Government?

Mr. Timms: I am grateful to the hon. Member for welcoming the freezing of non-dependent deductions, which his predecessors did consistently over the past few years. It is an area on which we have agreed. The earnings link for pension credit has proved an effective tool for reducing pensioner poverty. As he knows, the commitment to maintain that uprating lasts until 2008. Beyond that, the Chancellor will make announcements in due course, although the hon. Gentleman is right that the illustrative figures in the pre-Budget report reflect the uprating continuing. Whether that will happen in practice is a matter for the Chancellor to announce.

I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention—the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) may also be interested, given what he said earlier—to what the Turner commission report said about means-testing. Page 188 states:

> "A significant improvement in actual and perceived incentives for the majority of people of current working age can be achieved by limiting the future spread of means-testing".

That was the concern in the report, rather than the immediate elimination of or drastic reduction in means-testing. It is important that we recognise that thrust in the report. It is important that proposals for pension reform should be affordable, and that is one of the tests set by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in welcoming the Turner commission report last week.

The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander) mentioned the impact of the council tax on pensioners, and it is important that we make further progress in increasing the take-up of council tax benefit. It is important that an alternative, industry-led, low-cost personal account pension scheme should be comparable in terms of cost and in other ways to the national pension saving scheme suggested in the Turner report, and that is the basis on which we will evaluate the proposals. There are two prospects, and I have asked the industry to produce its proposals by February, so there may be others. We will pragmatically evaluate the alternatives, looking at the cost and at other issues, including the impact on business, which will be important.

We are improving the bedding down of the new systems for jobseeker's allowance and we have seen much progress. I can confirm that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will make a statement on the Child Support Agency shortly—either later this month or early in the new year.

The hon. Gentleman looks forward to the Green Paper on the new deal, which is due in January. I hope that his party will support the increasing and active role that we envisage for the state in helping people back into work. His party has always pledged to abolish the new deal and remove the extra help that has been so effective. I hope that the tone of his remarks reflects some new thinking in his party and that we will be able to agree on the tremendous attractions of a more active role for the state in helping people back into work.

Jon Trickett (Hemsworth) (Lab): My hon. Friend said that the best way out of poverty is through jobs—a welcome contrast to the old Tory practice of throwing people on to incapacity benefit to reduce the dole queues. The fall in the number of people claiming IB is welcome, but will my hon. Friend confirm that it has been achieved by incentivising the pathway back into work? Will he therefore reject a proposal from any source that incapacity benefit should be reduced in a punitive attempt to get people back to work, which would reflect the old Tory methodology, not Labour values?

Mr. Timms: Yes, I agree. That is why there has been so much support for our approach among organisations representing disabled people. The Green Paper will be about giving people extra help to allow them to get into work. As my hon. Friend rightly said, the pathways areas are seeing double the number of recorded job entries compared to other areas. The pilots are working well to help incapacity benefit customers into work. They have been popular in those areas and we want to expand that approach across the country.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): Given the Chancellor's welcome but belated U-turn on tax relief to buy second homes for pension funds, will the Minister confirm that in the great pensions debate the whole question of tax relief on pensions, which is unduly weighted towards higher rate taxpayers, will be ruled in, or will it be set aside somehow?

Mr. Timms: As I said earlier, nothing is being ruled in or out and we shall be interested in any suggestions that the hon. Gentleman or his hon. Friends make, although I draw his attention to the points made in the Turner report about the difficulties involved in radical change. However, if he has some proposals I should be interested in seeing them.

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): I congratulate the Government and local authorities such as mine in Waltham Forest on their important efforts to improve entitlement take-up, but a huge number of people still do not receive their entitlement. Now that partnership teams have been rolled out in many areas, will my hon. Friend make a change so that they can make allocations to people who are entitled and that each case does not have to go back to a central agency to be worked out? Will he undertake to look at a possible policy change whereby people who are entitled can receive their money whether they claim or not? It is not just that they are stubborn—they may have early dementia or all sorts of other problems. Will my hon. Friend undertake to have a look at that?

Mr. Timms: Yes. We are doing a lot in exactly the direction advocated by my hon. Friend. There is a good joint team in Waltham Forest, the area that he represents. I have visited the team and had a look at its work; it is a particularly effective example. We are considering delegating a greater role to people other than staff in our Department, including enabling voluntary sector organisations to validate documents and check claims, thereby taking on some of the work that has had to be done in the Department in the past. I agree that it would be helpful to move in that direction. I also agree that we should increasingly be moving towards making payments automatic, if we are able to do so. That, of course, depends on our being able to access data that may not be in the systems that the Department uses, but there is much potential. My hon. Friend is on to something important and we are looking actively at it.

Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): Will the Minister take a look at the fact that people with learning disabilities and autistic spectrum disorder are required to claim incapacity benefit? Before the Government abolished severe disablement allowance and replaced it with incapacity benefit, there was recognition of the fact that such people are born with that condition and will almost certainly die with it. I do not say for one minute that there should not be every opportunity to help them get into work if possible, but at present they have to go to their GP every two or three months just to prove that they still have the condition with which they were born. That is rather cruel and unnecessary. Will the Minister look into it?

Mr. Timms: Yes, I should be happy to discuss that matter with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, although, like the hon. Lady, I want to underline the importance of not writing anybody off, and not assuming that some people will be unable to work. She makes a fair point and I shall certainly discuss it with my right hon. Friend.

Angela Eagle (Wallasey) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on being part of a Government who ended the historic link between poverty and old age—a truly magnificent achievement. May I, in the same vein, ask him to provide us with a few more details on the warm homes grant extensions, particularly for the installation of central heating in the properties of pension credit recipients who do not have such heating? Will applications have to be made, or will attempts be made to reach such properties and ensure a more automatic system?

Mr. Timms: I welcome what my hon. Friend says and I agree with her. The announcements that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor made yesterday will be taken forward through the existing warm front programme, which, as I am sure my hon. Friend knows, in many areas has been very active in going out to people and encouraging them to take up their entitlements. The scheme will provide free installation of central heating for households on pension credit who do not have it, and for other households not on pension credit there will be a contribution of £300 towards the cost of installing it. I agree about the need to work hard and ensure that people are aware of that opportunity, which represents a major breakthrough and a major improvement in the way we address the problem of heating for those who are above pensionable age.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) mentioned Liberal Democrats voting against the benefit uprating; he may remember that it was the infamous 75p pension uprating, and we would do the same if the Minister proposed it again.

May I bring the Minister back to a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander), which I do not think he responded to? My hon. Friend asked whether the Government had considered extending the winter fuel payment to severely disabled people. While the Minister is replying to that, he may also reply to the point about whether the warm front scheme extends to severely disabled people.

Mr. Timms: First, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the retirement pension will go up by £2.20 a week on this occasion, which I am sure he will welcome.

We have received a number of representations asking for the availability of winter fuel payments to be extended. We do not propose to do so. Disability living allowance helps to defray the additional costs of disability, which might include heating. The warm front schemes help people other than those above state pension age, but the announcements that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor made yesterday were specifically about people who are above state pension age.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Am I the only one to be astonished at the dismissive way in which the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander) brushed aside the statement made by my Friend that pensioners are no more likely to be poor now than any other people in society, which I think is a remarkable achievement?

Council tax can be a very heavy burden for pensioners on modest fixed incomes who do not receive the pension credit. Now that the review of council tax has been abandoned, will my Friend tell me whether there is any fresh thinking within the Government on how pensioners of modest means can cope with above-inflation council tax rises?

Mr. Timms: I am sure that my hon. Friend will very much welcome the additional payment being made this year to help with council tax. I do not think that it is right to say that the review has been abolished; work is continuing that will contribute to the outcome of the forthcoming spending review. I anticipate that an announcement will be made in the Budget about whether additional payments will be made in future years.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Although I appreciate the Government's noble intentions on the reduction of child poverty, will the Minister confirm the number of children whom he estimates remain in absolute poverty? Has he had a chance to see today's press reports that quote research from Save the Children that, despite their best efforts, the Government are unlikely to meet their target to eliminate child poverty by 2020?

Mr. Timms: We are on track to hit our first milestone, which was to reduce child poverty by a quarter by last year. We will know the details of that by the spring. That is a welcome step forward, and I am glad the hon. Gentleman supports the aim that we have set out. I agree that it is a very important aim, and we are determined to make further progress. We have already succeeded in arresting and reversing the long-term trend of rising child poverty. By 2003–04, about 500,000 fewer children were in low-income households compared with 1998–99. We are determined to maintain that progress towards our target of abolishing child poverty by 2020.

Point of Order

4.20 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, you know that Foreign Affairs questions are due to be answered after the recess, on 10 January. There is a great deal of concern among many people, including hon. Members, about the possibility—indeed, the reports—that the United States is using UK facilities to transport terror suspects around the country. There are also allegations about interrogation centres, or torture centres, in various parts of Europe, although reports do not state that they are located in Britain. It would be useful if, before we break for the Christmas recess, the Foreign Secretary came to the Chamber to make a statement and answer questions.

May I make a final point to you, Mr. Speaker? I am not allowed, as you know, to refer to any internal House of Commons matter, but I thought that, when the procedure changed a few years ago, the wish was that it should be possible broadly to raise topical and urgent matters on the Floor of the House pretty promptly. As matters stand, the Foreign Secretary is not due to answer questions until 10 January. Such things are reported widely in newspapers and on television and radio, yet we cannot discuss them in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman's experience goes back a long way. In fact, he and I first came into the House on the same day. He will know that private notice questions are now called urgent questions, but the granting of such questions remains at the Speaker's discretion. Of course, I will not go into why I refused him an urgent question. Given his vast experience as a parliamentarian, he knows that, if he wishes to bring the Foreign Secretary or an Under-Secretary before the House, he can apply for an Adjournment debate. That would be a nice way of doing things. Again, the Speaker has some discretion in those matters, and there is a very fair ballot indeed.

Employment (Advertisement of Pay and Pension Rights)

4.23 pm

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require all employment vacancies to be advertised with a combined valuation of pay and pension rights; and for connected purposes.

Having been a Member for some time, I appreciate the way in which the ten-minute Bill procedure enables Members to make proposals that do not claim to revolutionise or transform our way of life but merely aim simply at practically to make things a bit better. I make no more claim for this Bill than that—a simple, practical and small change that would make pensions a bit better.

When I first sought a date to introduce the Bill, I did not realise that it would follow so quickly after the excellent Pensions Commission report. I was understandably nervous that my fox might be shot before today arrived. In fact, I am confident that the Bill would work effectively to support the Pensions Commission's recommendations. This is not the time to rehearse the detail of Lord Turner's proposals, but, as everyone now knows, he proposes a sensible balance between tax-funded, state-paid pensions, sufficient to lift most people out of means-testing, and invested pensions.

Even if—or, as I hope, when—the basic framework of the Turner report is implemented, state pension provision will lift most men and women only just above the basic level of pension income means-testing. A comfortable retirement will depend on the size of their second pension. My concern today is to support invested pensions and Turner's aim of encouraging through which employers provide more generous contributions than those in the proposed soft compulsion scheme.

"the maintenance of existing high quality pension provision"

The first report of the Pensions Commission showed that good quality employer pension provision is on the decline. It estimated that active membership of defined benefit schemes had fallen by 60 per cent. since 1995. It found that although a quarter of private sector employees were still members of salary-related schemes, only 14 per cent. of new employees were in such schemes. The report concluded:

"Rolling these trends forward, and even if the rate of closure now slows considerably,"

"scheme membership is likely to become a primarily public sector phenomenon."

Of course, when defined benefit schemes are closed, they are usually replaced by defined contribution schemes of one sort or another. Overall, Turner's judgment was that membership of employer provision was flat, or perhaps declining. However, it is clear that the average employer contribution to defined schemes is much lower than that to traditional defined benefit or final salary schemes. Employer contributions to defined benefit schemes were estimated at about 11 to 14 per cent. of salary, whereas such contributions to defined contribution schemes were about 4 to 7 per cent. Despite that downward trend, it is clear that employees with any employer contribution to their scheme are general much better placed than those with none.

We could debate the reasons for the decline in the best quality pensions at some length. There are many factors, and as a former Minister with responsibility for pensions I would have to include among them well-meaning regulation passed by Governments of both parties in response to the fears and concerns of our constituents. However, probably the most important factor is simply the changing nature of the competitive economy. The type of larger company that traditionally provided a good pension scheme is in long-term decline. It might be that the best final salary schemes never made hard, bottom-line economic sense, but such schemes were widely seen as part of companies' corporate social responsibility. By having such schemes, those companies made a significant contribution to not only their own success, but the wider economy.

Today's economic environment is much harsher and more globally competitive. Although many employers still understand the mixture of altruistic, paternalistic and self-interested arguments for good pension schemes, they are increasingly likely to be challenged by shareholders and accountants. In a competitive economy, some companies compete for business by cutting pension provision, or not making any provision at all. As always, the worst can drive down the standards of the rest.

We will still need good employer provision, even when Turner is implemented. The Pensions Commission report makes it clear that its proposals for state pensions and the soft compulsion of the national pension savings scheme would give average earners pensions of just under half their salary when they retire—and that would be at the older retirement age. If people want to receive traditional benefits such as those from a final salary scheme, or if they want a pension that is big enough to allow them to take early retirement, or a less pressured or part-time job before they get their state pension, they or their employers will need to make additional contributions.

If we want to retain the best employer provision that we can, we need to examine new ways to encourage and support good employer provision over and above the minimum that all employers should be required to do. We need to look at ways in which employers can see a clear business case—a clear labour market advantage—from a good pension scheme. That is precisely what the Bill is intended to do. It aims to make the value of employer pension contributions explicit to potential employees. By doing so, it will give better employers an edge in the labour market.

Most people simply do not realise how much a good employer's pension scheme can add to the value of a job. As a result, the quality of pension provision appears to play little role in determining the attractiveness of an employer to potential employees. However, it should, and this Bill would help to ensure that it did.

[Mr. John Denham]

Let us consider a job that would normally be advertised at an average salary of about £24,000 a year. According to Union Pension Services, a good typical final salary scheme is worth an extra £3,400 in employer contributions each year, so the job would be advertised not at £24,000, but at £27,400, which is an increase of 14 per cent. A typical public sector final salary scheme—of course these are now closed to new entrants, but I had to do these calculations on the figures available—is worth about an extra £2,900 in employer contributions, so the job would be advertised at a combined value of £26,900. A typical money purchase scheme is worth an extra £1,200 in employer contributions, so the job would be advertised at a combined value of £25,200. In comparison, a job that paid £24,000 a year where the employee is in the state second pension scheme but receives no additional contribution would be advertised at £24,000. For information purposes, a self-employed person would need to receive about £24,700 a year to gain the same financial benefit as an employee in the state second pension.

The Bill is a small practical step that will reward good employers by helping them to recruit and retain staff. It will make sure that the best employers can easily be identified by potential employees. It will also help to guard against the danger of the 3 per cent. employer contribution to the national pension savings scheme proposed by Turner becoming the standard employer contribution, rather than the baseline or a minimum. Any lasting pension reform will require a good deal of consensus across parties and outside the House, so I am pleased that my Bill has cross-party support. I pleased, too, that it has received the support of the National Association of Pension Funds—the leading voice of workplace pension provision in the UK. There are 10 million working people in NAPF member schemes, and about 5 million pensioners receive retirement income from such schemes. The NAPF chief executive, Christine Farnish, said:

"Millions of people are building up valued pension entitlements through workplace pension schemes. But there remains a lack of understanding among many about just how valuable a good pension scheme can be.

The new Bill would give employers with good pension schemes a deserved advantage in the labour market, and enable prospective employees to get a clear picture, in pounds and pence, of the value of the pension on offer.

People are becoming more aware of the value of a good pension when it comes to making job decisions. This Bill would help in making those decisions easier."

Age Concern, too, has welcomed the Bill and has referred to research from the Labour Research Department showing that more information about company pension schemes was the most common demand from people who have not yet joined a scheme.

Of course, the Bill would not place any additional burden on employers. I envisage that a standard actuarial approach would be agreed across the economy and that guidance to employers on the calculation of benefits would be provided each time the scheme is revalued. This is not a revolutionary Bill but it is a small, practical step that would make some improvement to pensions, so I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. John Denham, Ms Sally Keeble, Rob Marris, Dr. Alan Whitehead, Mr. Richard Benyon, Chris Huhne, Mr. Frank Field, Huw Irranca-Davies, Nick Herbert and Mr. Philip Dunné.

Employment (Advertisement of Pay and Pension Rights)

Mr. John Denham accordingly presented a Bill to require all employment vacancies to be advertised with a combined valuation of pay and pension rights; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on 3 March, and to be printed [Bill 93].

London Olympics Bill

As amended in the Committee, considered.

New Clause 3

OLYMPIC DELIVERY AUTHORITY: TRANSFER SCHEMES

(2) If the Secretary of State thinks it expedient in order to enable the Authority to carry out its functions, he may direct a person specified in subsection (3) to make a transfer scheme and submit it to him.

(3) Those persons are—

(a) the Greater London Authority,

(b) the London Development Agency, and

(c) Transport for London.

(4) If the Secretary of State directs a person to make and submit a transfer scheme—

(a) the person shall comply with the direction,

(b) the Secretary of State may approve the scheme with or without modification, and

(c) if approved, the scheme shall have effect.

(5) A direction of the Secretary of State under subsection (2) shall specify a date by which the transfer scheme is to be submitted.

(6) The Secretary of State may make a transfer scheme if—

(a) a person fails to comply with a direction under subsection (2), or

(b) the Secretary of State decides not to approve a scheme submitted under that subsection.

(7) A transfer scheme made under subsection (6) shall have effect.

(8) The Secretary of State may not approve or make a transfer scheme unless—

(a) he has consulted—

(i) the person who submitted or should have submitted the scheme,

(ii) the Olympic Delivery Authority, and

(iii) any other person who in his opinion may be affected by the scheme, and

(b) the Mayor of London consents.

(9) Schedule [Transfer Schemes] (which makes supplementary provision in connection with transfer schemes) shall have effect.'.—[Mr. Caborn.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.33 pm

The Minister for Sport (Mr. Richard Caborn): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this it will be convenient to discuss Government new schedule 1—Transfer Schemes.

Mr. Caborn: New clause 3 and new schedule 1 are needed to make the transfer of contracts to the Olympic delivery authority a quick and efficient process. In advance of the ODA being set up, the London Development Agency and Transport for London have been driving forward the work to deliver the games. We are grateful for that work, but a complication has developed as those authorities have had to enter into the first major contracts. Once the ODA is set up, those contracts and some of the equipment and people involved will have to be transferred to the ODA—the body that will ultimately deliver the Olympics.

Transferring a large number of individual contracts can be a lengthy and costly process. We want to avoid any unnecessary cost or delay. Where the Secretary of State thinks it necessary, the amendments allow for the creation of transfer schemes, which will ensure that contracts are efficiently moved from authorities such as the London Development Agency or Transport for London to the Olympic delivery authority. The Secretary of State may make a scheme if others have not complied with a direction or if their scheme has not been approved.

Using transfer schemes means that batches of contracts can be moved, requiring a single negotiation process rather than many individual ones. The Secretary of State will not be able to approve or make a scheme unless she has consulted the person who submitted it, or ought to have submitted it, the ODA and anyone who may be affected by it. She will also have to obtain the consent of the Mayor.

Transfer schemes are usual practice when setting up a new public body that takes over specific responsibilities from another public body. For example, the Greater London Authority Act 1999 used a similar process to transfer contracts to the GLA and TFL from predecessor bodies.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): As this is the first group of amendments on Report, I begin by thanking the Minister for extending the courtesy of a briefing for myself and the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) at the Department for Culture, Media and Sport on the amendments tabled since the Committee stage. May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to pass on my thanks to his civil servants who were responsible for that briefing and for other aspects of the Bill?

New clause 3 and new schedule 1 allow for the creation of transfer schemes to move contracts across from the Greater London Authority, the London Development Agency and Transport for London to the Olympic delivery authority. If the Secretary of State believes that it will best serve the ability of the ODA to carry out its functions, he or she may direct any of those bodies to make a transfer scheme.

I wholly accept that a single body is needed to manage public sector investment in staging the games if we are to be best placed to deliver the games on time and to budget. The ODA creates a single point of contact for various public sector organisations involved in the delivery of those games. However, as the new clause has been moved since the Committee stage, will the Minister answer a number of points when he winds up?

[Hugh Robertson]

First, what safeguards are in place to look after the interests of the originators of those contracts? Secondly, how will accountability be preserved once the transfer is effected from an elected body such as the GLA to the ODA? Finally, how can the House continue to exercise scrutiny? Subject to the Minister's reassurances on those three points, I am happy to signal my party's support.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I join the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) in thanking the Minister and his civil servants for the very helpful briefings that we have had in preparation for the moving of these and other amendments. I also thank the Minister and the hon. Gentleman for the close co-operation that there has been in relation to almost all aspects of the Bill, which means that there will be a fairly uncontroversial passage of much of what is to be debated this evening. However, the debate is an opportunity to raise remaining questions with the Minister. In view of the fact that a number of the powers of the GLA will be passed on to other bodies if the new clause and new schedule are agreed, will the Minister answer some further questions, in addition to those asked by the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent?

First, I seek the right hon. Gentleman's assurance that the GLA will be one of the organisations that are to be consulted on the Olympic transport plan, which is the subject of clause 9. Secondly, will the GLA be able to summons the ODA to public evidence sessions? What assurance can the Minister give that the GLA will be able to use section 61 of the Greater London Authority Act to summon the ODA in the way that I described? Finally, can the Minister provide an assurance that LOCOG—the London organising committee of the Olympic games—the other body being established by the Bill, will also have to comply with any reasonable request to appear before the assembly and to update the assembly on progress? With those assurances from the Minister, I can confirm that my party, too, is willing to support the amendments.

Mr. Caborn: I will pass on the thanks of the two hon. Gentlemen to my staff. Although there have been some disagreements, we have been able to resolve them in a fairly civilised way. I have no doubt that there will be votes on some of the politically contentious issues later this evening, but the Bill's progress shows how the nation has got behind the Olympic bid. We were awarded the Olympics on 6 July, and hopefully we can get the Bill through Parliament by early next year, which shows the strength of cross-party support.

The consultation process will be transparent and it will involve the Mayor's office and the originators. Anyone who wants to raise an objection will be able to do so. On accountability, the elected authority is accountable to the ODA, the ODA is responsible to the Olympic board and the Olympic board is responsible to the Secretary of State and this House. On scrutiny, six Select Committees are currently considering different aspects of the Olympics, and I am appearing before the Scottish Affairs Committee tomorrow. I assure hon. Members that a lot of scrutiny is going on.

Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Con): The assembly will have a role in deciding the impost on the London council tax payer, but will the Minister reassure us that it can expect the ODA to appear before it, if it has additional questions? Will such an extra layer of scrutiny be allowed?

Mr. Caborn: Yes, it will. I have no doubt that the ODA will want to make sure that its work is in the public domain and that it attracts a consensus.

I think that the answer is yes on the question of a public session with the ODA, but I will probably write to the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) to clarify the matter.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 1

LIMIT ON POWER OF GREATER LONDON AUTHORITY TO RAISE MONEY FROM COUNCIL TAX FOR EXPENDITURE ON LONDON OLYMPICS

'The Greater London Authority shall not raise more than £625 million from the council tax for expenditure in connection with the London Olympics.'. —[Hugh Robertson.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Hugh Robertson: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 3, in page 23, line 35 [Clause 33], at end insert—

'(2A) The Greater London Authority shall not raise more than £625 million from the council tax for the purpose of exercising the function under subsection (1).'.

Hugh Robertson: The amendment and the new clause were tabled in my name and that of the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster).

Let us be very clear about what is involved here. When a bid was first considered, the Government and the Mayor agreed a funding package of £2.375 billion to help meet the costs of staging the Olympics in London in 2012. That figure was made up of £1.5 billion from the lottery, 50 per cent. of which will come from existing sources and 50 per cent. from the new Olympic lottery games, £250 million from the London Development Agency and £625 million from London council tax payers.

Mr. Don Foster: I apologise for interrupting the hon. Gentleman so early in his speech and thank him for indicating that I support the amendment and the new clause. Will he confirm that in the agreement with the Mayor of London, the £625 million to which the hon. Gentleman has referred was made up of £550 million and a further £75 million, which may be drawn on only if it is necessary do so?

Hugh Robertson: The Olympic surcharge will start in April 2006, and Londoners will pay between £13.33 for a band A dwelling and £40 for band H. Some 69 per cent. of Londoners are in bands A to D and they will pay between £13.33 and £20.00, and 31 per cent. will pay between £24.44 and £40.00.

As Conservatives, we entirely support the principle that Londoners should make a contribution to the financing of the games. There are four main reasons for that. London is the host city, so it is likely to benefit most from tourism and promotion; London businesses will undoubtedly benefit enormously; the east end of London will be regenerated; and Londoners will have the world's greatest sporting event on their doorstep. It is therefore perfectly reasonable that they should make a financial contribution over and above the remainder of the United Kingdom. In short, we accept the figure of £625 million and signed up to it at the time of the bid.

4.45 pm

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): The hon. Gentleman is obviously right about his party. He will know that others of us who participated in the same election took the same position. Londoners were very happy to make a contribution over and above that made elsewhere, but they kept asking the question to which the amendment and new clause relate: will it be limited to that amount or open-ended? Unless we made it clear that it should be limited, they were not nearly as enthusiastic.

Hugh Robertson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for those comments. I think that he will reassured by what I am about to say.

It is fair to say that although we accepted the £625 million cost right from the outset, we—and, clearly, the Liberal Democrats—have had concerns about the possible effect on London council tax payers. The new tax will simply take the form of a larger levy on council tax bills, so it is not entirely transparent. There is no automatic cut-off after 2012. The extra money is not specifically ring-fenced for the Olympics, in obvious contrast to the congestion charge, where revenue is ring-fenced for value-for-money transport projects. There is no guarantee that the money will not be used to cross-subsidise funding shortfalls elsewhere—for example, if not enough tickets are sold.

Those initial concerns have been given further impetus by a number of factors that have become apparent in recent months and that have changed the position substantially since the initial plans for London 2012 were drawn up. First, we now know that previous games have substantially overrun their budgets. Local tax payers in Montreal are still paying off debts incurred at the 1976 Olympics. Sydney's budget of £1 billion eventually came to £2.8 billion. Athens' budget of £1 billion eventually became, as far as we know, £5 billion.

Secondly, security costs are likely to soar post-7 July. There cannot be a single Member of this House here today who genuinely believes that the international security situation will improve in the near future. If anything, it is likely to get worse.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): When the Culture, Media and Sport Committee, on which I served, first considered security, everybody was aware not only of the possible threat in Athens, where British security forces and police played an important role in ensuring the security of the games, but of the fact that there was already a heavy underwriting in terms of security measures. I do not think that, of itself, July this year will have made a significant difference. Does the hon. Gentleman have specific arguments on that?

Hugh Robertson: Yes, indeed I do. If one looks around London, it is fairly self-evident that security has been tightened immeasurably since 7 July, and rightly so—every Member would support that. I think that the security allowance in the Bill is £200 million. The Minister will correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. Caborn: It is £213 million.

Hugh Robertson: Given today's security situation, I cannot see how London can be kept entirely secure within that budget.

Thirdly, the Mayor has been commendably honest about the fact that his key aim is to regenerate the east end of London. That is not entirely compatible with the Government's priority ofdelivering the 2012 Olympics on time and to budget as the best games ever. Those conflicting priorities will inevitably put pressure on the budget. Fourthly, the cost of acquiring land in the lower Lea valley, and therefore of site assembly, has risen substantially since we won the bid on 6 July. Finally, as scrutiny of the financial markets shows, inflation in the construction sector is running at about 7 per cent. as a result of rising energy prices and the increased cost of raw materials. Natural disasters in the USA and Asia, allied to high demand in China, have rendered the original 3 per cent. prediction unworkable.

All Members know of the concern already felt by many of their constituents about rising council tax bills. They affect everyone, but particularly the elderly—who have no way of increasing their income to cope—and the vulnerable. We were happy to accept the original £625 million figure, although we had some worries about the lack of accountability. Since the plans were drawn up, however, the five factors that I have listed have led us to believe that Londoners should not be left with an open-ended commitment. Accordingly, I believe that the time has come to introduce a formal mechanism to ensure that Londoners receive a measure of protection.

Let me end with two pleas. First, I ask all London Members to consider a new clause that simply gives a statutory basis to the Government's own estimate of the cost of the games to council tax payers, and to support it. If they do not do so, they will risk inflicting a considerable extra bill on their constituents.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): So far, the hon. Gentleman has told us why London council tax payers should not make a larger contribution. If London council tax payers did not make the contribution, someone else would have to do so. Which of the other funding bodies does the hon. Gentleman think should do it?

Hugh Robertson: The hon. Gentleman is right, but it is difficult for me to give him an answer. Every time we have asked the question, the Minister has said—as I expect him to say in 20 minutes' time; indeed, he told me that he would do so—that the budget for the games was drawn up according to the most advanced formula ever and that there would be no cost overruns. If that is the case, let us flip the argument over—why should there not be a cap?

Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Con): Mary Reilly, chair of the London Development Agency, said in the Financial Times that the estimate of the cost of cleaning the land on which the games would take place had already doubled, which means an increase of hundreds of millions of pounds.

Hugh Robertson: Indeed; Mary Reilly made that point when she appeared before the Select Committee two weeks ago.

My second plea, on which I have touched already, is to the Minister. Although the new clause has cross-party support, it is perfectly possible that the Bill will be defeated in the other place, which will delay it. We are, after all, simply trying to give the Government's own calculations a statutory basis. Therefore I do not hesitate to urge the Minister and the House to accept the new clause.

Mr. Andy Reed: Having heard what the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) had to say, I have an opportunity to go a little further. I appreciate that many London Members, among others, will have a view on the level of council tax payments to the fund, but, as I said before, if the money does not come from London council tax payers, where is it to come from? The new clause makes no mention of that, which is why I offered the hon. Gentleman a chance to tell us.

I am quite confident about the £2.3 billion package, and I am sure that the Minister will confirm it. The figures that make up the package, which had cross-party support when we went to Singapore, represent a built-in flexibility based on the understanding that projects such as this always involve a cost overrun. The package assumes a potentially large overrun and builds in flexibility at a level that I consider acceptable.

I hope that the new clause will be rejected on the basis that, as I have said, it does not tell us where the rest of the contribution will come from. The hon. Gentleman knows that I am already anxious about the amount that will have to come from existing lottery funds. I should be more anxious if, as a result of the new clause, more money had to come from funds for grass-roots sport or other lottery contributions.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): The hon. Gentleman, like me, is worried about the amount that we are raising from the national lottery to fund the Olympics. I suggest, however, that instead of focusing on the new clause, he should focus on the Minister's reassurances that the £625 million is an accurate figure that will not be exceeded.

Mr. Reed: The Opposition have tabled a new clause and it is only right for us to respond. Indeed, I am delighted to do so.

There are other questions about funding. We know that 50 per cent. of the £1.5 billion from the lottery will come from existing lottery funds, and the other 50 per cent. from the new lottery game. Another £250 million is to come from the London Development Agency. It is bound to be difficult to raise the desired amount. So, if the money is not going to come from the London council tax payer, which other funding body will it come from? It is absolutely necessary that we have that information before we vote on the new clause.

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): The estimate of the cost of the Olympic games seems to have been made by the Treasury. If the new clause were reworded so that any cost overrun would be spread across the whole nation, or was met in some other way, would the hon. Gentleman be more inclined to support it?

Mr. Reed: I would be more inclined to support anything that went a bit further than this proposal, to be honest. As a non-London Member of Parliament, it would be dead easy to stand here and say, "It's great. The London council tax payers will pay", but I recognise that we will all benefit from the London Olympics in some way, particularly those of us in Loughborough.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): The chances of the London Olympic games coming in on budget are about the same as Scotland's chances of winning the World cup. There will be an overspend, and I share the hon. Gentleman's concerns about how it will be met. Will the Minister assure us that it will not come from the lottery? With £1.5 billion coming out of the lottery in the next 10 years, it will have suffered enough.

Mr. Reed: Obviously, I cannot give the hon. Gentleman that assurance, but I am sure that the Minister is listening. The hon. Gentleman and I have shared many a debate in the lead-up to the successful Olympic bid, and expressed our concerns about the potential impact on grass-roots sport of the Olympics needing new money from the existing lottery funds. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman has such a pessimistic view of Scotland's future, although I am not sure whether he meant the football World cup. I am sure that his constituents will be delighted to hear of his pessimism, however. I hope that Scotland does well in future world cup competitions, whatever the sport, but perhaps it will have a rethink in regard to the participation by the Scottish Football Association, which is denying not only its senior men a place in the 2012 competition, but the other teams that would benefit from joining England and possibly Wales as part of a UK team.

I had meant to make a very short contribution to ask for further information, but I seem to have attracted a number of interventions. I cannot support the new clause because it makes no mention of where the additional money would come from in the very unlikely event of costs to the lottery bill and the Olympic bill overrunning.

Mr. Don Foster: I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed), because he has teased the House with his suggestion that, if someone were to tell him where the overrun money would come from, he could support the new clause. Perhaps I can give him an answer to his question in a second, and if that is satisfactory to him, we shall look forward to seeing him in the Division Lobby shortly.

I was grateful to the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) for mentioning the Liberal Democrats' support for the new clause. It should have come as no surprise to him that we would support it, however, because my hon. Friend the Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) made it clear, back in the run-up to the June 2004 mayoral election—in which he was an extremely good candidate for the Liberal Democrats—that, while the Liberal Democrats would welcome the contribution of the people of London on account of the fact that they would be among the main beneficiaries of the Olympic and Paralympic games, that contribution should be capped so that Londoners knew where they stood.

The hon. Member for Loughborough shares with me, as the Member for the wonderful city of Bath, the certain knowledge that our constituents will benefit enormously from the games because we—along with Sheffield and other cities—have some of the premier sporting facilities in this country, which will no doubt be used by the visiting and home nation teams in the preparations for the games. That might offer a bit of a clue as to where the contribution might come from, should there be an overrun.

Before discussing the possibility of such overruns, let me say that I joined the Minister, the Secretary of State, the leader of my party, the leader of the Conservative party and the Prime Minister in putting up my hand and saying to the International Olympic Committee that we believed that our bid was backed by an extremely robust financial plan. We made it clear that we were so confident that we had learned the lessons from previous Olympics that we were certain that an overrun—which others described as probable—was not likely to happen. Nevertheless, the hon. Member for Loughborough challenges us to say where the money should come from in the event of an overrun. If he wants the answer, he should examine what we told the IOC when we bid for the games in the first instance, because our bid document provides the answer.

Our full bid statement made it clear that we were committing the United Kingdom Government to be the ultimate guarantor in the event of any shortfall, including any shortfall in the operating budget of the London organising committee for the Olympic games. When the IOC evaluated our submission, it said clearly:

"The UK Government has guaranteed it would act as the ultimate financial guarantor to cover any shortfall from the Games."

It went on to say—as I suggested, I am not surprised—that the "budget appears to be reasonable and achievable".

The position is therefore clear. Let me say to the hon. Member for Loughborough that I am confident that there will be no overrun or budget shortfall. Should that eventuality occur, however, it is not right for London council tax payers to pay more than what appears to me to be their fair share.

I suspect that, in a minute, the Minister will tell us that if we remove the responsibility from London council tax payers, that will lift any pressure on the Greater London authority and the Mayor to bear down on costs. Clearly, that is not the case. As I said in an intervention on the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent, London has pledge £550 million, with an extra £75 million to call on if needed. Clearly, it is in the interests of the Mayor of London and all GLA members to ensure that even that £75 million is not called on. Within the deal, there is a mechanism to exert downward pressure on costs. It is perhaps also worth reflecting that the Government are not currently making a direct contribution to the Olympics and Paralympics, but are seeking that money from all sorts of other bodies. At the same time, however, the Government will generate significant revenues as a result of the games coming to this country. Later, we will debate one source of revenue—the VAT on the Olympic lottery game.

Susan Kramer (Richmond Park) (LD): Does not my hon. Friend agree that as Londoners are sharing the risk of overruns, a portion of the revenue gains that eventually come to the Treasury ought to flow back to London to cover Londoners' investment in the games? The Treasury is a winner, but it ought to be willing to share some of that win and cover London's costs, too.

Mr. Foster: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point, but answering it would be beyond my pay grade. My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) might have a few comments to make in respect of that proposal, and I suggest that she take the issue up with him, rather than persuading me to risk his ire by responding.

One thing is absolutely clear: London council tax payers still have a mechanism to exert that financial pressure and to keep the costs as low as possible. The Government, who are currently not making a contribution, but will gain considerable revenue as a result of the games, also demonstrate that they, too, will exercise pressure to keep the cost down. That is shown by the welcome decision by the Secretary of State, the London organising committee for the Olympic games and others to reject the proposals for the swimming pool complex. Evidence therefore already shows that measures are being taken to keep the price down.

It would be wrong, however, to put ourselves in a position whereby London council tax payers are left in uncertainty about their financial responsibilities. They are rightly being asked to contribute to the cost of the games because of the significant benefits that London will gain, but it is equally right, as the new clause proposes, to cap the contribution so that London tax payers know what they are paying for and for how long. That should be the end of the matter.

Chris Bryant: I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster). However, I noted that he referred to the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) as an especially fine former mayoral candidate but did not describe the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer) in the same terms. I do not know whether there is some split in the Liberal Democrat party or whether the hon. Member for Bath is trying to curry favour with his president.

[Chris Bryant]

As the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) said, the new clause is predicated on the belief that there will a cost overrun. He gave various reasons for that, such as land values and added security, and argued that those factors have not yet been properly costed. The hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart) denounced his nation's sporting prowess in declaring that there would be an overrun.

If one considers every other country in the world that has held the Olympics, one realises that, when Opposition politicians tried to make political capital by starting to talk about overruns, they made them a political inevitability. The Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport examined all those countries in detail and found that that was the case. I therefore hope that the debate will not perpetuate the canard that the games must necessarily overrun. The bid model was put together on an extremely robust financial basis and tight analysis was made not only of security and land value issues, and how they might change, but—perhaps most significantly—London Transport's financial needs.

At one point, inadequate provision had been made to ensure that public transport needs in London would be met, but, following the first IOC visit, when its members commented on that, substantial and sufficient adjustments were made.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): I accept the hon. Gentleman's point, but if there is an overrun, how would he feel if the people of Rhondda were asked to chip in to pay for it?

Chris Bryant: I was about to deal with that point. I suspect that there would not be much support in the country for taking more money out of lottery funds in the case of an overrun, not least because, if we have no decently funded Olympic athletes, there is not much point in holding the Olympics in this country. I hope that Rhys Jones, the grandson of my predecessor but two, Alec Jones, will be an Olympic athlete in the triathlon in the 2012 Olympics. I hope that there will be a proper funding stream for elite athletes, including those in the Rhondda and the rest of Wales, in Scotland and in Bath. That is why I do not support raiding the lottery.

I do not want a significant extra amount of money to be charged to the taxpayer in the case of an overrun. However, it is wrong to establish a fixed figure as the fair share, which the hon. Member for Bath mentioned, that the London taxpayer should pay as opposed to a share—in other words, a percentage. If there is an overrun, I believe that London taxpayers should pay a fair share of it, rather than a fixed amount, which is proposed in the new clause.

I say to the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent that it is, I think, the first time that I have heard an amendment spoken to on the basis that the other place will implement it anyway. That is an undemocratic and rather strange way to proceed with our business. It is an important principle that we have our debates in this place first and resolve them, and then subsequently reflect on what the other place decides to do or not to do. We have heard several times since the general election that the Conservative party and the Liberal Democrats say that all the previous conventions on how we do business between this place and the other place have been swept aside. I thought that the hon. Gentleman was slightly more sweeping today.

Hugh Robertson: I was simply making the point that if there is not some movement, and bearing in mind that there is cross-party support, there is a danger that their lordships will overturn that which is proposed. Bearing in mind that there has been cross-party support throughout the Bill's passage, I seek to avoid that opportunity.

Chris Bryant: I still think that the hon. Gentleman is coming remarkably close to threatening that whatever happens in this democratically elected Chamber, the Opposition will seek to overturn the will of this Chamber in another place. That is unfortunate. The argument has not been made for the new clause and I hope that it will fall.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): I endorse the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) and agree with what he is trying to achieve through the new clause.

Many of us who are sports lovers in London have faced the difficulty of the half-hearted and perhaps lukewarm support for the Olympic bid. I was delighted to see the scenes on 6 July, but I have expressed concerns over many years about the costs of the Olympic games. I have always felt that the Mayor of London, Ken Livingstone, is likely to issue a blank cheque. I put that proposition to the Secretary of State a year or two ago, and it was pooh-poohed, but I fear that that will be the reality.

Overall expenditure is supposed to be £2.375 billion. A robust case was made by the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) that there will not necessarily be an overrun. He is right to say that we should not start in a negative frame of mind, but experience shows that there have been significant overruns. Clearly, we hope that there will be great commercial gains, which will ensure that quite a lot of money comes into central coffers, but we should recall that Sydney's cost overrun increased almost threefold from £1 billion to £2.8 billion. That must be of great concern to us all—Londoners and everyone else in the United Kingdom—because it is in all our interests not to have an overrun.

The big issue is that, in essence, London council tax payers will be subject to a massive multiplier effect. The overall costings of £2.375 billion presume £1.5 billion of lottery funding. I entirely understand what the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart) said but I do not necessarily share his reluctance to see the cap lifted.

At present, it is suggested that £250 million could come from the London Development Agency and £625 million from the London council tax payer. If the overall cost is not £2.375 billion and is, let us say, £3 billion, that will in essence be equivalent to a 100 per cent. multiplier effect on the London council tax payer. That is how the additional £625 million will be raised.

It is to be hoped that we will not have a Sydney-type massive cost overrun of perhaps £2 billion, because that additional £2 billion would fall on London council tax payers to pay. That would be entirely unacceptable. London council tax payers would effectively be paying for the blank cheque to which I referred in the House only about 18 months ago.

Richard Ottaway: May I assist my hon. Friend with his figures? The back of a fag packet calculation that I have done is that an overrun of £0.5 billion would add £140 to the bill for every band D household.

Mr. Field: I thank my hon. Friend. I hope that he is not smoking those fags either in this place or anywhere else; perhaps he is still entitled to do so. That is the nub of the problem. In essence, in London, the risk is that we will find ourselves with an enormous burden for many years to come. Already concerns have been expressed by hon. Friends and, I think, Labour Members about the costs that are likely to be imposed upon London taxpayers. As it is the cost is likely to be £20, £30 or £40 a year over 20 years. It could be considerably worse given the multiplier effect to which I have referred.

I notice that my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Pelling) is no longer in his place but he rightly referred to the fact that the chairman of the London Development Agency, Mary Reilly, has admitted that the costs of preparing the Olympic site could double from the planned £478 million to £1 billion. If that became a cost overrun, rather than being dealt with by the budgets that have been agreed, that would, once again, penalise council tax payers in London fairly soon. Those are great concerns.

Anyone who has been to the Lower Lea valley site will have seen that it is greatly contaminated. It is difficult to estimate the likely cost of cleaning that land and ensuring that it is fit for purpose. Inevitably, there is always some optimism in putting forward a strategy and I accept that a robust financial case was made—it was not just a lot of cascading figures—but, very quickly, however robust the financial case, things can go horribly awry. It looks as though the cost of clearing up the site is likely to be significantly more than the £478 million that was mooted at the outset.

Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to make this brief contribution. My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent has made a sensible suggestion and I hope that the House will seriously consider it. I am particularly glad that it has cross-party support; the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) supports it. It is wrong that London taxpayers should suffer from the potentially ruinous multiplier effect to which I have referred. There may be some merit in the comment of the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) that the £625 million should not be the cap if there were to be a massive cost overrun. I am sure that London taxpayers would be happy to pay their share, but the reality is that, with a cost overrun, they will pay 100 per cent. of every pound in excess. That would not be the right way forward.

Pete Wishart: Curiously, I find myself joining the Minister in opposing the new clause. I find absurd the suggestion that Londoners and London MPs should simply walk away if all this goes financially pear-shaped, which a number of us anticipate, and leave the rest of us in the United Kingdom to pick up the pieces. London has secured the most extraordinary and fantastic regeneration programme for the east end. It is about to receive the most generous, extravagant input of public money through the lottery to pay for the bulk of the games and for that regeneration. Therefore, London cannot simply walk away when those financial shortcomings come home to roost and expect the rest of the nation to pick up the pieces. That would not be fair, right or proper.

Richard Ottaway: Can the hon. Gentleman remind the House how much the Scottish Parliament cost?

Pete Wishart: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for mentioning that. I will refer to the Scottish Parliament in my speech and give him the full figures for the extraordinary increase in its cost. [Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman will just be patient, I will come to that.

In this debate, I have heard London Members saying that Londoners will continue to pay for the games through the council tax. Londoners are paying for a sizeable proportion of the London Olympic games and that is right and fair because it is London that stands to gain from all the fantastic regeneration. I suggest that £625 million is a snip to pay for what will be the largest regeneration programme in the next 10 years, anywhere in the world. It is cheap at half the price. I will now answer the question from the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway). The total cost of the Scottish Parliament was £450 million, so now we have compared costs.

I could go on about how the Olympics is part of a general package and general process that always seems, inevitably, to secure large infrastructure projects for London. The rest of the UK continues to pay for that. London is the richest, most prosperous part not just of the UK but of the whole of Europe. I shall spare you from any more of that argument, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because I am sure that you have heard it being kicked around before during debates in this House; indeed, it has been discussed for the past 10, 20 or 30 years.

The benefits for London of this regeneration are fantastic. The regeneration of east London alone will create more than 3,000 jobs, and its local economy will benefit by £70 million. It has been concluded that London could make up to £500 million from the tourism legacy—an extraordinary, incredible figure. Given these fantastic legacies, London should be embarrassed at the suggestion that it should walk away from its responsibilities if things go pear-shaped. If things do go wrong, it will not be the fault of the taxpayer or the lottery player; nor will taxpayers elsewhere in the United Kingdom, or lottery players outwith the metropolitan area, share in this legacy. London alone will benefit.

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that although the Olympic games will obviously benefit London greatly, his constituency, mine and all other Scottish constituencies will also benefit greatly from the sporting opportunities provided for young people? I also hope that the Scottish Executive and Scotland will make the most of the tourism opportunities, and get people to go north of the border once they have been to the London Olympics.

Pete Wishart: Absolutely. There is genuine enthusiasm in Scotland for an Olympic games, and there is massive enthusiasm for a separate Scottish Olympic team—an idea that I hope the hon. Lady supports.

Jo Swinson indicated dissent.

Pete Wishart: Some 78 per cent. of the Scottish people believe that we should have our own Scottish team in the 2012 Olympics. I hope that the hon. Lady will join me in trying to achieve what would be a fantastic addition to the London games. [Interruption.] I am sure that the Minister agrees and that he would love to see a Scotland team competing at the London games.

Chris Bryant: The hon. Gentleman has already decried his Scottish sporting prowess, so there is no point in his trying to rescue his reputation. Lots of people working on the site of the new Wembley stadium come from south Wales, Yorkshire and other places throughout the country. Surely the important point is that the industry that will build the Olympic site will not be just a London one. The whole community will benefit and if the hon. Gentleman cannot see that, he needs to get some better political spectacles. [Interruption.]

Pete Wishart: As the hon. Member for Croydon, South suggests from a sedentary position, Estonia, Lithuania and other parts of eastern Europe will also provide labour for this project; all the best of luck in that regard.

This new clause is about what will happen if there is overspend, and as sure as night follows day, there will be; it is living in cloud cuckoo land to believe otherwise. As we have heard, the Sydney games overran by twice the projected amount, and the Athens games—the last to be held in Europe—overran by five times the original figure. It is almost too far-fetched to believe that there will be no overspend for the 2012 games.

We need to look at the UK's record on delivering these large infrastructure projects, and it is utterly appalling. This House decided that the Scottish Parliament should cost £50 million; it came in at 10 times more. The taxpayer is still paying for the absurdity that was the millennium dome, and the Jubilee line extension is another testament to how overspends are becoming a feature of these massive infrastructure projects. I am desperate to find an answer to the question of who should pay for this overspend, should it occur and the new clause and amendment be accepted. Most important, what is the fairest way to finance it, should that prove necessary?

The Government are committed to financing any overspend, and although the Minister made it clear in Committee that they are in charge on this issue, he was very coy about how such overspend should be met. I should like to hear a little more on that. I again appeal to him: please do not touch the lottery any further. Some £1.5 billion will come from the lottery in the next 10 years, and our grass-root sports, charities and good causes will experience real pain and suffering. Please leave the lottery out of this one. If a shortfall should occur, it would be unsustainable for London to draw any more money from good causes and charities.

London knew what it was getting into when it bid for these games. It knew of the recent experience of games held in Europe; it knew about the examples of Athens and Sydney; it knew that there had been overspends. It should have read the small print on the tin, saying, "Shares in Olympics can go down, as well as up." All this was overlooked in the general hype and the enthusiasm for bringing the games to London. We all heard about how great the games would be for London and for the rest of the UK. If everything goes well and London benefits from the games, it will be great, but if it all goes pear-shaped, it should not be left to the rest of the United Kingdom to pick up the tab. I oppose the new clause and amendment and I ask all fair-minded hon. Members to do the same.

Simon Hughes: I rise to support my hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) and the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson). I wish to add a couple of points that may persuade many hon. Members, and not only those from London, of the merits of the case. The House may be aware that I am a great enthusiast for the Olympic games. I was really keen that we should make a bid and before the mayoral elections, I made it clear that I supported the Government—as did the Conservative candidate. In case the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) has another go at my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer) who was my predecessor as candidate—and an excellent candidate she was, too—I should make it clear that she and our party in London also believed that it was right to support the games.

Concerns were expressed, as might be expected in our capital city, not only in political circles but by ordinary members of the public, that the project might run out of control financially. Therefore, we watched with interest in the last Parliament—before the last mayoral election—as the negotiations went on between the Mayor of London, Ministers and others about the funding package. The negotiations produced a split between a London contribution, a lottery contribution and a London Development Agency contribution. It was also proposed that the games themselves, once everything had been built, would be self-financing.

I wish to give a couple of reasons for supporting the amendment. First, it is of course the case that people in Loughborough and Bath are further away from the games than people in London, and people in Perth and North Perthshire are further away still. However, people in Hillingdon or Uxbridge, or on the edge of north-west London and in Watford, or on the southern edge of Croydon, which is almost into Surrey, will receive no direct benefit from the regeneration of the east end, any more than people in Loughborough or Wales or Scotland. They may be part of Greater London, but in many ways they consider themselves to live in Surrey, Hertfordshire or Middlesex, so they too want to know that they will not be asked to pay an undue amount. It is different for people who live in Hackney or Tower Hamlets, because they know that they will benefit directly from projects connected with the Olympics, such as the extension of the East London line, the development of the Lea valley and the legacy of housing and sports facilities. That is not the case for people a long way away on the other side of the largest metropolis in Europe.

Secondly and self-evidently, another of the contributions comes from Londoners—the LDA contribution. The LDA is one of the four children of the Greater London Authority, just like the Metropolitan Police Authority. So although the LDA is regarded as a separate heading in the funding streams, the money will not fall out of a tree and it certainly will not come out of the Mayor's pocket. It will come from Londoners. It gets money from other places, but it is basically a London kitty to which Londoners make a contribution.

Mr. Caborn: The budget of the LDA, like any other development agency, comes from the Exchequer.

Simon Hughes: But the reality is that when the Mayor stands for election and determines how much he will charge as a precept across the authority, some of the money that is collected can be spent on the sort of things that are done by the LDA. I accept that some of the LDA's money comes from the Exchequer, but—I stand to be corrected on this point—not all of it comes from the Government. The authority raises some of the money itself; some of it comes from joint schemes with the London boroughs and some of it indirectly from people who visit London. Certainly, businesses and individuals perceive that they contribute to all the budgets for all the spending streams from the Mayor's office, of which the Mayor administers one, and that is where pressure can be applied.

5.30 pm

The hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart) pointed out that the proposal would mean capping the burden on Londoners at the expense of the Scots. That is a dangerous road to take. I do not want to be divisive, but I must put the case on the record: London contributes about 15 per cent. net to the UK economy, which is far more than it receives. Under the Barnett formula, Scotland has done very well, far better per capita than the rest of the United Kingdom. That is part of the constitutional development of the UK. London continues to raise, and spend, money and puts it into the UK kitty. As a capital city, it is happy to do so, but the hon. Gentleman would be wrong to think that we do not constantly make a significant contribution to Scotland.

Pete Wishart: I accept some of what the hon. Gentleman says. However, we have only to consider what happened yesterday, when the Chancellor had to impose a windfall tax on Scotland's North sea oil to pay for all the shortcomings in the economy, to see how much Scotland contributes to the general economy of the UK.

Simon Hughes: I do not say for a second that Scotland does not make a huge contribution to the UK economy, and I know well the history of the debate about the oil around the shores of the UK, including Scotland. Of course we remember yesterday's announcement, but the capital city of the United Kingdom has contributed for as long as the hon. Gentleman and I can remember to the United Kingdom's coffers, and that money has been spent throughout the UK.

Furthermore, of the 10 most deprived local authorities in the UK, five are in London, including the east end. If we want to ensure that there is fairness, it is wrong and improper to say that London is a great and affluent place that will benefit hugely. Some areas need to benefit as they have been deprived; inner-city areas, especially in capital cities, are often deprived.

There will be benefits for London and, as people travel in and out of London, those benefits will be shared before, during and after the games with people throughout the UK. I am talking not just about hope, expectation, aspiration, ambition and motivation, but also about opportunities for training and for individuals and teams to visit between 2008 and 2012, and the legacy.

There will be other, indirect, effects. A local London paper reported recently that, as a result of the Olympics, the costs of housing in London, both rented and purchased, are likely to be considerably higher than in other parts of the country, much more so in the east end. Many costs will be borne and the new clause proposes a cap on the element of the cost that is part of the deal whereby, as part of the formula, every London household puts more into the kitty.

Mr. Don Foster: Will my hon. Friend confirm that his understanding of the proposal is the same as mine? We are talking about a cap on the contribution paid by the council tax payers of London, but were there to be an overrun, which we do not believe is likely, it would be funded by all taxpayers throughout the country, including London taxpayers, who, as my hon. Friend has rightly pointed out, make a rather greater contribution in that regard than taxpayers in other parts of the country. We would not be capping the total contribution of Londoners.

Simon Hughes: My hon. Friend is right. Nobody is saying that Londoners would not have to bear their share of the burden if, despite the undertakings and expectations, there was an additional cost. We would pay our fair share like everybody else, but we are already making a specific extra commitment. We know that we have to do that; it could be for 10 or 12 years, which is not insignificant, especially for people on the lowest incomes, so we think that contribution should be capped.

As you would imagine, Mr. Deputy Speaker, this proposal has been debated across the political parties in London. As the Minister knows, when it went to the London Assembly, 14 members of the Assembly across all parties, including the Minister's, supported it; no one opposed it.

Chris Bryant: Funny, that.

Simon Hughes: The hon. Gentleman says, "Funny, that". People are elected, as he was elected for the Rhondda, to represent the people in their communities. What I am trying to say is that this issue is not divisive politically; there is a unity of view. Just as there is a broad unity of view in London that we should have the games, that we shall make a great success of the games and that we want the games to do well, there is equally a view that there should be a financial responsibility on all of us—a discipline that limits the amount that we expect Londoners to pay. If that can be agreed, it will be an additional reason why Londoners will support the games and the planning for the games in the years ahead with even greater enthusiasm. I hope that, if the Minister does not accept the proposal today, he will at least accept its merit and agree that it may have to be part of the eventual outcome of the deliberations on the Bill.

Mr. Caborn: Before I address the details of the new clause, I want to make a couple of comments about how we approached the decision to bid for the Olympics. We took the decision only after a lot of discussion with cities that had run the Olympics. We asked what they would do differently if they got to run the games again, and many of them told us, "You must make sure that the budgets that are put in place are robust, and will stand examination over time". We therefore adopted that approach, and were commended for it by the evaluation team—the IOC. So we believe that the formula, which I shall outline later—the memorandum of understanding between the Government and the Mayor—is the right way to proceed in order to ensure best management practice in running the games, particularly from a financial perspective.

It would be unfortunate if the House of Lords decided to delay the Bill on the basis of this issue. I say that for the simple reason that we received another crucial message from cities that had hosted the games: that the quicker we set up the company—the ODA—and lay the contracts, the farther we shall be from the end date and the more we shall be in the driving seat and able to control costs. That is why, as I acknowledged earlier, we are grateful for the support that we have had from all political parties and for the way in which the House has dealt with the Bill. We won the games on 6 July and we could well get legislation on the statute book by the early part of next year.

Terminal 5 has been mentioned as a major construction project—in fact, the major construction project in Europe at this stage. It will cost just under £5 billion, it will come in on time and it may well come in well under budget. We are working closely with the team guiding that project. It should be recognised that more apprentices have been trained at terminal 5 than in the whole of the construction industry put together, so the hon. Member who was quipping from a sedentary position about Romanian, Polish and other labour should re-examine that comment and go and look at terminal 5, which is a credit to the construction industry and to the British Airports Authority. About 8,000 people are working on the terminal, but as my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) said, tens of thousands of people around the country are part of the supply chain, providing high-quality engineering—a supply chain that is probably the envy of the world. If we apply that type of management to the scheme that we are now embarking upon for the Olympics, I am pretty sure that all that we said we would do in our candidate file is deliverable, so we stand by the statements.

We have debated proposals of this type before. It would place a cap on the amount of council tax income that might ever be spent on preparing for the games. We cannot agree to such a cap, and I hope that when I have restated the reasons, the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) will feel able to withdraw his amendment.

It is true that, as the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) said, the Government and the Mayor have agreed that the GLA will make available £550 million towards the public sector funding package, with a further £75 million if required. That is how the hon. Gentleman gets his total of £625 million. The Mayor's contribution will be raised through the GLA precept on council tax, starting in the 2006–07 financial year.

We have no intention of letting costs run out of control, and the Government and the GLA will make every effort in managing the Olympic project to keep to the original budget. However, if costs exceed the provision allowed for in the public sector funding package, the memorandum of understanding between the Mayor and the Government states that the costs should be met through a

"sharing arrangement to be agreed as appropriate with the Mayor of London and through seeking National Lottery funding in amounts to be agreed at the time."

I want to clear up a misunderstanding about land acquisitions by the London Development Agency. Small amounts of money may well have come from elsewhere, but the vast majority of the LDA's work has been directly funded by council tax. The LDA has been responsible for purchasing the land. Indeed, any overrun on price as the cost of land increases will not directly affect the council tax funding.

Let us consider the assets on the balance sheet post-2012. It is true that the LDA purchased considerable amounts of land well before 6 July and the price started to escalate, but those assets will stay on the LDA's books. I do not know what will happen if there is an overrun on the funding arrangements, but the assets acquired by the LDA—they are London's assets, not central Government's—could well be deployed. So the memorandum of understanding is an agreement that we would share that responsibility, depending on the prevailing conditions at the time.

Mr. Mark Field: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman can clarify the situation in the interests of all London council tax payers today and in the future. Is he saying that the LDA will be obliged to liquidate some of its assets and therefore release some of the perhaps substantial property gains made to fund any possible overrun?

Mr. Caborn: I am not saying that at all. What I am saying is that such things will be reviewed at the time. That is why we are not prepared to accept the new clause. It would be wrong at this stage to include that type of cap on the various funding streams. That could be deployed at a later stage.

Simon Hughes: I agree with the Minister when he suggests that, if the land held by the LDA were to increase in value significantly, logically, that increase should be used to reduce the general council tax burden. That is my understanding of one of the reasons why that was put into the original memorandum.

Mr. Caborn: Absolutely. That is why we say that all those factors will be taken into account. The memorandum of understanding mentions:

"amounts to be agreed at the time."

That is what the MOU is all about, and the way that it has been interpreted by some hon. Members is fundamentally wrong. We believe that this is the right approach. It would not be prudent at this stage to close off any of those funding options to meet a hypothetical future shortfall by capping the amount of council tax that the Mayor may raise. The GLA takes exactly the same view.

In the event of cost overrun, the Government and the Mayor will need to consider all the options available to them. It is right that council tax will fund some of the games, as they will bring a great many benefits to Londoners—again, that has been explained already this evening—but we have no intention of making a dramatic raid on ordinary council tax payers. If cost overruns were to occur, we would want to balance any possible costs sensitively to avoid imposing punitive costs on individual households. Nevertheless, the Olympic project will be overseen jointly by the Government and the GLA. Under the existing funding and governance arrangements, we have shared interests in running things properly and keeping down costs. That is the right way to do things.

We must ensure that we retain a shared interest in keeping down costs, but it would be entirely imprudent to cap the liability of one of those parties at this early stage in the process. It is therefore vital that everyone involved should have the maximum incentive to remain hawkish about keeping down the costs. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already called in the aquatic centre proposals because of the possible cost overrun. I send a very clear message to all those who will be involved in contractual agreements that we will expect them to keep to those costs. That can be done—it can be done by the type of management that we have at terminal 5.

The Government feel that it would be irresponsible to place a statutory limit on council tax funding at the outset of the Olympic project. I reassure hon. Members again that in the unlikely and unfortunate scenario in which costs run over budget, we would sit down with the Mayor to work out a sensible solution that would not cripple the average household. The Mayor and the GLA are content with that reassurance, so I hope that hon. Members will also accept it and that the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent will withdraw the motion.

5.45 pm

Hugh Robertson: Time is marching on and we have a great deal more to debate tonight. I am afraid that we have reached a position in which there is a straightforward divide between the Government and the main Opposition parties, so I will press the new clause to a Division.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New Clause 2

PAYMENTS TO LONDON ORGANISING COMMITTEE IN RESPECT OF OLYMPIC LOTTERIES

'(1) The Secretary of State shall from time to time pay to the London Organising Committee such sums as are, in his opinion, equivalent to the sums paid into the Consolidated Fund as a result of the operations of any Olympic Lottery.

(2) The London Organising Committee shall use any sums paid to it under subsection (1) for the benefit of sport.

(3) In this section "Olympic Lottery" means a lottery so designated by virtue of section 21(1) of the Horserace Betting and Olympic Lotteries Act 2004 (c. 25) (licensing of Olympic Lotteries).'. —[Hugh Robertson.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Hugh Robertson: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I tabled the new clause with my hon. Friend the Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) in the light of the omission in yesterday's pre-Budget report of any extra funding for elite athletes who are training for the Olympic games and of increasing concerns among sports outside the Olympic movement about the amount of funding available.

The parliamentary background to the new clause is well documented. The new Olympic lottery games were established under section 3 of the Horserace, Betting and Olympic Lottery Act 2004. It provided for four things: a regulator, the National Lottery Commission, to license lottery games; the establishment of a fund to hold the proceeds generated by the new games; the establishment of a body to distribute money held in the fund; and the principle that money held in the fund would be distributed to meet the costs of staging the 2012 Olympic and Paralympic games.

As the Bill passed through the House, my party raised two concerns—the start time, which we felt should coincide with the Athens Olympics, and the tax take—so the amendment is nothing new. We know that the Government plan to use £1.5 billion from lottery sources to finance the games—£750 million will come from existing sources and £750 million from the new Olympic lottery games. As money from the new games will be split in the same way as existing lottery proceeds, we know that 50 per cent. will go to the winners, 28 per cent. will go to good causes—in this case, the Olympic games—12 per cent., and this is the crucial figure, will go to the Government in tax, 5 per cent. in commission to retailers, 4.5 per cent. in operating costs and 0.5 per cent. to Camelot.

It is therefore relatively easy to calculate that if the 28 per cent. earmarked for good causes—in this case, the Olympic games—has to fund the £750 million that the Government are looking for, total lottery sales from the new games must be about £2.68 billion. The Government's tax take—12 per cent.—is £320 million, which is how we arrive at that figure.

The British Olympic Association has already announced its intention to move Great Britain from 10th to fourth in the medal table. It is a brutal fact of life that the public will judge the success of the 2012 games by the number of medals we win. The BOA has calculated that an extra £25 million is needed each and every year to deliver on that commitment, with an extra £25 million needed for minor sports. The BOA expected that from yesterday's pre-Budget report and was cruelly disappointed.

Furthermore, sports outside the Olympic movement, and particularly the main mass participation sports of football, cricket, tennis and both codes of rugby, supported the London 2012 bid precisely because of its generic benefit to sport. They should receive enormous credit for this, as it enabled British sport to present an unusually united front to the International Olympic Committee. However, now that the games are secured, they are, quite reasonably, asking what this means for them. They have a number of concerns.

First, the new Olympic lottery game could lead to a diversion of funds from existing lottery games, meaning less money in the pot for those sports. Secondly, the diversion of a further £750 million from existing lottery sources will obviously mean that less money is available for non-Olympic sports. As a practical example of the effect that this will have, the Rugby Football League told me that it had planned to bid for the 2012 World cup. It now fears that lottery funds will not be available to finance that.

Thirdly, Government reforms to the lottery, by moving away from the four original pillars—sport, the arts, charities and heritage—mean that there is less money available in the first place. Fourthly, all four of the major sport national governing bodies have told me that they worry that UK Sport is becoming Olympics-dominated in its thinking. That is entirely understandable, but it is vital that we do not lose focus on mass participation sports, which, with the best will in the world, is what the vast majority of people will be playing in the seven years up to 2012 and beyond.

Fifthly, the sponsorship needed for London 2012 to be a commercial success is, I am told, twice that of the current market value. Although London 2012 will undoubtedly attract new sponsors, it is inevitable that some of sport's existing sponsors will, for obvious reasons, be lured towards the Olympics. As commercial companies do not have unlimited resources, that is bound to impact on the everyday sports. The sponsorship market will fall and that will impact on grass-roots activity.

Finally, there is the possibility of disruption to the UK's sporting calendar as a result of the IOC's prohibition on major sporting events during the period of the games. I know from my discussions with the Rugby Football League that the super league season, which runs from February to October, faces disruption, as does the Challenge cup final at Wembley on the August bank holiday. The England and Wales Cricket Board made clear its concerns at an all-party cricket group dinner the other week that its ICC future tours programme is already projected until 2013. I know and accept that there is scope for negotiation with the IOC but—this is the important point—many sports outside the Olympic movement have made compromises without, as yet, seeing any return.

There are two arguments here, one moral and one practical. The moral argument is that given that the Olympics is a one-off, national event, it is utterly iniquitous that the Chancellor should seek to fill his coffers in this fashion. The practical argument is that the concerns of sports inside and outside the Olympic movement could be met by the Government allocating the £320 million that they intend to take in tax from the new Olympic lottery games to the benefit of sport.

I can do no better than quote directly from the chief executive of the British Olympic Association, who, in the absence from the pre-Budget report yesterday of an increase in Government funding to train our elite athletes, said:

"This is devastating news for the Olympic Governing Bodies and the aspirations that we all have for delivering successful results at the 2008 and 2012 Olympic Games."

Even UK Sport, the Government's own quango, whose chair is a Government special adviser, said:

"We're disappointed because we want the best chance of success for our athletes."

On the other side of the fence, among the mass participation sports, the chief executive of the Football Association said recently:

"We have some concerns that the Government's concentration of effort and funding on the Games, whilst understandable"— it is fair to say that everybody accepts that—

"may inadvertently lead to a lack of support for the regular grassroots non-Olympic sports that we all know is vital.

We will be doing all we can to remind all Governments between now and 2012"—

I was encouraged by that—

"that, while medals at the Games are important, the country cannot afford to neglect our collective efforts to increase participation levels in our most popular sports."

I could not agree more on both counts.

Sport, both Olympic, to fund our elite athletes, and non-Olympic, needs extra funding if the aspirations raised by winning the bid are to become reality. The return of the £320 million in tax taken from the new Olympic lottery games is both morally right and a practical way of starting to deliver for sport. I therefore urge all hon. Members to accept the new clause.

Mr. Andy Reed: I am grateful to have the opportunity to speak about the new clause and about the comments of the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson). As he knows, I have consistently taken a particular line on the raiding of other parts of the lottery, from the point of view of those of us who are interested in grass-roots sport, especially the ones that are not part of the Olympic games. There are many mass participation sports that are outside the Olympics, such as my own game, rugby union, and rugby league, as the hon. Gentleman noted. It is a great shame that the IOC has not taken the lead and included rugby sevens, which is included in the Commonwealth games. It would have been a fantastic opportunity for that to be part of the 2012 Olympic games.

I have been quite closely involved in trying to assess what is required, particularly as regards the UK Sport bid for additional funding. Those of us who know the threesome—Bath, Sheffield and Loughborough—know what it will take to get an Olympic gold medallist in 2012. We know that the average age of a gold medallist in 2012 will be 26.2 years. That means that such a person will probably already be in a development squad at one of our leading centres, the English Institute of Sport, and we know from UK Sport's work the attrition rate—the number of people who will drop out of those training programmes—and the size of the training programme that we need across the Olympic sports.

I play quite a bit of volleyball, which will be an Olympic sport in 2012 because we are the host nation. We will be looking for a creditable performance, but even with all the lottery funding that we can muster, it is unrealistic to expect the UK team to pick up the gold medal—I sound like the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart), who has downgraded his aspirations for Scottish World cup wins. I do not want to be down on our fantastic volleyball players, who are based in my constituency, but they, too, are realistic about their chances of winning.

It is too easy to sit on the Opposition Benches and say, "We would like to spend an extra £300 million, and we have got a rough idea where it will come from." Only yesterday, Opposition Members criticised the so-called difficulties with the Budget, so it is strange that the Opposition parties are introducing a proposal to take another £300 million out of the figures in the pre-Budget report. I can see the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) distancing himself from the official Opposition on that particular matter.

Mr. Don Foster indicated assent.

Mr. Reed: At Prime Minister's Question Time, the Prime Minister usually takes the opportunity to run through the Liberals' spending plans.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman to confine his remarks to the new clause.

Mr. Reed: I apologise, Madam Deputy Speaker. New clause 2 refers to how the £320 million will be used. I would like the Chancellor to write a cheque for that sum tomorrow, but I recognise that it is not that easy because the Government face tough choices. I am delighted that the Liberals have, for once, taken the hair-shirt approach and wish only that more hon. Members were present to witness it.

A great deal more work needs to be done on how the bid is submitted to the Government. The BOA needs to do more work on securing additional funding in partnership with others for each year until 2012, so it can reach £40 million to £50 million extra a year for the 28 sports. As the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent has indicated, however, the funding needs to cover many other sports.

We are discussing a great deal of investment to get people on to the podium, and a great deal of work needs to be done. We must work with the Treasury to make sure that we secure the required level of funding. We should be much more imaginative and, rather than taking a begging bowl directly to the Treasury, we should find other ways to fund the elite performance to which the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent has referred. I cannot support new clause 2, but in general I would like to see a great deal more work being done to ensure that we secure the necessary level of funding for the governing bodies that will participate in 2012.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): I share my hon. Friend's logic. Does he agree that the fundamental principle behind our having the Olympic games in London in 2012 involves grass-roots sport? It is not good enough to say that the Olympics will automatically help grass-roots sport—it will not happen unless a decision is taken to make it happen.

Mr. Reed: My hon. Friend knows me well enough to know that I am particularly concerned about that danger. It would be great if we were to find an additional £50 million a year for elite sport in this country and were to finish fourth in the medal table, but what would be the legacy for our sporting future?

A great deal has been done—for example, we have largely achieved our objectives on school sport. On elite sport, those of us who know what is happening in the English Institute of Sport, which will form part of UK Sport, feel that we can deliver a great deal with additional funding. On grass-roots sport, although some good work is going on and a lot of additional funding is coming in, it will take a great deal more work to reach our objectives, and we are not quite there yet. My worry is that taking £750 million away from existing lottery causes would make that job even harder, and we must think more about the money that is currently available.

As hon. Members know, I chair the national strategic partnership for volunteering in sport. The problem is that we are making the situation harder and harder for volunteers, which makes it harder and harder for people to participate at a grass-roots level. That is not necessarily the Government's fault, because a number of agencies are involved. I hope that the lasting legacy of 2012 is not the grand stadiums, which will nevertheless be fantastic, but a genuine passion for sport and the money to deliver it.

Mr. Don Foster: As ever, I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed). On this occasion, I agree with almost everything that he has said and was not offended when he described me as hair-shirted. I also agree with him about the addition of rugby sevens to the list of sports, although I say that slightly diffidently knowing that my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester (Bob Russell) will no doubt read my remarks and wonder why darts has not been included on the wish list for additional Olympic sports.

As the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) has said, the Chancellor's statement caused considerable disappointment given what he did not say about funding for sporting endeavour, and particularly sporting endeavour that helps us to achieve an increased medal haul. He was right to say that those of us who share that concern need to get together with the representative bodies to find arguments to put pressure on the Chancellor and to come up with other forms of funding. As the hon. Member for Loughborough has said, a lot is being done, and I praise the Minister and the Government for their work. I also hope that we go on to develop links between community sports clubs and our schools.

My party simply cannot support the approach proposed by the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent, because we have some difficulty with the Conservative party's mixed messages about the lottery. Conservative Members tell us that it is wrong for the Government to put their sticky little mitts in lottery funding, but the Conservative party manifesto contains a proposal to raise £250 million a year from the lottery for its club-to-school scheme. The Conservative party is proposing a form of hypothecated tax, which Conservative Members always say is complete anathema to them whenever we make such a proposal—the Conservative proposal is schizophrenic.

Many hon. Members had grave qualms about using the lottery to make a major contribution towards the cost of running the Olympics. However, Liberal Democrats recognised that the Olympics are so important to the nation, to sport and in many other ways—for example, culturally—that we were prepared to make an exception. That is why we supported the Horserace Betting and Olympic Lottery Act 2004, and I believe that we were right to do so. During the passage of the 2004 Act, we were disappointed when we were told that the £410 million from other distributors would only be available if it were needed, although it was not long after the 2004 Act received Royal Assent that the Government said that that sum would be needed. However, we lived with that situation, because we had made a commitment.

Even were I prepared to support the notion of taking VAT in respect of just one part of the lottery and using it in the broad way that the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent suggests, I am not convinced that the mechanism would work. How would LOCOG, which has very specific responsibilities in respect of the running of the Olympic games, ensure that all aspects of sport receive some of the money? Let me remind the hon. Gentleman of what would happen were LOCOG to receive that additional, very significant sum of money.

[Mr. Don Foster]

As the games should operate successfully within budget as it is, an extra £320 million could lead to a surplus. He will remember that as part of the deal, 20 per cent. of any such surplus will go to the IOC, 20 per cent. to the BOA and 60 per cent. to grass-roots sport. He is suggesting, in effect, that we take money away from the lottery and give it to the IOC. Some of the money would not even end up in sport in this country. I find that aspect of the proposal difficult.

The new clause is somewhat schizophrenic about the lottery and about the approach to VAT receipts and the Chancellor's responsibility for using them. For those and many other reasons with which I do not wish to detain the House, we will not support the hon. Gentleman, who in many other respects has done a fantastic job.

Mr. Caborn: I echo some of the arguments made by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster). I agree that the approach taken in new clause 2 is schizophrenic. People who criticised the Chancellor for not supporting the move from 10th to fourth position in the medals table in yesterday's pre-Budget report then argue about investment into grass-roots sport as well. The whole Olympic bid process has been one of properly evaluating the risks and costs so that we can learn lessons from previous mistakes. Simply plucking out of the air the idea that we are going to move from 10th to fourth, and then saying, "Please fund it, Chancellor", is not the best way of trying to persuade people that we are serious. UK Sport, under the very good leadership of Sue Campbell, together with Peter Keene, who is probably one of the best respected people in sport, and Liz Nicholl, is systematically working through what it will take to move us progressively up the medals table.

I entirely accept that one of the great successes of 2012 will be our young people picking up those medals on the podiums. However, we have to balance the investment in 26 sports against the 130 sports for which I have ministerial responsibility. My hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) mentioned the balance between grass-roots and elite sport. We will get that balance right. There is more investment going into sport than there has been for very many years. The investment that is being made in sporting and physical activity through "Building Schools for the Future" clearly shows that we take it very seriously, from the grass roots to the podium.

Mr. Andy Reed: The case that has been put forward by UK Sport is fairly robust and well argued, so I hope that my right hon. Friend will ensure that the support that he gets from the House this evening reaches the Treasury. Does he agree that grandstanding and attacking the Government is not the best way of negotiating the question of funding and is unhelpful to sport in general? Perhaps the chair of the BOA will learn that working in partnership with people is a much better way forward.

Mr. Caborn: There has not been a Chancellor in the recent past who has been more supportive of sport. The Central Council of Physical Recreation has been asking for mandatory rate relief for clubs for 30 years—now we have got it. The talented athlete scholarship scheme, which is investing in grass-roots sport, came from the Chancellor. This Government's investment in sport—through the Chancellor, with support from the Prime Minister—has been second to none. UK Sport is putting a case together, and if it is well argued I believe that there could be a positive response. Trying to bounce the Treasury is not the best way forward.

Opposition Members have presented the proposal in the new clause to us before in various forms. It would make a special case for the Olympic lottery by providing for a form of tax rebate. There are two reasons why that cannot happen. First, as with all taxes, the Chancellor keeps lottery duty under review and gives due consideration to Budget representations made in the course of the Finance Bill process. As such, any changes in lottery duty should be considered in the context of a future Finance Bill, not this Bill.

Secondly, the Government intend that the same principles that apply to the existing national lottery should apply to any Olympics-themed games. Camelot says that the lottery game has been hugely successful. I put on the record my thanks to all the people who are buying Olympics lottery tickets. That clearly demonstrates the support behind the Olympic bid. People have put their money where their mouths were, and the first £4 million has already been made.

The principle of taxation in the national lottery was accepted by Parliament when the lottery was introduced—[Interruption.] I know that it was introduced by the Opposition. I do not intend to make political points about that because the lottery is one of our national institutions and it has all-party support. Nevertheless, we have made it clear that it will be taxed in the normal way. The £500 million that is collected by the Exchequer goes towards essential services such as schools, hospitals and the like, and it would be wrong to remove it.

I hope that the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) will reflect on the funding of elite as against grass-roots sport. I hope that he accepts that the right way to approach the Treasury is the way in which UK Sport is doing it, with a systematic analysis of what needs to be done in investing in elite sport to ensure that we move up the medals table. It is a little naive to say at this early stage that we will move from 10th to fourth without putting the funding mechanism in place. That is not the right way to go about it. I hope that, on reflection, the hon. Gentleman will withdraw the new clause.

Hugh Robertson: I listened with interest to what the Minister said. The good news is that Members on both sides of the House agree on the importance of both securing the necessary funding for our elite athletes and increasing grass-roots participation. Where we differ is on the method of achieving that.

6.30 pm

I entirely accept that the mechanism that we propose is a blunt tool. What should be set against that is that we all make our contribution to lobbying of the Treasury in our own ways. In view of that, and not least because I want the point to be raised, I wish to press the new clause to a vote.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Clause 4

GENERAL FUNCTIONS

Richard Ottaway: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 3, line 10, at end insert—

> '( ) pay compensation to any owner of a business whose interests are injuriously affected by the development of land, premises or facilities in connection with the London Olympics;'.

This is the fourth time that I have raised the issue of compensation for businesses that will have to be relocated from the Olympic site. It is a matter of some sadness that I have had to raise it four times, but I am afraid that I have still not received the answers that I am seeking.

No two businesses on the Olympic site are the same. Some are freehold, some are leasehold; some are owned by sole proprietors, and some by publicly quoted companies. I suspect that the vast majority are leasehold, and it would be very easy for their leases to be terminated and for the companies to be relocated. Many of them are in storage, and it would simply be a question of moving the contents of the business from one site to another.

The Minister is well aware of the constituency case that I have raised, so I shall not dwell on it, other than to say that it concerns a proprietor-owned freeholder who is experiencing severe difficulties in relocating. The Minister, to his credit, has said that he takes a keen personal interest in these matters, and has made all the right noises. Both he and the Mayor have said that no business will be disadvantaged. There is a lack of clarity, however, in exactly what is meant by that.

The briefing that we received from the London Development Agency for the debate in Westminster Hall last week set out exactly what the agency's statutory responsibilities were in this regard. They include,

"funding for legal and surveying costs, offers of LDA-owned sites for relocation, and development of tailored support packages".

In a separate briefing, the LDA states that it has "given a firm assurance that no business will be financially disadvantaged as a result of the compulsory purchase order process."

However, that still does not deal with the non-CPO aspects of this issue. The briefing continues:

"Businesses will be compensated and supported as generously as possible, within the legal framework in which the LDA operates."

Again, the LDA framework is general in its outlook without being specific as to exactly what kind of compensation might be available. A briefing helpfully provided by the Greater London Authority for today's debate states:

"The Mayor and LDA remain firmly committed to ensuring that the process of land acquisition for the Olympic Park development does not disproportionately disadvantage those with current interests in the land."

What on earth does that mean?

Let us take the example of a business that has to be relocated. It would have to remarket itself, relaunch itself and retrain staff. It would inevitably suffer losses. I have one simple question for the Minister, if I can get his attention. Will the items that I have just set out—he might have missed them, but I am sure he has heard all this before—be covered? In an earlier intervention, he said that the LDA was Exchequer-funded, and that is quite right. So the power flows from the Government to the LDA to the dispossessed business. Does the Minister believe that the LDA has the power and the funds to provide complete compensation to a business in the situation that I have just described? In other words, would it cover the costs not only of relocation but of relaunching and the inevitable loss of profit? These are simple questions, and I would be grateful if the Minister could give me clear yes or no answers.

Jo Swinson: I have a great deal of sympathy with the points raised by the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway). In the Westminster Hall debate on this issue last week, he set out very eloquently the concerns of his constituent and the business that he runs. There has been a huge amount of support for the games from the business community and from individuals in London and the rest of the UK, but we need to ensure that the business community will be compensated appropriately.

The amendment raises certain questions. How is the compensation to be applied? What levels will be set? Where is the money to come from? Ultimately, who is to be the judge? Businesses have set forth their case for being injured by the games and suggested the amount of compensation that they believe to be appropriate. The Sunday Express on 27 November carried the example of a concrete-crushing business that had claimed that it needed £20 million of compensation. It had been offered £1.5 million, so there was obviously a difference of opinion as to what the business should be entitled to.

Certain unscrupulous companies or individuals might seek to benefit unduly from the games by submitting cases that do not have sufficient merit, and we need to find a way of arbitrating all the cases. One sensible suggestion is that we should appoint an independent arbitrator who could address the problem. They would evaluate the loss to the business and examine the case that had been presented. Each business will probably have a unique case. The arbitrator's judgment could then be presented to the Department or agency that would be required to pay the compensation. That would present an accurate and fair fee for transferring land to the games, and a process in which all those involved could have faith. About 300 businesses might be affected, and such a process could instil faith in them that they would receive the compensation that they were due.

We spoke earlier about the sound financial management required to ensure that the games come in on budget. I am sure that all hon. Members would agree that we must ensure that those businesses that will genuinely be affected can get the support that they need. At the same time, however, we must ensure that the LDA is not held hostage and that we do not leave ourselves vulnerable to ever-escalating costs. I suggest that an independent arbitrator would provide a good answer to this problem.

Hugh Robertson: For reasons that I entirely understand, the Minister missed the Westminster Hall debate last week, in which we touched on a number of these issues.

I went to visit some of the businesses involved on 17 November. I tried to approach the meeting with an entirely open mind, but I came away feeling considerable sympathy for much of what they said. I shall try to encapsulate for the Minister what appeared to be the three problems involved. First, I do not want to party political, but there were issues surrounding the conduct of the LDA. I suspect that the LDA did not expect us to win the bid in Singapore, and thus might not have done all the necessary work—for reasons that we can all understand—to identify and secure alternative sites. There were countless stories of unreturned phone calls, unanswered letters and messages left hanging in thin air, which clearly did not help one iota.

Secondly, some surveying firms were acting both as compulsory purchase valuers and as agents for prospective new sites, which is a serious issue. The Minister will know perfectly well that that is a straightforward conflict of interest and should never happen. Finally, the very fact that the Olympic site is such a large industrial site has, for obvious reasons, made replacement properties difficult to identify. Furthermore, post the bid, the supply of similar land is considerably scarcer, thus pushing up values. Any settlement must therefore be based on post-bid land values, not on the values existing prior to the Singapore decision.

It was clear from my meeting that a realistic settlement could be reached on the basis of the cost of the replacement site, plus the necessary construction cost, plus an element of dislocation. We do not intend to press the amendment to a vote tonight, but the Minister should be in no doubt about the scale of the problem. The suggestion of an independent arbitrator is helpful, and some such initiative would prevent positions becoming entrenched. If they do become entrenched, without Government intervention, I fear that a solution will be hard to find.

Mr. Caborn: Clause 4(5) ensures that everyone whose land is injuriously affected by Olympic construction works will be entitled to a fair amount of compensation. That provision will apply to businesses in the same way as it applies to home owners. Compensation will be calculated on the basis of depreciation in the market value of the land affected. In the event of dispute, there will be a right of appeal to the Lands Tribunal. That puts the Olympic project on exactly the same footing as other major construction projects undertaken by public bodies. The Olympic delivery authority will pay compensation, rather than the London Development

[Mr. Caborn]

Agency, as it will be directing the works on the LDA's land. The responsibility will go to the ODA when this Bill, I hope, becomes an Act. Under an earlier amendment, all the work and contracts operated by the LDA will go to the ODA—I hope in an efficient and effective way.

In adopting that approach, the Bill is entirely consistent with the precedent set in other contexts, including the channel tunnel rail link project. I understand where the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway) is coming from. He is concerned to make sure that businesses get a fair deal, and I support that aim. We also want to ensure that people are fairly compensated. We do not want to make the Olympics a special case, however, compared with other large-scale public construction projects.

The amendment would create a special case by widening the class of people entitled to compensation to cover all those whose interests are affected, however indirectly and regardless of whether they are land owners or tenants in the land affected. That is too broad an approach. Its effects are uncertain, but it is likely to result in a multiplicity of claims and to prove very expensive. It is much better to rely on several decades of case law in this area to provide what is acknowledged to be a fair and reasonable compensation scheme for those who deserve compensation. We have provided the necessary hook in the Bill to ensure that that is the case.

Richard Ottaway: I apologise if I am pre-empting the Minister, but does the case law provide compensation for loss of profits in this situation?

Mr. Caborn: Each case is considered on its own merits, but relocation costs, new stock and loss of profits can be included. All that will be determined by the Lands Tribunal—this is where the independent tribunal comes in—under the Land Compensation Act 1961. There is independent arbitration and the facility to take into account losses beyond just the land price. If that is operated correctly, the questions raised by the hon. Gentleman should be answered.

In relation to the concern raised by the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson), all agents have guidelines for dealing with conflicts of interest, and all such procedures are fully regulated by the appropriate professional body. The Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors has its code of conduct, and members of the RICS who are in breach of that could face expulsion. In the light of the Adjournment debate that took place in Westminster Hall, I am writing to the LDA to draw its attention to that position. If there has been any such occurrence, I do not believe that it has been intentional. I reiterate that the Lands Tribunal is the mechanism for the type of arbitration to which the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) was referring.

I genuinely hope that I have been able to answer the questions put on the record. Overall, the LDA has done a reasonable job in difficult circumstances. It had to respond post-6 July, and it has done that very well. We have put tremendous pressure on it, and I think that its approach to underground cabling and other issues will pay immense dividends in the medium to long term. While, on the one hand, it might not have answered a few telephone calls—I understand the frustration arising from that—on the other, I hope that when we get this Bill on to the statute book and the ODA takes over we can start working in a slightly more effective and efficient manner than has probably been the case previously.

Richard Ottaway: I am obliged to the Minister. There has been frustration, although I am the first to acknowledge that things have improved, particularly in the past few weeks. I am grateful for his interest in the matter and the way that he has approached it. In the light of the welcome clarification that he has given today, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 18

ADVERTISING REGULATIONS

Hugh Robertson: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in clause 18, page 12, line 41, after 'Committee,', insert—

'(ba), shall have regard to the desirability of promoting the interests of voluntary and community organisations and sports clubs,'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Government amendment No. 19

Amendment No. 4, in page 13, line 21, after 'Contract,', insert—

'(aa) in no case shall the regulations apply before 13th July 2012,'.

Amendment No. 5, in clause 19, page 14, line 12, at end insert—

'(ca) shall provide for exceptions for newspapers, magazines, television, radio, mobile telephony and other electronic media in respect of section 18(5),'.

Amendment No. 6, in page 14, line 29, at end insert—

'(aa) shall consult persons appearing to the Secretary of State to represent the interests of persons within the advertising business,'.

Government amendment No. 20

Amendment No. 7, in schedule 3, page 44, line 28, at end insert—

'(aa) may be made only after consultation with persons appearing to the Secretary of State to represent the interests of persons within the advertising business and those who have a relevant responsibility for regulating the advertising industry,'.

Hugh Robertson: I want to speak in support of the amendments in my name and that of the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster).

It is well documented that ambush marketing has been an issue at previous Olympic games. At the 1992 Barcelona games, Reebok paid $700 million only to find Nike sponsoring the winning basketball team's press conference and one of the competitors covering up his Reebok logo. At the 1996 Atlanta games, however, the issue really threatened to overwhelm the Olympics. As a result, subsequent summer and winter games have included provisions to prevent ambush marketing and to protect the rights of official sponsors. That is important as LOCOG, the event manager, needs to raise approximately £1.5 billion, which will come from three main funding streams. Funding of £550 million will come from the IOC, £310 million will come from ticket sales, an extra £100 million will come from other sources, and £510 million will come from sponsorship raised by LOCOG—hence the need for these regulations. Given that, as the hon. Member for Bath pointed out, any revenue surplus is reinvested, with 60 per cent. invested for the general benefit of sport in the UK and 20 per cent. going to the British Olympic Association, we wholeheartedly support that approach.

I am therefore happy with the concept of anti-ambush marketing provisions and the protection of the London Olympics association. Across many sports, inside and outside the Olympic movement, that is the modern way—notably at recent cricket world cups, which have seen similar provisions. Set against that, however, all Members of the House will want voluntary organisations, community groups and sports clubs to benefit from hosting the 2012 Olympics. The key is to achieve that without compromising the protection put in place to safeguard the official sponsors. Amendment No. 2 seeks to achieve that.

Voluntary organisations, community groups and sports clubs have several concerns. The London organising committee for the Olympic games, which already has the power to make blanket exemptions for specific groups, has said that it will not do that in the instance that we are considering and I thank the Minister for writing to confirm that after the Committee stage. There is a concern that the sponsorship of teams or individuals could be affected.

It is also down to the accused to prove their innocence, which is difficult in some cases given the limited resources at their disposal. Fundraising on behalf of individual athletes may be compromised and voluntary or community groups that want to have an Olympics theme day could fall foul of the regulations. For example, I was contacted by Soul in the City, a religious group that engages young people in voluntary work to the benefit of local communities. It is a fantastic organisation that everybody here would support. It wants to hold an Olympics theme day but is worried that doing so will contravene the regulations. That fear of contravening the regulations will deter smaller organisations from making use of the many opportunities that the games will bring.

The commercial marketing elements of the Bill are undoubtedly necessary to prevent ambush marketing and exploitation. Previous Olympics, prior to the introduction of similar measures, have suffered. We also need to maximise the advertising revenue so that, after 2012, the maximum amount of money can be returned to sport.

However, the 2012 Olympics have been marketed as an event that will benefit the whole of the UK. Thanks to the hype that surrounds the games, anticipation is understandably high. Every hon. Member will want schools, sports clubs, community groups and voluntary organisations to derive the maximum benefit from hosting the games. All those organisations will want to use the Olympics to bolster fundraising, raise awareness and get more people involved. There is no prospect of those groups making personal gains. I urge the Minister to go into some detail in his response to explain the exact processes and safeguards that will protect those groups. There cannot be a single hon. Member who does not want that to be achieved.

In speaking about amendment No. 5, I should like to take over where my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller) left off in Committee. In Committee, the hon. Member for Bath tabled an amendment to clause 18(5)—clause 17(5) as it was then. Conservative Members supported it in debate and my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke elicited from the Minister the welcome confirmation that there was no intention to apply the regulations to television.

The hon. Member for Bath had similar success in establishing from the Minister that newspapers and, indeed, the stands from which vendors operate, would also enjoy an exemption from any regulations issued under clause 18. We are grateful for the clarification on that. However, despite the efforts of my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke to elicit similar assurances about magazines and radio, they were not forthcoming. Given that they are directly comparable to newspapers and television, surely it is right that the exemption from any regulations issued under clause 18 extends to them.

I understand that those issues were subsequently raised at the meeting between representatives of the advertising industry and Department officials on 10 November. Perhaps the Minister can confirm that. At that meeting, officials also undertook to consider the case for extending the exemption from clause 18 regulations to mobile telephones and other forms of electronic media that might deliver advertisements.

The amendment's object is therefore threefold. First, it would reflect in statute the commitments that the Minister made about newspapers and television in Committee. Secondly, it would extend those commitments to the comparable media of magazines and radio. Thirdly, its purpose is to tease out from the Minister the view at which the Government have arrived on mobile telephones and other electronic media, which should also be exempted from the regulations issued under clause 18.

I know that the Minister is aware of many of those concerns and I thank him publicly for his assistance thus far. We discussed the issues at the helpful meeting at the Department on 21 November. I hope that, as a result of the amendments, he will welcome the opportunity to put the necessary reassurances on the record.

Mr. Don Foster: The group under consideration comprises a string of different amendments and I am the only hon. Member whose name is appended to each. The Minister and the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) can therefore rest assured that I support the amendments that they tabled.

Amendment No. 2 is crucial because it was made clear at the outset that one of the central goals that we wanted to achieve in the 2012 London Olympics and Paralympics was > "a lasting legacy for future generations in health, homes and jobs and, of course, sport sustainable legacy".

That is a quote from the candidate file. An important factor will be the ability of voluntary and community organisations and sports clubs to capitalise on the games. We know of many examples of organisations that will use the Olympics as a vehicle for promoting voluntary action. They include the Waltham Forest volunteer centre, which plans to use the Olympics as a catalyst for expansion. Many organisations, such as the Stratford athletics and cycling club, will use them for increasing participation in sport. It is therefore crucial to ensure that we have regard to the desirability of promoting the interests of voluntary and community organisations and sports clubs.

The Minister will not be surprised that I support Government amendments Nos. 19 and 20 because they are the same as those that I tabled in Committee. By withdrawing them, I gave the Minister the opportunity to bring them back and claim the credit. I welcome the fact that he has stuck to his commitment. They may not appear especially important since they simply change the word "may" to "shall", but they are none the less significant because it is clear that, for example, in advertising A-frames, it is important to have regard to amenity and public safety. As I pointed out in Committee, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is especially hot on those matters and insists that amenity and public safety are taken into account when local authorities and others decide whether to accept outdoor advertising and signs. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has produced a guidance note on that, so I was anxious to follow that Department's instructions in the case of the Olympics. The Minister assured us that he would consider that. He has done so and I am delighted that he has agreed that the matter is crucial.

Amendment No. 4 is equally critical. As the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent pointed out, clause 18 describes the regulations that govern advertising in the vicinity of the London Olympic events. It gives the Secretary of State power to place restrictions on the physical locations of advertising about the games. However, in its current form, the measure does not provide a definitive start date by which the regulations come into effect. Many people therefore believed that it was important to include a clear date.

We all accepted the need both to include regulations because that was part of the host city contract and to agree on when they would begin. The hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent did not point out that, when we debated the matter in Committee, the Minister told us on 18 October that any regulations under clause 18 would not apply for longer than the Olympics period. That is from four weeks before the Olympic games to five days after the end of the Paralympic games. We were then told, interestingly;

> "If one reflects on what the IOC says, we are definitely not putting gold-plating into the Bill—if anything we are tending marginally towards the other side."

The Minister added

> "we have gone no further than what the IOC asked us to do in terms of its technical manuals."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 18 October, 2005, c.78–84.]

For some of us, it is rather difficult to check whether what the Minister said was entirely accurate. The technical manuals are somewhat different to get hold of. They seem to be locked away in safes to which only very few people have access. [Interruption.] The Minister says from a sedentary position that we must trust him and that he got that right. When I wrote to the Minister, along with the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent, I pointed out that we had managed to get hold of the code to the safe and that we had examined what the manuals said. The manuals say that the IOC requires host countries to apply restrictions on the physical location of advertising only for a maximum of two weeks before the Olympic games, not four.

I was grateful that having written to the Minister, he graciously acceded to the slight error that he had made. In the letter that we received of 30 November, he said:

> "We accept that advertising regulations should not begin more than two weeks before the Olympic Games begin, as per IOC requirements".

He repeated the phrase:

> "We want to be clear that we are not gold-plating this legislation."

That was the position earlier, but if it is to be two weeks that will not be gold-plating.

Given that the Minister has written in a letter precisely what he intends to do, it seems not unreasonable on this occasion for him to accept the amendments. They would simply put into the Bill what the Minister, somewhat belatedly, has accepted would be the right way forward. I look forward to the Minister's positive response to the amendments. I note that he points to his brief, which seems to indicate that we might be in for some success.

I hope that we shall also have some success with the other amendments. Amendment No. 5 represents an attempt to ensure that a range of media should receive appropriate exemption from legislation regarding advertising in the vicinity of the games. The hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent has made exactly the right point—there have been one or two exemptions but the scope should be widened. What would it be like for a member of the public to be reading a newspaper while standing in the vicinity of an Olympic event? Someone could be looking over that person's shoulder or, even worse, given that television cameras would be able to view it, someone could look through a television camera and see an advertisement in that newspaper. We are deeply concerned about this, and the scope of the exemptions needs to be extended to include newspapers.

What about someone who is holding out his mobile phone and on it, as is sadly the case these days, there are advertising images? That could be in contravention of advertising rules. What about someone who is listening to their portable radio? Let us say that it is on a commercial channel and an advertisement appears on it? Clearly, that could be a breach of the rules unless we have the right exemptions in respect of advertising within the vicinity of an Olympic event. That is what the amendment seeks to achieve.

Amendments Nos. 6 and 7 relate to similar issues but focus on the consultation that will take place. It is surely right and proper that we have guarantees set out in the Bill about who will be consulted about the regulations, because a number of bodies must be consulted. A list appears in the Bill, but, sadly, all the people whom we think should appear are not included.. The Minister thought that we were on to quite a jolly good idea. In Committee, Madam Deputy Speaker—I am sorry that you were not able to join us in these exciting events—the Minister said:

"The hon. Member for Bath made a point about consulting the advertising industry. He rightly pointed out that there is no requirement for the Secretary of State to do that, but I can give a commitment now from the Front Bench that we will do so. It would be foolish not to consult the industry."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 18 October 2005, c. 79.]

We already have a list of bodies that are to be consulted, but the advertising industry is not on that list. The Minister has said that it would be foolish not to include it in the list of consultees, so it would be extremely strange if the Minister did not accept a modest amendment to include that industry in the list in the Bill. That is equally true of those people who have to vet advertisements. In particular, television advertisements must be prepared a long time in advance, so we need to be sure that those who are responsible for vetting such advertisements will be consulted. That is why amendment No. 7 refers to those who have a relevant responsibility for regulating the advertising industry. I hope that the Minister will be prepared to accept the amendment.

I hope also that the amendment will provide the Minister with an opportunity to say a little more to those who are responsible for preparing advertising and for clearing advertising about what he has in mind with time scales. The Minister has had detailed consultations with representatives of the industry, which I know they have welcomed. They have reminded him repeatedly of the long time scale that is needed, very often, to prepare advertisements. Some advertisements that the industry might be using in 18 months' time will already be in preparation. The industry needs to know when those advertisements might fall foul of the regulations once they come into force. It is crucial that those concerned are consulted. It is crucial also that they be given an assurance that the regulations will not come into effect in the immediate future. Every one of the amendments in this group is worthy of support by the Minister and by the House, and I hope that they will be given that support.

Mr. Andy Reed: I wish briefly to speak in support of amendment No. 2. Whether it is carried is a different matter, but I hope that it is recognised that for all of us who are interested in community sports and how the Olympics can be used—not by commercial organisations; I fully understand the requirement to prevent ambush marketing—there are some fine lines between what is acceptable and what is not, and what can be regarded as community services. Having met some of those involved in brand protection, I fully understand just what needs to be done and the dangers involved. The wording of the amendment may not be perfect, but I hope that the Minister will take on board some of the comments that have been made in the House.

Some Members have suggested that our sports colleges be renamed Olympics sports colleges for 2012. Each of us has individuals in our constituencies who are interested in promoting sports development by using the 2012 brand. I recognise that it is important that that brand is protected, but there must be some way in which many voluntary organisations and sporting organisations, including small clubs and individuals who come together to promote the Olympics and the build-up of sport development, are at least allowed to take that forward.

I hope that in his discussions, particularly with the organising committee, the Minister will find a way of ensuring that there is some flexibility so that people are not put off at this early stage. As chair of the county sports partnership in Leicestershire, I have experience of many individuals coming forward with great ideas to brand themselves—for example, a half marathon that is built on 2012 branding, leading up to the Olympics. There are children and teenagers who would love to have been Olympians but, like me, recognise that they stand no chance of achieving that. At the same time, they wish to play some part in the Olympics.

I have an interest in developing volunteers. For many people, the concept of the Olympics will be what they can contribute to the event, not what they can get out of it. Many people are asking, "What will my town or my constituency get out of the Olympics?" One of the great things about volunteering is that people will be able to put something in and thereby get something out of the event. At the same time, they will be making a major contribution.

As for volunteering, most people do not have access to all the information about regulations. They just know that they have a good idea which they would like to see through. I hope that they do not become fearful of even suggesting using the branding for 2012 because of possible difficulties. I have been told about examples of events that are highly dubious—I heard yesterday of a wet T-shirt competition that used the five rings. I shall not go into detail about how they were used, but that is the sort of thing that London 2012 is dealing with regularly. It stretches the definition of "voluntary" and "community". I do not want such events to be encouraged because there are clearly commercial elements to some of them, but I hope that the Minister and others are cognisant of the difficulties facing genuine sports and voluntary groups that want to make major use of the 2012 Olympics to develop sport. We must ensure that they will not be put off. We may go too far if we do not take on board some of the points that are made in the amendments.

Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): I would like briefly to speak in support of amendments Nos. 2, 4 and 7. The Olympics is a unique opportunity in the history of our country to build not only sporting participation at grass-roots level and sporting excellence, but pride in our people, our country, our achievements and indeed our communities. We should all do a lot more of that.

In Committee, the Minister stated strongly that he felt that the Bill as drafted would not deter communities, sports clubs and voluntary organisations from becoming fully involved in the Olympics in whatever way was felt fit and that the correct balance would be struck. While I of course take him at his word, the Bill does little to back that up and, with the greatest respect to him, it is highly unlikely that he will be in place throughout the life of the Bill. Therefore, I support the amendment to ensure that what is currently, according to the Minister, implicit in the Bill becomes a little more explicit and that LOCOG is required to have regard to the involvement of sports clubs and interest groups in what will be, I am sure, a historic event for our country.

This is one of the most prestigious sporting events in the world and its value is widely appreciated among those who may be approached to be sponsors. Many worldwide sponsors, including Visa, which is a major employer in my constituency, have been sponsors since 1986, showing that we have quite a lot of repeat purchase in the market. The Government need to ensure that they maximise the benefits for the country in the broadest way, as well as protecting the interests of those sponsors. It is a two-way street. As the Minister agreed in Committee, it is a question of balance. There is an important balance to be struck. That has been reiterated by other third parties, including Arup in the report that it was commissioned to undertake in May 2002.

We raised the issue in Committee. As I said, the Minister stated that sports clubs and other organisations could participate. Indeed, he went a little further and said that they would receive "class exemptions", but I understand from my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) that, as a result of discussions with LOCOG, it has become clear subsequently that the blanket exemptions may not be as forthcoming as the Minister originally anticipated. That has served to underpin the growing concern among differing communities and sports groups that their role may be somewhat squeezed.

We have heard from my hon. Friend about community groups such as Soul in the City and the YMCA, which share our concern that the Bill could undermine their good plans to involve youth in our communities, particularly in London, in building sports involvement as part of the Olympics as a whole. I have taken the opportunity to speak to a number of major worldwide sponsors and there is a lot of agreement that the community dimension of the games is vital and something that they will pursue vigorously.

The Minister may want to consider the fact that, just as ambush marketing can undermine the value of sponsorship, so our communities and sporting organisations can feel marginalised by their treatment within this historic event. That is something that is well worth considering. He may wish to pursue that matter, as I have, in conversations directly with some of the sponsors, because it was most enlightening.

Community groups can benefit from involvement in the Olympics in many ways, including through fund-raising events for teams. We must ensure that we involve every resident of our country, not just those living within the M25 or in the vicinity of the locations for the sporting events, in promoting grass-roots sports. The Bill is not explicit in its commitment to non-commercial, voluntary organisations. The amendment makes the Minister's verbal reassurances much more tangible and would provide a hook for those organisations to lobby LOCOG to agree a framework within which they can operate in support of the games. That will help many organisations such as the ones we have spoken about and others to plan their contributions to this historic celebration with a little more certainty.

On amendment No. 7, the elements of the Bill that relate to advertising and marketing are highly regulated. As my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent and the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) said, the IOC manuals relating to this aspect of the Bill are not freely available to us. While the Minister was kind enough to enable us to see extracts in Committee, they raised as many questions as they answered. He confirmed that the manuals would be subject to change until a date that has not yet been confirmed. Amendment No. 7 would ensure that, if a change is required in the manuals or in any aspect of the Bill that relates to advertising and marketing, the industry will be consulted. Any unforeseen impact on business could undermine not just the role of businesses and marketing in the Olympics, but the economic benefit of the Olympics for our country.

My objective in speaking today is simple. We need to ensure that the London Olympics benefit as many people as possible and that we strike the right balance, on which we are rather short of the mark at the moment.

Mr. Caborn: This group of amendments relates to the regulations that will be put in place under clause 18 to control advertising in the vicinity of Olympic venues. The provisions are a direct result of the requirements of the IOC and the promises that we have given in signing the host city contract. They are measures that will make an important contribution to the viability and success of the London games.

What I am also clear about, and what I have tried to provide reassurance about in Committee, is that we intend to take a reasonable and proportionate approach to the IOC's requirements. That means adopting a flexible and balanced approach and ensuring the regulations are appropriate for each and every venue.

Amendment No. 2 would require the Secretary of State to have regard to the desirability of promoting the interests of voluntary and community organisations and sports clubs when making advertising regulations under clause 18. I understand the sentiments behind the amendment. I share the desire of the hon. Members for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) and for Bath (Mr. Foster) to ensure that the games in 2012 benefit all sections of society and all parts of the country.

As the IOC made clear in its memorandum to the Bill's Standing Committee, the rationale behind the requirements to control advertising is to maintain clean venues and to prevent the unauthorised commercial exploitation of the games. The memo states that "all venues must be free of commercial, political or religious advertising".

While that statement does not explicitly refer to advertising by voluntary or community groups, I know that the IOC would not want us to create a situation where its clean venue policy is compromised. However, before I am accused of being unreasonable by inhibiting the good work of voluntary and community groups, I should reassure hon. Members that subsection (7)(b) of clause 18 allows for authorised advertising within the vicinity of Olympic venues and that we will consider the case for allowing some forms of advertising by voluntary or community groups.

I can absolutely see the case for allowing some voluntary or sporting organisations to be able to hand out flyers to people leaving Olympic venues in order, for example, to encourage them to become sports volunteers in their community, or to visit their local sports hall to give handball a try for the first time and to gain that experience. However, that sort of activity must be done in a measured and controlled way if we are to maintain the IOC's clean venue policy and ensure the viability and success of both the London and future games. Clause 18(7) is the best way to make that happen, so I ask that the amendment be withdrawn.

7.30 pm

Amendment No. 4 would include in the Bill a defined time limit during which the advertising regulations can apply. Clause 18(6) already requires that the regulations establish the period for which they will apply, and that they may apply only for such a period as is necessary to comply with the requirements of the host city contract. As I said earlier, we are determined to ensure that we apply those requirements in a sensible and reasonable way. In Committee, I said that the advertising regulations would not apply for longer than the Olympics period, which the Bill defines as starting four weeks before the opening ceremony.

Having discussed this issue further with the IOC, I can confirm that any advertising restrictions will be in place two weeks before the opening ceremony at the absolute earliest, as the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) said. In reality, I envisage that the restrictions will apply for a much shorter period, especially for venues that host only one or two days of competition. Given the variety of time periods for which the restrictions will apply, I do not think it sensible to specify in the Bill the maximum period for which the regulations can apply. However, I hope that the Bill's existing provisions—particularly clause 18(6)—and the clear assurances that I have given will reassure the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent that we intend to take a reasonable approach, and that he will withdraw his amendment.

Amendment No. 5 would require advertising regulations to provide a specific exemption for advertising on television and radio and in newspapers and magazines.

Mr. Don Foster rose—

Mr. Caborn: I can reassure the House that anyone listening to a radio programme or reading in the vicinity of Olympic venues a newspaper that contains adverts will not be caught by our advertising restrictions. The hon. Member for Bath can therefore rest assured that such a person would not be prosecuted. I understand the concerns expressed about spectators being prevented from listening to their radios as they walk into the stadium. That is absolutely not our intention and we shall ensure that our regulations are drafted in such a way as to make that clear. Does the hon. Member for Bath still want to intervene?

Mr. Foster indicated dissent.

Mr. Caborn: That shows that, had the hon. Gentleman waited for those pearls of wisdom to fall from my lips, he would not have needed to intervene. I hope that, in the light of my reassurance, the amendment will be withdrawn.

Finally, I turn to amendments Nos. 6 and 7, which would require the Secretary of State to consult representatives of the advertising industry before drawing up regulations under clause 18, and before varying the list of words and phrases in schedule 3. The advertising industry will obviously take a keen interest in the new advertising regulations and any changes to the words and phrases listed in schedule 3. We shall consult the advertising industry in drawing up regulations under clause 18—as we have done in drawing up the Bill—and in making any amendments to the lists of words and phrases in schedule 3. I draw hon. Members' attention to clause 22, which, among other things, requires the Olympic delivery authority to liaise with the people likely to be affected by regulations expected to be made under clause 18.

The advertising industry will not be the only stakeholders affected by the advertising regime; local businesses and residents, for example, may also have an interest in it. I am not sure, therefore, that it is helpful to widen the Bill's existing list of consultees, as it could never be exhaustive. In my view, the Bill contains sufficient safeguards to ensure that the interests of the advertising industry and of others are considered, and that their voices are heard. The Government and LOCOG have already established a very good dialogue with the advertising industry, and we shall continue to ensure they are fully engaged in the development of regulations under clause 18, and in any changes made to the list of words and phrases in schedule 3. I therefore ask that the amendment be withdrawn.

I turn to the question of the ambush market and exempting voluntary organisations and sports clubs from restrictions. Amendment No. 2 applies only to clause 18, which deals with advertising in the vicinity of Olympic venues. Under schedule 3, which we shall debate later, we have provided that LOCOG can authorise people to associate themselves with the games. We should not create a loophole that can be exploited, but I do envisage voluntary community groups being given certain authorisation. We considered this very issue in drafting the Bill, but we came to the conclusion that creating such a blanket exemption would provide a very wide defence that could be open to abuse. For example, we might want to allow all local junior athletics clubs to associate themselves with the games; on the other hand, we might not want major football teams such as Manchester United to do so.

We have sought to address this issue by giving LOCOG the ability to grant the authorisations provided for in paragraphs 4 and 5 to schedule 3. The amendments that we made in Committee allow LOCOG to make class exemptions, and require it to maintain a public register of people, and of classes of people, who are authorised to associate themselves with the games. Those amendments were tabled with schools and voluntary organisations specifically in mind.

I undertake to consider exempting mobile phones from the advertising restrictions when the regulations are made. We intend to be reasonable in our approach to regulations made under clause 18, but as was made clear in Committee, between now and 2012 there will be considerable advances in technology and in the ways of the ambush market. I have given a commitment in respect of newspapers, magazines, radio and television, but I cannot provide a blanket exemption for mobile telephony at this stage. Although I can reassure the hon. Member for Bath that the mobile services currently available will almost certainly be exempt, we must future-proof this provision by leaving it somewhat open-ended, so that we can deal with any advances in technology between now and 2012.

Mr. Don Foster: Before the Minister moves on to the two extremely exciting Government amendments, I should point out that although he talked about his commitment to consulting the industry about the development of regulations under clause 18, he did not deal with the reference in amendment No. 7 to consulting

"those who have a relevant responsibility for regulating the advertising industry".

Surely the Minister accepts that, for example, the Broadcast Advertising Clearance Centre needs to be consulted on the regulations, not least because, otherwise, it could pre-clear an advertisement that is subsequently seen to fall foul of the new regulations. Presumably, it could even be sued as a result of such pre-clearing. Will the Minister clarify that point?

Mr. Caborn: I would expect the BACC to be consulted, but let me put this issue into context. We are talking about a national organisation, LOCOG, which is responsible to the IOC. Its current chairman—hopefully he will continue as chairman through to 2012—is Lord Coe, who is supported ably by Keith Mills. These people will not go out of their way to take the draconian steps that some Members have suggested this evening. We are giving LOCOG powers that we believe are commensurate with its fulfilling its obligations to the IOC. I am sure that those people will interpret the powers that they have been given and the actions that they can take with common sense. There will be consultation and we shall take a common-sense attitude to it.

We have debated bearing down on the games' cost implications for the council tax, but we should remember that they will also provide massive income. In order to reassure the main sponsors and to maximise the revenue stream from them, we must ensure, for example, that we provide clean stadiums. The Government and LOCOG have a duty—not just to the IOC but to council tax payers in London and to others who will finance the games—to ensure that we deliver on these issues.

We tabled Government amendments Nos. 19 and 20 after the constructive debate in Committee of an amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Bath. He takes great credit for these amendments, although I wish my officials had changed the odd word or two and given the Government greater ownership of the amendments. In any case, I concede that the hon. Gentleman or his researcher drafted the amendments.

Amendments Nos. 19 and 20 would require the Secretary of State to have regard to amenity and public safety when drawing up advertising and street trading regulations under clauses 18 and 24. I agree with comments made in Committee that strengthening the requirement to have regard to amenity and public safety will ensure that the regulations are appropriate and fitting for each and every venue. I would like to thank the hon. Gentleman for provoking the debate in Committee and am pleased that we are able to come back with these amendments to the Bill at this stage.

Hugh Robertson: I thank the Minister for the reassurances that he has provided. It is fair to say that both sides of the House wish to achieve the same aim: we are simply coming at it from slightly different directions. The achievement tonight is that we have moved closer together. In view of that, I am happy to beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 35

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCIES

Mr. Don Foster: I beg to move amendment No. 15, in page 25, line 5 [Clause 35], leave out subsection (2).

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 17, 18 and 27.

Mr. Foster: I shall leave the Minister to comment on the Government amendments and concentrate on amendment No. 15.

All hon. Members will be aware that from the beginning we have wanted every nation and region of this country to participate in and benefit from the Olympic and Paralympic games of 2012.

We appear to have done much business in Committee on 18 October, as every reference I have made to Committee has been from that date. It is therefore appropriate to cite the Minister's comments on this issue:

"The 2012 Olympic competitions will take place across the country, and every region will have the opportunity to benefit and to capitalise on them."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 18 October 2005; c. 138.]

We all agree with that. In Loughborough, Bath and Sheffield, we are all looking forward to all the nations and regions benefiting from the games. For those of us who live in England, the regional development agencies will have a crucial role to play in helping to facilitate the participation of the regions and sub-regions. Therefore, nobody would be surprised to see that clause 35 states:

"The purposes of a regional development agency (listed in section 4 of the Regional Development Agencies Act 1998 (c. 45)) shall include the purpose of preparing for the London Olympics."

That is right and proper and I am delighted that it is the case. However, hon. Members who have studied the Bill will note that the clause also states:

"But a regional development agency shall not do anything by virtue only of subsection (1) except at the request of the Olympic Delivery Authority."

In other words, the RDAs, which should play a key role in helping the regions and sub-regions to prepare for the Olympic games, will be able to do so only if they are authorised by the ODA. The ODA will have an iron grip on RDAs' ability to prepare for the Olympics.

The RDAs have become increasingly concerned by clause 35, largely because—I confess—I kept drawing it to their attention and asking what they thought about it. They believe that it could limit their scope in preparing for the games. They are concerned about the possible confusion over the relative powers and leverages of the respective parties involved. They are concerned about the perceived leadership role given to the ODA over regional involvement in the games, instead of a co-ordinating role. The RDAs are also concerned about the potential funding consequences if the ODA asks them to do things outside their normal corporate plans or funding limits.

I have no doubt that the Minister will assure me that the RDAs need not be concerned, but I hope that he will spell out in some detail how he sees the relationship between the RDAs and the ODA operating. We already know that the RDAs are working actively to promote participation and involvement in the games and I hope that the Minister will reassure me that that work will not be put in jeopardy.

If the RDAs are to be in some way limited by a body, should it be the ODA? The ODA is largely responsible for the major infrastructure work and transport plans, and in some parts of the country the RDAs will be involved. The South West of England Regional Development Agency, for example, will be involved in the infrastructure in Weymouth, where the sailing will take place. It may also be involved in work around the beautiful city of Bath, because of our potential involvement. But the RDAs will want to be involved in far more than the necessary structural work.

LOCOG is the other body with a crucial role to play and hon. Members who did not have the chance to participate in our deliberations in Committee may not know where it fits in on the wonderful diagrams that we received from the Minister. LOCOG will have a nations and regions sub-committee, led by Charles Allen. We all admire the work that he did in helping us to win the bid and I am sure that we will admire the work that he will do chairing that reinvigorated and reformed nations and regions sub-committee.

It is interesting to note that when the sub-committee had its first meeting recently, it described its remit. At its inauguration, Charles Allen said that "this group has a vital role in making sure that nations and regions really benefit from London's Olympic Bid".

According to a media release, the sub-committee then discussed issues including how best to engage people across the UK in the bid; how the business and sporting benefits could be put in reach for everyone, including tourism, jobs, contracts, sporting events and more; links with the arts, culture and education; auditing the regional facilities available for use in the run-up to the 2012 games; and providing practical advice on applying for and running preparation camps for the games. That is the remit of a LOCOG sub-committee, yet those things sound remarkably like many of the areas of responsibility of RDAs.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Wellingborough sees the Olympic games as a great opportunity, especially from the tourism point of view, and I welcome our success in having the Olympics in the UK. My concern is that the RDAs do not know where Wellingborough is, as we are right at the edge of one, so will the hon. Gentleman explain whether we would be better off in Wellingborough with the ODA or the RDA deciding how we should prepare?

Mr. Foster: I thought for a moment that the hon. Gentleman was going to ask me to explain where Wellingborough was; if he had, I should have been highly embarrassed. I am delighted that he did not.

A large number of organisations will play a part in ensuring that we deliver the best-ever Olympic and Paralympic games in 2012. The RDAs will have a crucial role, as will the ODA, LOCOG and many other organisations. The amendment is trying to tease from the Minister not which organisations should be involved, but whether we have got right the relationship between them. Although I am deeply concerned about the ODA's apparent iron grip on the RDAs, if there is to be an iron grip, should not it be the responsibility of LOCOG? I look forward to the Minister's response and hope that he will be able to tell the hon. Gentleman where Wellingborough is.

Mr. Andy Reed: Strangely, a consensus is building across the Chamber. I agree with many of the sentiments expressed by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster). As he knows, in Committee I asked what the structure for the nations and regions would look like. In the east midlands, we had a chart that showed our suggestions for part of that. For the reasons that he outlined, it looked quite complicated because it included the supporting blocks, such as tourism, sport and economic regeneration.

I understand the problems of Northamptonshire and Lincolnshire. I was European officer for the region, so I know only too well that those counties find it hard to regard themselves as part of the east midlands. I hope that over time they will come to love the rest of the east midlands as much as we love them.

I look forward to the Minister's response, as my understanding is that—as the hon. Member for Bath suggested—all those groups should feed directly into the RDA as the sole representative, so that we have a single point of contact. But there are dangers. As I have been involved with the Bill and taken some interest in it, people from all over the region have been asking me what they should do and how to get the process started. Over the past few months, part of our remit has been to encourage people to have ideas but to slow down until the organisation is in place, so that we can co-ordinate them, through the RDA and the nations and regions sub-committee, into LOCOG.

[Mr. Andy Reed]

The hon. Gentleman rightly highlighted the slight contradiction in subsection (2)—that the ODA, which, I understand, is really the delivery agency for building the infrastructure, mainly in London but also in Weymouth and other Olympic venues, is a different body. I look forward to an explanation, as I am concerned to ensure that there is a single route and that we do not complicate it so much that none of us knows how to proceed, as happens in other areas of the sporting world. This is a golden opportunity to lay clearly on the line who is responsible and who has the final say, so that all the people who have great enthusiasm for the Olympics know how to co-ordinate all their fantastic ideas—such as those I have heard about from people in Leicestershire—and how to get a yes from the nations and regions group, so that we can deliver between now and 2012.

Hugh Robertson: I have a parochial concern relating to my Kent constituency that is also shared by Essex. Both counties are geographically next to the Olympics in the east end and feel constrained by having to work through a regional sports board, which, in the case of Kent, is diametrically on the opposite side of London. The Minister is aware of those concerns and has kindly agreed to fix a meeting with the chairman of the nations and regions sub-committee, and I thank him for that.

I shall leave amendment No. 15 entirely to the Minister and comment on Government amendments Nos. 17, 18 and 27. The Minister warned us in Committee of the need for the amendments and included them in his briefing to Opposition parties a fortnight ago. They streamline the process of compulsory purchase for special land for the Olympic park, and clarify the fact that special land can be built on for Olympic purposes. They also allow RDAs to purchase compulsorily Crown land for the 2012 Olympics.

Clearly, if we are to meet tight construction deadlines, it is vital to remove possible delays from the process. Provided the Minister is happy to undertake today to write to us laying out the exact basis on which that will be done, and the process that will be used, I am happy to signal my party's consent.

Mr. Caborn: Before I move on the detail of the amendment, I want to note that the nations and regions sub-committee under the chairmanship of Charles Allen is performing an extremely worthwhile task of co-ordinating not only RDAs but regional sports boards. All the regions have been asked to prepare a strategy, as we want to maximise across the whole UK the benefits that will flow from 2012. We hope to put a full-time person in each nation and region in the early part of next year to ensure that that co-ordination brings a two-way stream of information. We heard earlier about the supply chains that will be necessary for building the infrastructure in London and we hope that such co-ordination will facilitate that development. There is no difference of opinion about the opportunities, the structure that we are setting up, or the leadership of the sub-committee by Charles Allen. I have ministerial responsibility for that, too.

The amendment is similar to one proposed and withdrawn by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) in Committee. I apologise if I did not make it clear at that point why we cannot accept the proposal, and I am sorry if I repeat some of what I said then. RDAs are already able to engage in valuable preparatory work for the London Olympics. Before the ODA exists, the London Development Agency, in particular, has put in much valuable work, to which I have already referred. The LDA is leading on the process of land acquisition in the Lea Valley, and the Government amendments in this group are designed to make sure that the process is successful.

The RDAs are able to undertake that sort of work under existing regeneration powers and the Bill does nothing to change that. So RDAs will still be able to buy land and built facilities with an Olympic purpose, without having to consult anybody, provided that they are also pursuing one of their existing statutory purposes.

The Bill provides RDAs with a new purpose—to prepare for the London Olympics—which means that if it proves necessary they will be able to buy land and build facilities that have only an Olympic purpose and provide no other lasting benefit. It is clear that that is an additional power; they can add it to their portfolio if they are asked to develop or deliver an Olympic-specific project. It is unlikely that such a power will ever be needed, but we have provided for it on the "just-in-case" principle. We do not want to be left in a situation where the ODA needs an RDA to buy some land in Weymouth, for example, by compulsory purchase, but the RDA is not able to do so.

Subsection (2) states that an RDA may use that new, Olympic-specific power only at the ODA's request. That is because we do not want RDAs all over the country to be carrying out work for the Olympics where that work is clearly not part of the RDAs' general mission to regenerate their local areas. The Olympics will provide many opportunities for regeneration and we welcome and encourage such activity, but we do not want the games to result in white elephants all over the country.

Mr. Don Foster: The Minister is repeating much of what he said in Committee, which, frankly, was unacceptable then and is unacceptable now. May I ask him a specific question? In the south-west, our RDA is in the process—properly—of establishing an Olympic delivery structure, which involves Sport England and the Government office for the south-west and will involve Dorset county council. The RDA is considering how to liaise with the seven sub-regions so that they can benefit from and participate in the Olympics in 2012. The Minister is talking about land acquisition, but I am much more interested in all the other activities, such as promoting tourism, attracting visitors and increasing participation in sport. Will he assure me that the 1998 legislation enables those organisations to do that, and that they will not be found to be in breach of the existing legislation?

Mr. Caborn: Absolutely not. In 1998 I took that Bill through Parliament, setting up the RDAs, and they were founded on exactly those principles. In fact, tourism has in the recent past been added to their remit, and therefore they have every power. Nothing in the description that the hon. Gentleman has given would require a departure from the powers that were given to RDAs in the 1998 Act, because that will be about sustainable regeneration and development and wealth creation for that region. The power that is given in this Bill relates to projects that are Olympic-specific and do not have after that use a purpose for which the RDAs were set up—regeneration and wealth creation. If, for example, a stadium was built and then knocked down after the Olympics because there was no after-use, that would not be within the remit of the RDA, but it would be given the powers to do that, at the behest of the ODA, so it could build that facility and then knock it down, and that would be the power that was given by this Bill to the RDAs. I hope that that is clear, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Now I have lost my place, but I think that I have adequately explained to the hon. Member for Bath—well, I am not sure about adequately, but I hope that he will withdraw his amendment.

I shall now discuss amendments Nos. 17, 18 and 27. Amendments Nos. 17 and 27 are proof of the Government's commitment to ensuring that the RDAs have the powers that they need to help the process of Olympic development. It is vital that the land needed for the Olympics is acquired quickly and without legal doubt attached to its status. The timetable for acquisition, remediation and construction is so tight that even a delay of a couple of months could be disastrous. The amendments that we have tabled address all the problems that could possibly obstruct this process, wherever an RDA is acquiring land, at any site anywhere the United Kingdom. They ensure that the necessary land can be assembled on budget, without delay and that it can be used for Olympic development.

We are proposing these amendments at a relatively late stage because the need for them became clear only in the short period after 6 July when the project became a reality and the plans were worked through in detail. As a result of that work, we have tabled amendment No. 17, which would have four crucial effects wherever an RDA purchased land for the purpose of preparing for the Olympics.

First, paragraph (a) removes the need for a special parliamentary process to approve the compulsory purchase of "special land" where equivalent land is not being provided in exchange. Special land consists of allotments, open space and commons. The special parliamentary process would take up to six months and simply cannot be accommodated in the timetable for Olympic construction. I am satisfied that no one will suffer unduly as a result of this step. While the LDA is not able to provide "equally advantageous land" in sufficient amounts to replace all the special land that will be used during the games, those who make specific use of the land will, I believe, get a good deal.

The LDA is committed by conditions of its planning permission to provide replacement facilities to those affected by the purchase of special land. Footballers, allotment holders and cyclists will all be provided with replacement facilities for the duration of the period. After the games, they will get new facilities—East Marsh will be restored and allotments and a velo park will be provided within the Olympic park itself. And the park will provide more open space to the residents of the lower Lea valley than currently exists today, so no one, we believe, will lose out.

Paragraph (b) of amendment No. 17 has the effect of extinguishing all existing rights over land acquisition, while providing for compensation to those who have rights removed. It is essentially the same provision that exists in the Housing Act 1985 to allow local housing authorities to develop land after it has been cleared. The risk that we are addressing through this provision is that there are a large number of restrictive covenants that constitute potential obstacles to development of that park. There are approximately 500 covenants affecting land needed for the Olympics in east London. Most are deemed unenforceable, but there are a number of covenants that case law suggests might be enforced, preventing the development of the land. These include a covenant that prevents the land on which the Olympic stadium will be sited being used for sports halls, and a covenant preventing land needed for the main access ramp to the stadium from being used "for athletic or sporting purposes". Clearly, we cannot carry such a risk, and therefore this amendment is crucial.

Paragraph (c) of the amendment provides absolute clarity that "special land", once acquired, can be built on. There is some unhelpful case law at present that casts doubt on the meaning of the relevant provision in the 1998 Act, which allows RDAs to use "special land" in accordance with planning permission. We want to ensure that we run no risk of legal challenge or hold-up, and the amendment to achieve that is before the House.

Finally, paragraph (d) allows the compulsory purchase of Crown land and any interest in Crown land. At present there is some doubt about whether it is legally possible, and while we are not aware of a particular area of land where this is a problem, we would not want to be faced with that problem at a later stage. The one area of Crown land affected by the LDA's initial CPO, around Stratford City, has been the subject of successful negotiations between the LDA, the Government and London and Continental Railways. We do not expect that the new powers will be needed to acquire that land, but we want to provide a failsafe, to ensure that the RDAs have sufficient powers to take control of Crown land anywhere in London or in the UK if necessary. The provision may never need to be used, but we believe that it is an important safeguard.

Amendment No. 18 allows for the provisions relating to compulsory purchase to be commenced immediately on Royal Assent, to ensure that they apply to the LDA's existing CPO as it goes through.

Amendment No. 27 allows for the provisions in amendment No. 17 to be backdated where that is necessary. Provisions amending the law on special land and Crown land must apply to the two major CPOs that the LDA has already launched, on 10 October and 16 November. We have therefore provided that these provisions are, or can be, backdated to 1 October 2005, to ensure that there is no special parliamentary process needed for the "special land" currently being acquired; that such "special land" can be built on for Olympic purposes; and that any Crown land—or interests in Crown land—that falls in the area of the CPO could be compulsorily purchased if need be.

[Mr. Caborn]

The power to override restrictive covenants needs to be broader in its effect, since the LDA has been acquiring land in the Olympic park area for the past two years. It needs to be absolutely sure that it can overcome any problematic covenants that are attached to this land. We have therefore proposed a power to provide in the commencement order for the extinguishing of covenants on land that had been acquired before commencement. But rights will be extinguished only from the date of commencement.

These are complex amendments, but they are tightly focused to deal with specific problems that we could face, and they are tied to the specific circumstances where an RDA is acquiring land for Olympic purposes. They are essential to the success of the public sector construction project.

Mr. Don Foster: The Minister has convinced us all with the way in which he has spoken to his amendments, and I for one have no problem in supporting them, but, as I said in an intervention, he has not convinced me yet in respect of his objection to amendment No. 15, so just to make my life and the life of the RDAs easier, I am going to ask the Minister to intervene on me when I ask him a simple question. Can he give me and the House an absolute assurance that any RDA that is currently, under its existing abilities under the 1998 legislation, using its money and time to co-ordinate or develop Olympic-related volunteering activities, Olympic-related jobs and contract activities, Olympic-related sporting events, Olympic cultural and artistic events and Olympic educational activities, and is giving advice to bodies about how, for instance, they set up training camps for visiting teams and is conducting, or plans to conduct, an audit of the facilities suitable for use during the Olympics, is acting within existing legislation?

Mr. Caborn: Yes, the RDAs can take those actions.

Mr. Foster: With that assurance from the Minister, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment made: No. 17, in page 25, line 6, at end insert—

'(2A) In relation to the purchase of land by a regional development agency for the purpose of preparing for the London Olympics (whether or not by virtue of subsection (1) and whether or not the purchase has another purpose also)—

(a) section 19 of the Acquisition of Land Act 1981 (c. 67) (open spaces, &c.) shall not apply,

(b) section 295 of the Housing Act 1985 (c. 68) (extinguishment of rights over land acquired) shall apply (with any necessary modifications) as it applies to a purchase by a local housing authority,

(c) no enactment regulating the use of commons, open spaces or allotments shall prevent or restrict the use of the land for construction, other works or any other purpose (but this paragraph does not disapply a requirement for planning permission), and

(d) any enactment permitting compulsory purchase shall be treated as applying to an interest in land whether or not it, or any superior or inferior interest, is held by the Crown.'.—[Mr. Caborn.]

Clause 39

COMMENCEMENT AND DURATION

Amendment made: No. 18, in page 27, line 23, after '3,' insert—

'(ea) section 35(2A)(a) and (d),'.—[Mr. Caborn.]

Mr. Caborn: I beg to move amendment No. 25, in page 27, line 23, leave out second 'and'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 26 and 16.

Mr. Caborn: This group of Government amendments addresses a very constructive point made by the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) in Committee and a smaller drafting point that we noticed afterwards. We are very magnanimous this evening, if I may say so.

Amendments Nos. 25 and 26 are necessary to allow the commencement of clause 37 on Royal Assent. Clause 37 applies the provisions of the Bill as appropriate to Northern Ireland. Thus, clause 37 on Northern Ireland will be brought into line with clause 36 on Scotland, which will commence on Royal Assent.

Amendment No. 16 follows the suggestion made by the Liberal Democrats in Committee that the short title should include a specific reference to the Paralympic games. I indicated in Committee that I agreed with that principle, as a central part of our bid was that the London Olympics would be an inclusive games. As many hon. Members know, London staged the first Paralympics in 1948, and we want to ensure that the 2012 Paralympics are the best so far.

I could not accept the amendment tabled by the Liberal Democrats in Committee because it was important to get the IOC's view on the exact wording—[Interruption.] I hear laughter from the hon. Member for Bath. I promised to consider the issue and my officials have been in touch with the IOC. The result is the proposed amendment to make the short title the "London Olympic Games and Paralympic Games Bill".

Hugh Robertson: Government amendments Nos. 25 and 26 are not contentious, and Government amendment No. 16 has the support of hon. Members on both sides of the House. I should like publicly to thank the Minister for fulfilling the promise that he made in Committee to introduce such amendments on Report and, indeed, to join in the general congratulations to the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) on proposing them in the first place.

As I said in Committee, I should like to add my strong support to the proposals in amendment No. 16. Paralympic sport has been moving up the sporting agenda considerably in recent years. As hon. Members on both sides of the House will be aware, at the 2004 Athens Paralympic games, the Great British team finished second in the medals table, with 94 medals, including a staggering total of 35 golds. The team achieved medals in 11 sports, and in doing so met the target set by Phil Lane of the British Paralympic Association. It is only right, therefore, that Paralympic sport is recorded as part of the Bill. Once again, I reiterate my full support.

Mr. Don Foster: Earlier, we discussed another amendment, the subject of which had been proposed in Committee by the Liberal Democrats, and the Minister went away to check it and has returned this evening with such an amendment. He was somewhat churlish in his attack on his own civil servants for not returning with a slightly differently worded amendment on that occasion. So I hope that, on this occasion, he will have the good grace to thank his civil servants who have suggested an amendment that is marginally different from the one that I proposed in Committee—the word "games" has been added. I congratulate the Minister and his civil servants on their ingenuity.

I am genuinely delighted that—having consulted the IOC—as the Minister found it necessary to do and clearly did—he is willing to accept such an amendment and to do what no one disputed from the outset: give equal emphasis to the Olympic and Paralympic games. As I said in Committee, it is worth remembering that Seb Coe, who deserves a great deal of praise for his role in achieving our success in getting the games, said on 29 August:

"We won our bid as one bid for both the Olympic Games and the Paralympic Games."

I am delighted that that fact will now be reflected in the Bill's title.

8.15 pm

Accepting such an amendment and placing equal emphasis on the Paralympic and Olympic games emphasises the responsibility on all of us to ensure that the games, London and the UK will be standard bearers for inclusion. We must place huge emphasis on ensuring that both the Olympic and the Paralympic games and all the facilities that relate to their provision are generally accessible to disabled people.

We have not had an opportunity on Report to discuss accessibility for disabled people, but the Minister will be well aware that there are continuing concerns about the need for more action in making transport facilities in London, venues and so on more friendly for disabled users. He shares my concern about that and has given assurances about it, but I hope that proposing amendment No. 16 to give equal emphasis to the Paralympic games will also remind him of the promises and commitments that he has made in respect of ensuring appropriate facilities for disabled people throughout the period of the Olympic and Paralympic games.

Mr. Caborn: I hear what the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) says, and we went over this in Committee. We are very proud that we were the first country to hold the Paralympic games in 1948. Overall, we acknowledge the major contribution made by the Paralympics and disabled sport generally. Broadly speaking, sport across the UK responds to that. I hope that we will be at the forefront in designing stadiums and other facilities for the Olympics with disabled people in mind, and I am sure that we will deliver on that.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 3

LONDON OLYMPICS ASSOCIATION RIGHT

Mr. Caborn: I beg to move amendment No. 21, in page 44, line 27, leave out paragraph (a).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Government amendment No. 22

'in any editorial usage including without limitation'.

Amendment No. 11, in page 46, line 5, leave out 'as a necessary incident' and insert 'in the course'.

Government amendment No. 23

Amendment No. 14, in page 46, line 8, at end insert—

Government amendment No. 24

Amendment No. 8, in page 46, line 21, at end insert—

'Duration of right

9A The London Olympics association right shall have effect from 31st December 2007 and shall expire in accordance with the provisions of this Act on 31st December 2012.'.

Amendment No. 9, in page 46, line 21, at end insert—

'Groundless threats of legal proceedings

9A (1) Where the London Organising Committee, the British Olympic Association or a person authorised under paragraph 4 threatens any other person or company with proceedings for infringement of the London Olympics association right, any person aggrieved by the threat may bring an action against the London Organising Committee, the British Olympic Association or the authorised person (as the case may be) for any such relief as is mentioned in sub-paragraph (2).

(2) Subject to sub-paragraph (3), the claimant shall be entitled to the following relief—

(a) a declaration to the effect that the threats are unjustifiable;

(b) an injunction against the continuance of the threats; and

(c) such damages, if any, as he has reasonably sustained by reason of the threats.

(3) If the defendant proves that the acts in respect of which proceedings were threatened constitute or, if done, would constitute an infringement of the London Olympics association right, the claimant shall not be entitled to the relief claimed.

(4) An action may not be brought under this paragraph if the person who made the threat has made an application, or brought an action, for an infringement of the London Olympics association right against the threatened person in relation to the act, or proposed act, to which the threat related.

(5) An action under this paragraph may not be continued if the person who made the threat makes an application, or brings an action, for an infringement of the London Olympics association right against the threatened person in relation to the act, or proposed act, to which the threat related.

(6) If the defendant would be entitled to make an application, or bring an action, against a person for an infringement of the London Olympics association right, the defendant may, in an action under sub-paragraph (1), make a counterclaim for any relief to which the defendant would be entitled.'.

Mr. Caborn: Government amendments Nos. 21 and 22 clarify the circumstances in which the Secretary of State can seek to remove words or phrases from the list contained in paragraph 3 of schedule 3 to the Bill. The amendments ensure that the Secretary of State can seek to remove words from the list if she feels that the London Olympic association right is becoming too unwieldy or that it is placing an unacceptable burden on businesses or advertisers. However, the amendments do not change the position that the Secretary of State can only add to, or vary, the lists in schedule 3 where that is necessary to prevent the commercial exploitation of the London Olympics. Any proposed change to the lists must still be debated and agreed to by both Houses of Parliament.

Amendment No. 23 brings the exemptions in schedule 3 into line with those that we have provided in relation the Olympics association right in schedule 2. The exemption relates to incidental inclusion in artistic, literary or dramatic works.

Amendment No. 24 will simply remove a drafting anomaly that crept into paragraph 9 of schedule 3. It removes the word "controlled" because the concept of a controlled representation is relevant to schedule 2, but not schedule 3.

I come now to the remaining amendments that relate to schedule 3. Amendment No. 8 would delay the commencement of the provisions in schedule 3 until 31 December 2007, although it is intended that the schedule will come into force on Royal Assent. The amendment would also cause schedule 3 to expire at the end of 2012, but clause 39(8) already provides for that.

I understand that the advertising industry is concerned about the practical application of schedule 3 and the possibility that its members could unwittingly or unknowingly infringe the London Olympics association right in the period immediately after Royal Assent. However, that does not change the principle that we should prevent people from commercially exploiting the London games, whether they do so now or in the weeks immediately before the opening ceremony in 2012.

There is also a practical reason why the provisions should commence on Royal Assent. Over the coming months, LOCOG will be approaching and identifying sponsors for 2012. It needs to be able to do that in a market free from unauthorised or ambush marketing. A high-profile campaign that ambushed the 2012 games now could harm LOCOG's ability to attract the sponsorship that it needs, thus, in effect, preventing it from raising the money that is needed to finance the games.

Both we and LOCOG realise that there is some uncertainty, especially for advertisers, about what people can and cannot do under the new provisions. LOCOG is already working closely with the advertising industry to provide its members with advice and guidance on interpreting and applying the new provisions. Keith Mills met representatives of the advertising industry on 31 October to discuss their concerns, and last week he wrote to the Advertising Association to establish a process for how LOCOG and the Advertising Association can work together in the future.

In Keith's latest letter, he says that LOCOG will take a sympathetic view of any infringements that occur immediately after the Bill comes into force on the assumption that they are likely to be inadvertent. However, LOCOG must have the power, and reserve the right, to take action against any persistent and malicious infringements in those early months by people who deliberately exploit the good will of the games. The approach that we have adopted strikes the right balance between the need to protect the Olympic brand and the need to ensure that advertisers are appropriately informed about how the new provisions will work. I thus ask the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) not to press amendment No. 8 to a Division.

Amendment No. 9 would allow people to bring a claim against LOCOG if it unjustifiably threatened to bring proceedings against them for a breach of schedule 3. In essence, the amendment aims to prevent LOCOG from acting in an unjustifiably heavy-handed manner when enforcing the provisions in schedule 3. We agree with hon. Members that that is an important principle, and we have already provided for it in paragraph 10(h) of schedule 3. Paragraph 10(h) will allow people to take action in relation to groundless threats regarding the London Olympics association right in the same way in which they currently can in relation to the Olympics association right under the Olympic Symbol etc. (Protection) Act 1995.

LOCOG has already said that its enforcement of schedule 3 will be proportionate and the steps that it has already taken bear that out. The experience of previous host cities is that a sensible balance is found and the organising committee, businesses and advertisers work closely together. I am sure that that will also be the case in London. The existing provisions in the Bill, the levers that the Government have in place with LOCOG, and LOCOG's commitment in the area mean that sufficient safeguards are in place to ensure that the powers in schedule 3 are not abused.

Amendments Nos. 10 to 14 all relate to the editorial and journalistic exemptions that we have created in paragraph 8 of schedule 3 to ensure that any form of legitimate editorial or journalistic work does not infringe the London Olympics association right. The principle of a journalistic and editorial exemption is obviously crucial. The proper balance must be struck between protecting the commercial viability of the London games on the one hand and preserving legitimate editorial and journalistic comment on the other. In particular, we must be careful to avoid a situation in which someone is able to exploit the games commercially by hiding behind a journalistic defence.

We believe that the careful exemptions that we have crafted in paragraph 8 of the schedule achieve that. They safeguard the London Olympics association right and maintain the essential freedom of the press. The inclusion of the term "necessary incident" in our proposed editorial and journalistic exemption is designed to prevent gratuitous use of the London Olympics. We want to prevent the proliferation of advertorials, the real motive of which is commercial gain, rather than genuine editorial comment.

It is also important to remember that for the purposes of schedule 3, people create an association between themselves and the games only if, in the course of trade, they suggest a commercial or contractual relationship, or a corporate or structural connection, with the games.

It would be unlikely that most editorial or journalistic works would create such an association. However, we understand the concerns of the print and broadcast media about the issue and we have been discussing the matter with them over the past few months. I can reassure them and hon. Members that only overt and explicit attempts to create an association between a media owner, or other entities, and the Olympics will constitute an infringement under our provisions. All legitimate editorial and journalistic practices will be exempt from the provisions in schedule 3.

Amendments Nos. 13 and 14 would ensure that news, current affairs, criticism and review were all covered by our journalistic exemptions. Again, I confirm that the current drafting of the Bill exempts such journalistic practice. We have been very clear when settling the policy that underlies the Bill that all legitimate editorial and journalistic practices will be exempt from infringing the London Olympic association right. We are confident that the Bill, as drafted, addresses the concerns that hon. Members have raised.

Mr. Don Foster: I am grateful for the Minister's introductory remarks and some of the assurances that he has put on the record, which go a long way towards resolving our concerns. Nevertheless, I hope that he will accept that it is necessary for me to try to tease out a few more assurances from him as I discuss the amendments.

I have no problems whatsoever with Government amendments Nos. 21 and 22. I do not think that I have a problem with Government amendment No. 23, but I might have. I would be grateful for some clarification of that amendment because its effect will depend very much on the way in which its words are interpreted. The phrase could have many different meanings. The amendment makes it clear that the wording comes from the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988. Section 31 of the Act states:

"as an incidental inclusion in"

"Copyright in a work is not infringed by its incidental inclusion in an artistic work, sound recording, film, broadcast or cable programme."

However, the phrase "incidental inclusion" is not defined in that Act, and it is not being defined in the Bill.

No doubt, the Minister has researched the matter thoroughly and will be aware that the leading case on the definition of "incidental inclusion" is the 2003 Court of Appeal judgment in the case of the Football Association Premier League Ltd. v. Panini UK Ltd. The court decided that the test of "incidental inclusion" should consider why a particular reference had been made, and whether that was for commercial or artistic reasons. Panini sold stickers of football players with photos showing them in their premier league kit, including the premier league logo. It was decided that that was not incidental, as the use of the logo was essential to the object for which the images were created. Although intentional and deliberate inclusion of copyright work may still be incidental, if the work in which it is included is intended to serve a commercial purpose it is unlikely to be deemed incidental.

8.30 pm

Will the Minister give us a clear indication of the definition that he has in mind for the word "incidental" in the legislation? He may find it helpful to look at that judgment, as it considers the motives for incidental inclusion. As he rightly pointed out, what matters is whether someone is seeking to make an unfair commercial gain for exploitative purposes. He may find that interpretation helpful and he may wish to put it firmly on the record. If that is the case, we would support him as long as we do not implement such an interpretation too harshly, as we could limit many activities if we are not careful. If we go too far down the commercial route we could create difficulties for television broadcasts. For example, a programme may be commercially motivated because it wishes to make money from advertising transmitted during the broadcast. It would therefore be helpful if the Minister provided clarification, either now or later.

I wish to focus on the amendments on editorial content. The rules governing editorial content and the London Olympics association right are problematic because they are vague. The Minister provided some clarification today, and he had a second bite at the cherry in Committee, where he amended the wording of the Bill. However, there is still room for improvement. In Committee, the Minister explained that paragraph 8 of schedule 3 is designed to ensure that normal media editorial activities are not curtailed by the London Olympics association right. The provision describes editorial usage that is exempt from the rules governing the London Olympics association right—namely, the publishing or broadcasting of information or reports on the Olympics.

The position appears to be clear until one considers the many permutations of editorial usage that are not included in the definition. Bona fide editorial activity could include news columns, features, readers' letters, reviews, comment and analysis in newspapers. In broadcasting, it could include documentaries, drama, children's programmes, travel programmes, panel discussions and news. To encompass all aspects of legitimate editorial usage, we tabled amendment No. 10, which refers to "any editorial usage including without limitation".

Such usage would be exempt from the regulations governing the London Olympics association right. That is a simpler and more effective approach that prevents any form of editorial usage from being inadvertently omitted from the list. Time after time, the Minister has said that he does not like lists because something can always be added or removed from them. I have solved the problem with wording that removes the need for a list. However, the amendment does not risk opening the floodgates for illegitimate association with the Olympics, because it maintains a clear distinction between editorial and advertising usage.

Amendment No. 13 follows on from amendment No. 10 as it, too, attempts to ensure that all legitimate editorial association with the Olympics is not regarded as an infringement of the association right. Paragraph 8 of schedule 3 permits representation of the Olympics in information about the London Olympics. However, in the course of their editorial activities, the media may publish information about other events and activities in which the London Olympics are mentioned but are not the subject. For example, a news item about London transport could refer to the Olympic games, although the games are not the subject of that information. Similarly, a feature article about sport in the national curriculum could refer to the Olympics, but such a report is not about the Olympics. Such usage should be covered by paragraph 8 by virtue of its editorial status, not by virtue of its content or the nature of the subject matter. Amendment No. 13 allows this by removing the requirement that information must be about the Olympics and, in order to ensure that all bona fide editorial usage is safeguarded, inserts "including news and current affairs".

Amendment No. 14 builds on amendment No. 13 and allows information associated with the Olympics to be used specifically "for the purposes of criticism and review".

Adding this category of editorial usage ensures that further material such as comment pieces, readers' letters and general reviews such as entertainment, leisure or travel is brought under the protective umbrella of paragraph 8.

Amendments Nos. 11 and 12 have been tabled to remove the possibility that a statutory body, LOCOG, could have a say in determining what constitutes legitimate editorial content. The Bill confines exemptions to the London Olympics association right to representation reports or information. As LOCOG is the grantor and enforcer of the association right, the Bill implies that LOCOG will apply paragraph 8, advising on and adjudicating editorial content.

"as a necessary incident of publishing or broadcasting"

It is worrying that any statutory body should play a part in controlling editorial activities. How can such a situation pertain? The Newspaper Society is deeply concerned about it and states:

"For a statutory body to have any role in determining the content of a newspaper's editorial material would be without precedent and would represent an utterly unacceptable incursion into the freedom of the press, and a breach of the Human Rights Act 1998 as being contrary to Article 10 of the Convention."

The Minister looks surprised, but he has had meetings with representatives of the media. ITN believes the paragraph introduces "an unacceptable level of external intrusion by a statutory body into editorial freedoms".

I hope the right hon. Gentleman takes those concerns seriously. We have tabled amendments Nos. 11 and 12 to remove the contentious wording and substitute the more neutral and legally certain specification that a representation must be "in the course" of publishing news or information.

It is important that we clarify the legislation governing editorial content and the Olympics association right in order to allow the media to perform their crucial role of informing and inspiring the public. Stifling the media's ability to report the London Olympics will damage the games as a whole and inevitably lead to a less successful games—a situation that we are all keen to avoid.

I fully support amendments Nos. 8 and 9, which are practical and pragmatic. For a long time there has been uncertainty about when various provisions will come into effect. The hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) proposes a sensible time scale. In Sydney, the time scales were even shorter. Knowing that the Minister is keen to get on as quickly as possible, the hon. Gentleman proposes a slightly earlier start date than I was expecting, but the amendments make eminent sense and I wish him luck in persuading the Minister to accept the good sense of what he is about to propose.

Hugh Robertson: Time is marching on so I shall be brief. I thank the Minister for his comments in connection with amendment No. 9. In the light of his assurances, I am happy to leave the matter there.

On amendment No. 8, I wholly accept what the Minister says about LOCOG's desire to start the process of looking for sponsors early, and the fact that it needs the necessary safeguards if it is to do that. However, there are concerns in the advertising industry about the practical implications for advertising pre-clearance and copy advice. Television advertising, in particular, has long lead times. As we all know, advertisements can be 18 months in the making, and a campaign costs hundreds of thousands of pounds to produce and broadcast. There are serious and costly implications for advertisers and broadcasters if the Broadcast Advertising Clearance Centre, the BACC, has given clearance to a TV advertisement before it is broadcast, and its decision is subsequently overturned by LOCOG. It could, in theory, insist that the advertisement were withdrawn, but under this legislation it could also sue for damages and take out an injunction against the advertiser.

Secondly, another, even more technical issue must be addressed before the Bill comes into effect. The committee of advertising practice, which is the code-owning body within the Advertising Standards Authority system, offers advertising copy advice on a voluntary basis in the non-broadcast media. I understand that the CAP has said that it is not in a position to give copy advice because the legislation will lie outside its self-regulatory British code of advertising, sales promotion and direct marketing, which the ASA enforces. The CAP apparently takes a similar approach to financial services advertising, the components of which are regulated entirely by the Financial Services Authority, which is a body that I remember with considerable pleasure from my time in the City.

I realise that both of those points are technical, and if the Minister undertakes to write to me I will be happy not to press them.

Mr. Caborn: We have all been reading from scripts on the final group of amendments and have been extremely well briefed by forces outside this House. I understand the concerns of some of our dear colleagues in media and advertising—although their points are highly technical, they are important.

We have framed the Bill to protect LOCOG and the Olympics, to make sure that the Olympics are not exploited by rogue elements and to maintain the freedom of the press. The hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) knows that a dialogue is continuing with those in media and advertising. I cannot add much to what I have said already. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Some hon. Members want to leave the House sooner rather than later. I will write to hon. Members to clear up those points, which will allow them to write to those who sent them the brief, to whom I will also respond.

Mr. Don Foster: I am most grateful for the Minister's extremely brief, unhelpful response.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister has responded to his own Government amendment. The hon. Gentleman does not have the right to reply to a reply to a reply.

Amendment agreed to.

Remaining Government amendments agreed to.

Order for Third Reading read.—[Queen's Consent, on behalf of the Crown, and Prince of Wales's consent, on behalf of the Duchy of Cornwall, signified.]

8.43 pm

Mr. Caborn: I beg to move, That the Bill be read the Third time.

I shall start by thanking all the members of the Standing Committee and all hon. Members who have taken part in today's debate. The Bill has received thorough scrutiny, which has been conducted in a fair-minded fashion throughout. I am particularly grateful for the consistent support provided by the hon. Members for Faversham and Mid-Kent and for Bath. They have been quick to understand and welcome the principles behind the Bill, and they have kept me on my toes throughout.

I am also grateful for the support provided by the devolved Administrations. Hon. Members will be glad to note that on 10 November the Scottish Parliament gave its consent to those provisions in the Bill that trigger the Sewel convention, and I have taken the opportunity to place a copy of the relevant Scottish Executive memorandum, including the Sewel motion, in the Libraries of both Houses.

On Third Reading, it is worth taking a step back from the detail to remind the House why we have introduced this Bill and why the Bill is so important to the success of the London Olympics. We need the Olympics to be on time and on budget, which is why we must get the ODA up and running quickly as the single body responsible for planning and construction.

It is great that we now have a dynamic leadership team in place in Jack Lemley and David Higgins. I wish them both well. They have a proven track record in delivering huge projects, and they can now get on with the preparatory work that needs to be done on the setting up of the ODA. To do the rest of the job, they need the full set of powers and functions that the Bill provides in order to plan and construct venues and facilities, to co-ordinate the transport plan, and to maintain a clean Olympic environment. Through the Bill, we are able to ensure that the ODA is fully accountable to Ministers and to Parliament.

The ODA will be at the centre of the Olympic project for the next seven years. After 2012, it will have a key role in helping to reconfigure Olympic venues and the Olympic park to ensure that the games result in real and lasting benefits for east London and for the whole United Kingdom.

Mr. Hollobone: What consideration has been given to the conjunction of the Olympic games in 2012 with, if all goes well, the diamond jubilee of Her Majesty the Queen? Given that a large number of Commonwealth countries will take part in the Olympic games, is there any way in which the two events can be joined together, as it were, better to promote the United Kingdom across the world?

Mr. Caborn: That has been mentioned in several meetings at which I have been present, although not in any great detail. I take on board what the hon. Gentleman says and will ensure that it is reported to the relevant areas to see whether we can move it forward.

The ODA, while central, is only one piece in the jigsaw. The Bill also ensures that where other organisations have key responsibilities for delivering the games, they have the legal powers that they need. For instance, the amendments we have discussed will ensure that regional development agencies, including the London Development Agency, have all the powers that they need to acquire the land required for the games, to time and to budget. The Mayor signed the host city contract on London's behalf, and the Greater London Authority will provide a significant slice of funding. The Bill provides the GLA with an Olympic power to ensure that those obligations are fulfilled and that the GLA is able to help prepare for and to manage the games.

Under the host city contract, LOCOG has a wide range of obligations to the IOC about how the games will be managed. Some of those obligations need to be reflected in the Bill, particularly the IOC's requirements on ticket touting and what it terms brand protection. Those have been among the most keenly debated parts of the Bill, especially where we are creating new intellectual property rights relating to London 2012 for LOCOG to protect. I repeat that the measures that we are taking to protect against ambush marketing are vital not only for the financial security of LOCOG and the games but for the image of the Olympics, which must not become tarnished by a commercial free-for-all. I do not think that many Members would disagree with those principles. I hope that in the course of debates in Committee and on Report I have provided full reassurance that where new restrictions are being created they will be enforced in a proportionate and targeted fashion in consultation with the advertising industry and others. We must be firm in stopping those who want to rip off the Olympics, but we will not disrupt anyone's right to make an honest living.

The quick passage of this Bill is the first milestone in the successful delivery of the 2012 games. The IOC has been particularly complimentary about the progress that we have made in getting the legislation this far this quickly. It is pleased that London has been so quick to get itself moving towards 2012. I thank the Opposition for helping us to make that happen. This is a good Bill that is better for the amendments that we have made to it. I commend it to the House.

Hugh Robertson: It is exactly five months since 6 July, when we won the games bid in Singapore. I want to finish my remarks on the Bill where I started on Second Reading by congratulating all those who worked so hard to bring the Olympic games to London. I say that not because it is a nice thing to say at the end of the passage of a piece of legislation but because I genuinely mean it. I pay tribute to Lord Coe, Keith Mills and everybody involved in the bid at London 2012. I congratulate the other shareholders: the Government, particularly the Prime Minister, who did so much in the days running up to the bid, the Secretary of State and the Minister, who has dealt with the Bill as it has gone through the House; the Mayor of London; and the British Olympic Association, especially the Princess Royal, who did particularly well in Singapore and has not, in some quarters, received the thanks that she deserves.

I also hope—again, I say this very honestly—that the Minister will take back to his Department my thanks and those of my party to his civil servants, who have worked extremely hard on the bid and on the Bill as it has gone through the House.

Delivering a successful Olympic games in 2012 will not be easy, and there is no doubt that it is a considerable challenge, but the Bill's Third Reading marks a significant moment in delivery on the pledges made to the IOC in Singapore. Although the Bill is not lengthy in parliamentary terms, it is quite complex, setting up a regional development agency in the Olympic delivery authority in the first half and establishing the ground rules for the commercial media rights in the second. I am pleased that we have found so much common ground, have been able to improve the Bill, and have been able to maintain cross-party support.

As the Bill leaves our House, I have only three outstanding concerns. To be honest, I must say that not all of them relate to the Bill. First, sport as a whole must benefit from our hosting the games in 2012. I think that there is a good deal of cross-party agreement on that, but it is not yet entirely clear how it will be achieved.

I should like effort to be concentrated on three elements. Much good work has already been done on reform of the organisation of sport—I commend the Minister for that—but there is more to be done, along the lines of what has been suggested by the independent sports review. We also need the funds that are necessary to meet the British Olympic Association's objective of moving us from 10th to fourth in the medal table. There are also implications for non-Olympic sports, particularly mass-participation sports. It is feared that funds will be diverted from them to the Olympics.

Our second main concern, which has been discussed at length today, is the impact of cost overruns on the London council tax payer. Finally, there is a small issue that I fear may cause problems in the other place: the reversal of the presumption of innocence.

If the Government are prepared to offer concessions on any of those three outstanding issues, it will ease the Bill's passage. Having said that, I bid it fair passage. I thank the Minister and his civil servants for what they have done, and reaffirm my party's support for the Bill and, indeed, the games. The Olympics are the most unique historic and valuable asset in world sport. I am delighted and, like sport lovers throughout the country, not a little excited that London is to host the games in 2012.

Lyn Brown (West Ham) (Lab): For me, the central issue in the debate is whether the 2012 games are remembered not just for providing a truly world-class event for London, but for giving a lifelong legacy to east London, to London generally and to the United Kingdom. I believe that the Bill augurs well for the delivery of successful games, on time and to budget. Like the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson), however, I have three remaining concerns. First, there is the question of who will be held to account for the delivery of the legacy of the games. Secondly, there is the lack of reference to local government, along with its implications. Thirdly, there are the local difficulties caused to residents and businesses.

The physical legacy to my constituency is not in doubt. West Ham will look very different by 2012. Two thirds of the Olympic park and most of the facilities—including the athletes' village, the main stadium, the swimming pools, the media centre and the warm-up tracks—will be in Newham, and 18 of the 26 events will take place within 20 minutes' walk of Stratford station. We have been promised the creation of the largest capital-city park in Europe for 150 years, a park that will incorporate the venues but will also, symbolically and physically, unify communities. It will be the heart of a prestigious new development, Stratford City. The proposals will deliver more than 9,000 new homes in and around the Olympic park, with schools and health and community facilities to match. That is welcome news for my constituency and the surrounding area.

Newham has an exceptionally young population: 41 per cent. of its inhabitants are under 25. It is a poor constituency, bordering to the west and north on areas that are also poor. All its key indicators are in the bottom 10 of the list drawn up by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. The promised legacy of the Olympics and the Paralympics would provide a sustainable solution to the poverty and disadvantage experienced in my constituency and in other communities with similar social and economic indicators, and the Bill goes a long way towards embracing that aspiration.

One of the difficulties that I have with the drafting of the Bill is that clause 4(3) states that "the Authority shall, wherever relevant— have regard to the desirability of maximising the benefits to be derived after the London Olympics from things done in preparation for them".

Will the Minister emphasise and underline that commitment, so that the words appear a little less soft and a bit more enthusiastic and emphatic?

"have regard to the desirability"

We said in the bid that we would radically transform London's east end and, through this sporting spectacle, regenerate a poor inner-city area. I recognise that that will be a huge challenge, and to achieve it we must be clear about whose job it is. Who is to be responsible for overseeing the delivery of the legacy? If I understand the situation correctly, neither the London organising committee for the Olympic games—LOCOG—nor the Olympic Delivery Authority owns the responsibility for delivering the legacy for the country. Individual organisations are responsible for the delivery of bits of it—for example, Sport England will be responsible for the sporting legacy, but which body will ensure that it is on track to deliver greater grass-roots participation? Who will be held accountable for the employment legacy, or for realising the health benefits? Who will be responsible for monitoring and scrutinising the different agencies charged with delivery of the various legacy plans?

The reference in clause 4(3) is perhaps not designed to ensure the delivery of the greatest challenge to the games, namely the economic and social legacy. It was the whole package that prompted the huge support for the bid from ordinary Londoners and others, and we must not let them down. I hope that the Minister will consider establishing a formal mechanism and place official ownership of the responsibility for the legacy within the proposed delivery processes. The games are a catalyst to be seized or squandered. We need to plan for the social gains from the games, to set targets for the reduction of poverty, and to realise real social and economic change for the poorest in society from this huge investment.

I get a sense of the potential of the legacy by considering the impact that the bidding process had on my constituency. As a councillor in the London borough of Newham, I led a two-year programme of sporting, cultural and community activity, using the pull of the Olympics to engage and inspire the community. By the end of the bidding process, there were clear, tangible benefits for the betterment of health, education and antisocial behaviour. For example, 43 per cent. of free swims were taken up by people in social groups D and E, and there were 64,000 attendances at Newham's Olympic summer of sport. The completion rates for exercise on prescription schemes went up from 34 to 52 per cent., and 40 new after-school clubs were founded around sport and physical activity. The number of sports coaches more than doubled, new disability sports clubs were established, and the West Ham Asians in Football programme was expanded. And 25 per cent. fewer young people were reported to the local magistrates court.

There are many more similar examples, and if all that can be achieved by local authority leadership around the bid process alone, the social legacy of the games could be truly life-transforming. Those schemes required funding and were achieved by a combination of mainstream and temporary funding. The gains were achieved by local government working in the community. This was not rocket science, and I am sure that examples such as those have been and will be replicated by other local authorities across the country.

If we are to get real social and economic benefits from the games, local government must be integral to the planning and delivery of the soft outcomes for social and economic regeneration. In October 2000, the Government charged local government with the duty to provide for the economic, social and environmental well-being of its own areas. They did so because local government is best placed to deliver those objectives locally; it is part of its core business. We need to ensure that local government is at our Olympic table, leading on clearly drawn and resourced local renewal and regeneration strategies.

The job of realising the legacy is too big for one tier of government, whether national, regional or local. The job can be done successfully only if all tiers of government and the voluntary, community and private sectors work together in partnership towards the same objectives.

We must remember that renewal and regeneration will come at a price for some in the area where the games are to be held. Local businesses will be displaced because of the need to create space for the Olympic park stadium. Estimates suggest that more than 300 businesses will be affected by the proposals. Companies are increasingly concerned by the action or, they feel, lack of action by the London Development Agency. Negotiations have been under way for a long time and no conclusions have yet been reached. That is placing reputable and thriving concerns in jeopardy, and it is not on. Surely the LDA must take immediate steps to assure the businesses concerned and to expedite relocation and compensation. If the LDA does not have the resources or capacity to undertake that role, I ask the Minister to act, and either to provide additional capacity or to take the responsibility from the agency.

The games will also result in the demolition of the housing co-op at Clays lane, which was established in the early 1980s to address the lack of housing for young, single people in the east of London. Approximately, it houses about 450 tenants, who face an uncertain and unsettling future. Communication appears to have been sparse and not very comforting, with assurances made prior to the bid now apparently being watered down by the LDA. I ask the Minister again to hold the agency to account, and to ensure that those tenants are not disadvantaged by their relocation.

If the legacy of the games is to be realised, we must plan for it, ensure that we know who is responsible for the delivery of the legacy and hold them to account to deliver on it. The challenges of east London are immense, but the opportunities of those challenges are in our grasp if we harness and resource all parties to deliver on them. Let us realise the potential of the games, and deliver a real legacy for generations.

9.2 pm

Mr. Don Foster: In some parts of America, politicians can have their speeches read into the record without having to deliver them. In a sense, I wish that we had that opportunity, as my opening remarks echo entirely what the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) said. Rather than list all the people he listed, let me merely say that all those people deserve our thanks for the huge amount of work that they did to bring the Olympics and Paralympics to London in 2012. It was a fantastic team effort by a large number of dedicated and committed people, and one thing above all set our bid apart from everybody else's—its underpinning of Olympic and Paralympic ideals in relation to sporting activities, which could liberate and inspire people not only in this country but across the world.

I also want to thank the Minister for his contribution and thank the Opposition parties for the role that we have played. It is important to place it on record that a small but perhaps important part of the reason that we won the bid was the clear demonstration of all-party unity in backing it. I hope that our deliberations today, on Report and Third Reading, and the work done in Committee and on Second Reading indicate that that cross-party co-operation can continue while allowing the opportunity for constructive criticism when we disagree in certain areas. We have made splendid progress, however, in getting the Bill to this stage. Indeed, given that the Olympics afford a glorious opportunity for Britain, it is right that the Bill has had a smooth passage. It is equally important to recognise that progress has been made on so many other fronts, not only on the measure.

It was fantastic to hear Denis Oswald, the chairman of the IOC's co-ordination commission for the games, say towards the end of August of the work on the Olympics here,

"it could not have started on a better footing".

A huge amount of work has already been done and more is under way. Compulsory purchase orders have been issued and LOCOG now has many staff. Many are experienced and were involved in the bid. The Go for Gold scratchcard is a huge success and has already raised more than £3 million. It is the most successful scratchcard of its type. We know about the Mayor's exciting proposals for the great rejuvenation and redevelopment of the east end of London.

Much else has happened. Building work is under way at the Olympic park but that is also true in other parts of the country, such as Norwich, Sunderland, Edinburgh and Brighton. Betting has already started on how well different countries will do in the Olympics. I noted with interest that Lord Moynihan, who heads the British Olympic Association, has bet his Australian counterpart on how many gold medals their respective countries will win. The winner will provide bottles of Bollinger to the other. We shall see how that goes.

However, much remains to be done. The Bill is important because it establishes the framework in which the work will be done, the way in which we ensure that the resources come in and the right bodies to make it happen. For example, we must provide appropriate protection for IOC and LOCOG sponsors against ambush marketing, inappropriate advertising and so on.

There is a huge prize, if we get it right. We will invigorate our sporting nation, regenerate some of the most deprived areas in our country, improve the environment, thus setting sustainability standards for the future, showcase the country's excellence in arts and culture and—perhaps most important—unite the nation. That is an exciting prospect and the work that we have done on the Bill—the amendments and changes that we have made—ensure that we will progress and deliver a successful games.

The hon. Member for West Ham (Lyn Brown) is passionate about the games coming to London. She speaks passionately about the enthusiasm in her area for them and talks movingly of the way in which they will provide sustainable regeneration in her area. She is right to stress that. On other occasions, she has spoken about the way in which the games can raise the aspirations of the people she represents. She summed it up today by saying that the Olympics will leave a life-transforming social legacy. That is true for West Ham and every other part of the country.

It is interesting to note a recent survey, which showed that 68 per cent. of Londoners said that the games would bring long-term benefits. That statistic is reflected in many other parts of the country. The figure rose to 78 per cent. among 18 to 34-year-olds. Young people in particular understand the genuine benefit that can derive from the games.

We have made a united, fantastic start on delivering the best ever Olympic and Paralympic games. There is a long way to go and I hope that the unity that we have experienced so far in the House will continue.

9.10 pm

Mr. Andy Reed: I am delighted to discuss the Bill on Third Reading. It has been a great pleasure to take part in the consideration of the Bill, including in Committee. With sport, we often have cross-party consensus on how we want to deliver legislation. That was reflected both in the bid beforehand and in our consideration of the Bill in Committee. The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) highlighted the fact that we have managed to maintain that approach so far. There was a slight reluctance on the Government's part to back the bid right from the start before they had carried out a proper assessment. They were concerned about whether it would be possible to maintain the process until 2012, particularly given the way in which the media like to treat these matters, with the British approach of doom and gloom. So far, we have managed to maintain a spirit of optimism, and I hope that the spirit of co-operation that has been evident today and throughout consideration of the Bill in Committee will continue until 2012.

The legacy of the games will be important for each and every one of us, not only for those in London. There will be social and sporting benefits throughout the country. It is imperative that the Bill delivers a sporting legacy that brings about a massive difference for people throughout the United Kingdom. Some people, although not many, do not appreciate the value of sport and what it can do for their local community in terms of health, education, crime reduction and purely for its own sake. The warm words that are usually associated with sport have to be turned into action and, harshly, into hard cash. We have warm words for the arts sector, and it receives an enormous amount of Exchequer funding. I wish that we could generate the same level of funding to encourage sporting prowess in this country, especially at grass-roots level, where we still have some work to do.

We have made some tremendous strides in league funding and school sport, and have managed to make up for the past 15 or 20 years of decline. Indeed, that has been turned around. Although we can be proud of being able to generate the next generation of young people who are interested in sport, who have had the opportunity to participate and who now want to carry that through, there is a pyramid. Our elite facilities in Loughborough, Sheffield and Bath are among the best in the world. I am sure that other hon. Members know of other excellent sporting facilities throughout the country, for example in Weymouth and Cardiff. I have been to UWIC to be thrashed by the Welsh at rugby, so I am aware of those great facilities.

Although we have the ability to deliver at league level, to make a difference we must deliver at grass-roots level, so that everyone, when they walk out of their front doors, knows that they have a sporting opportunity in whatever sport they wish to participate in. That may be one of the 28 Olympic sports, but we must ensure that there is the same passion and that the same ability to participate is open to everyone in all the other sports that will not be represented at the Olympics. To make a sporting pun, we should not take our eye off the ball. We must recognise all sporting agendas.

It is my passion that sports volunteers should receive recognition for what happens. At the Olympics, we shall rightly focus on trying to get as many UK athletes, throughout all the sporting agendas, on to the podium. A great deal of effort will be made to ensure that we come fourth, fifth or sixth in the medal table. It would be fantastic if we managed to achieve fourth place. The media will decide whether the Olympic games have been a success or a failure on the basis of the number of people we get on to the podium.

For me—I am sure that this applies to the many who are passionate about sport—the real success will be our legacy, participation and generating the next group of people who will volunteer and come through. It has been interesting to be involved in consideration of the Bill because we have been trying to build on our legacy. We have not been waiting for 2012. We cannot call on sports volunteers the week before the Olympics start and say, "Right, you will now wear a blazer and be involved." We must build up the expertise and the volunteer base to ensure that we have people who are fully skilled. We must use the enthusiasm for the Olympics to ensure that that happens.

It was fantastic to be part of that enthusiasm and to see complete strangers hugging each other and jumping for joy—I was not among them as I was filming those fantastic events with my camera. I was delighted to be asked to serve on the Committee that considered the Bill. Being from Loughborough, I was excited to be involved in the London Olympics Bill, but I did not realise that most of it would be about traffic regulation, brand protection and the establishment of a regional development agency. It was an interesting learning curve. It has been fascinating to discover the process, particularly on brand protection, as I had just a little knowledge of that.

A couple of outstanding issues have been touched on in the debate. We have mentioned betting. I understand that one of the contractual commitments that the Government have given to the IOC is to allow it to control—or even, if it seems appropriate, to prohibit—betting on the Olympics in the UK. I hope that the Minister will write to me on those issues, as although we have touched on them, we have probably not followed them through, and they are clearly important.

The issue of betting has the potential to strike at the integrity of sport. For example, a referee in Germany took bribes to throw particular games and there have been other examples at the Olympics. Cricket has had its own problems over the past few years. Sporting integrity and betting now go together. The IOC has managed to stamp down on the drugs problem, and it would be great to ensure in the build-up to 2012 that we are well ahead of the game as sports betting increasingly becomes an issue.

I am not sure whether we have managed to cover that issue sufficiently during deliberations on the Bill so far, or whether the Minister has plans to introduce any amendments in the Lords to cover the commitment to the IOC and how far that goes. As he knows, there are some problems in the sports betting world over the pools companies no longer entering contractual relationships with the football leagues for the sale of data, particularly match data. That creates another little knock-on problem for grass-roots sport. We talked about that earlier when we discussed the lottery and how the money is distributed. So there are little problems. They may involve only tens of thousands of pounds for some football clubs, but they are important, so I hope that the Minister will examine that matter.

The Minister mentioned ticket touting. The Bill includes some welcome measures to protect the London Olympics from ticket touts. As he knows, ticket touting is a growing problem for sport. It diverts resources from sport and deprives real fans of tickets. When many of us who are passionate about sport and involved at grass-roots level try to get hold of tickets, we find that the corporate packages make it increasingly difficult for genuine fans to do so. That is why I welcome the recent ticket touting summit that the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport has called with representatives of the major sporting governing bodies. I hope that that is a success.

The Minister will know that the International Rugby Board is a strong supporter of legislation to combat ticket touting. I wonder whether we can build into the Bill measures to extend the same protection as we have given the Olympic team to those involved in other sports. That would be most welcome.

This is a reasonable Bill. It has been fantastic just to play a small part in the process of delivering the Olympics. All of us who have been involved in the Bill will enjoy seeing the end of its passage in this place and look forward with great passion and, as the hon.

Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) said, excitement to being part of the crowd watching the greatest Olympics that we have known in London in 2012. I hope, too, that people from all over the country, including those who have the potential to play a part in training camps or as volunteers, will enjoy it. We must ensure not only that we enjoy it but that we get up there on the Olympic medal table, and that the lasting legacy is not just those golds but a future for British sport that means that we take it seriously and put our cash where our mouths are.

Mr. Caborn: As I said earlier, it has been a privilege and pleasure to take the Bill through Parliament. The contributions on Third Reading show what the nation was feeling on 6 July. My hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) encapsulated that. Many people stood in Trafalgar square, and some Members were with me in Singapore. I visited my French counterpart, Jean-Francois Lamour, in the hall in Singapore, and I had to squeeze past some 50 or 60 journalists to get to him. Steve Redgrave and David Beckham were involved on our behalf, but we had only three photographers in front of us. I thought, "The result has been leaked and we obviously haven't won." Jacques Rogge kept the world in suspense by delaying opening the envelope containing the result. I point out by way of an aside that as we speak, a silver letter-opener is being made for him, on which is engraved, "Please do not keep the world waiting in anticipation again." When Jacques Rogge finally opened that envelope, he said, "London." Until that moment, a lot of people who wanted us to win the bid did not quite believe that we could do so. Such enthusiasm added to the atmosphere in Trafalgar square and definitely to that in Singapore, and it has carried all the way through. When people look back in years to come, they will recognise that through this Bill, we have established a foundation for an Olympic games that has never been established before.

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport and I, along with others, travelled the world to speak to representatives of many of the cities that have hosted the Olympics. We asked one simple question: "What would you do differently if you hosted the games again?" They were very generous in giving advice and we have worked on the basis of it. The product is this Bill, which will deliver a structure that will address, for example, the concerns expressed by the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) about cost overruns. The framework that we have established will be cost-effective, and it is absolutely crucial that in the next 18 months, we get the company up and running, the various structures in place and the contracts laid. We must not get involved in crisis management; we must control the process from start to finish. If we do that, we will host a good games. Such an approach will also enable us to tackle seriously the other elements that make an Olympic games highly successful.

One such element is legacy. Other Olympic games have had to resort to crisis management, and we ourselves have done so with certain big projects. We have learned from that. Avoiding the need for crisis management will give us the space in which to develop the games. Legacy, which the Olympic board controls, is a very important issue to which there are many strands: the built environment, the human environment, the sporting infrastructure, and the cultural infrastructure. I hope that after 2012, we will leave behind one of the best sporting infrastructures in the world. Other strands include participation and talent identification. We want the talented athlete scholarship scheme to find talented young people in our secondary schools not by chance but by design, and to maximise their potential for producing world-class performances. Unlike Steve Redgrave and Kelly Holmes, who were discovered by chance, we want such people to be discovered by design. We are instituting that scheme and the mentoring of young students, arranging the curriculum around such activities and taking them through the scheme as one. The Olympic board deals with many such legacy issues, and in turn it is responsible to this House and its organs, such as Select Committees. I am sure that we will deliver in this area.

On betting, the IOC has asked us to look at that issue, but we have made it clear that we have no plans to legislate. We are discussing with the governing bodies how we can assist on the question of ticket-touting, particularly in the light of the electronic means by which touting is now carried out, such as via eBay.

The momentum generated by the great euphoria of 6 July is still there throughout the country. If we can maintain it by developing cultural activities and grass-root sports projects throughout the UK—in the regions and through the devolved Administrations—we will have a lasting legacy that will be second to none.

Many of us take seriously the narrative on which we won the games—which was reconnecting young people with sport through the five rings and the Olympic movement. While the Bill is about the delivery of the games by the UK, I believe that we have a responsibility to the Olympic movement and the world to use the great influence that we have through the Commonwealth, the European Union and many other institutions to achieve that aim. Seb Coe and those working with him hope that, come 2012, we will deliver the narrative on which, according to the International Olympic Committee, we won the bid and bring young people back into sport through the Olympic movement.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Medicine Reviews (Older People)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Tony Cunningham.]

9.26 pm

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the subject of medication reviews for older people. I do so because I believe that if good practice in medication review were to be the norm across the NHS, it could transform the lives of millions of people.

At the moment, there are more than 3.6 million people over 75 taking at least one medication and 1.6 million taking four or more medications. On the evidence that I have, it is clear that most of them have never benefited from a review of their medication in the way that is envisaged in the national service framework for older people. Getting the dosage right, understanding the complex interplay of different medicines and making sure that medicines are taken at the right time can make a huge difference to people's health and quality of life. For some, simply getting medication right can be like turning the light back on—it can make a huge difference. For others, getting the medication right can be a matter of life or death.

My purpose in having a debate on this issue is to press the Minister for more concerted action to realise the full potential of medication reviews. What do I mean by medication review? That is a good question, because there is no single agreed definition of what constitutes a medication review. However, there is a proposed definition. It comes from the medicines partnership and has been endorsed by the Department of Health. It says that a medication review is:

"A structured, critical examination of a patient's medicines with the objective of reaching an agreement with the patient about treatment, optimising the impact of medicines, minimising the number of medication related problems and reducing waste."

I have long been concerned about the impact that poor medication practice can have on the quality of life of older people. In particular, I still do not believe that enough is being done to stamp out the inappropriate use of medication in care homes. At its worst, the use of medication becomes restraint by chemical means, and that is elder abuse.

According to the most recent figures from the Commission for Social Care Inspection, more than 5,700 of the 13,000 care homes in England either did not meet or almost met the national minimum standard for medication last year. Let us be clear that we are talking about a minimum standard. I acknowledge that those figures are a modest improvement on the previous year, but try telling that to the residents living in one of the homes who do not meet the minimum standard.

I was even more worried to note that the National Care Standards Commission—the predecessor of the Commission for Social Care Inspection—pointed out in its report on medication that:

"The majority of prescribed medicines will be supplied by a GP on a repeat basis at the request of care staff and not the service user."

That places care staff in a powerful position to influence prescribing for good or for ill. In a briefing for today's debate, the Parkinson's Disease Society points out the need to review the medicine management standards, especially standard 9.1, which deals with self-medication. It wants to see greater clarity over the issue of timing of medication, and I strongly agree.

In 2003, a study in the British Medical Journal concluded that older people in care homes received poorer medical care than those living at home, in terms of over-use of inappropriate or unnecessary drugs, poor monitoring of chronic disease and under-use of beneficial drugs. That is one of the reasons why regular medication review should be part of the process and why I welcomed the national service framework for older people medication standards.

Although I support the standards, it must be said that international evidence suggests that annual reviews of prescriptions for elderly people, as proposed in the NSF, are inadequate. Harm can be done, and is done, in far less than a year. There is a huge gap between the intention of the Government's policy, which is to be applauded, and its implementation over the last few years since the NSF was published. That gap has been caused by a lack of clarity and insufficient incentives to deliver what is expected; in particular, the new GP contract does not provide the necessary incentives for more frequent reviews.

Among the indicators in the quality and outcomes framework—QOF—for the contract, two specifically incentivise regular review of medication. The first is:

"A medication review is recorded in the notes in the preceding 15 months for all patients being prescribed four or more repeat medicines."

That is worth seven points. The second is:

"A medication review is recorded in the notes in the preceding 15 months for all patients being prescribed repeat medicines."

That is worth eight points. So the QOF says 15 months, yet the NSF talks about 12 months for people on fewer than four medications and six months for people on more than four medications. Neither actually sets out what qualifies as a medication review. Am I the only one who thinks there is a problem?

Every time I have raised the issue with Ministers through written questions and in debate I have been left with the distinct feeling that the NSF medicine review standard has been quietly dropped. That impression was reinforced in February when the Minister of State, Department for Transport, the hon. Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman), who was then a Minister in the Department of Health, told me:

"The quality and outcomes framework (QOF) indicator for medication reviews for people prescribed repeat medicines was developed by a group of independent experts who were commissioned by the British Medical Association and the NHS Confederation. The group developed QOF indicators using its own search of the evidence and did not necessarily use existing national service framework (NSF) standards. Although this means that the QOF indicators and NSF standards may not match entirely, meeting the QOF indicator will go a long way to helping practices meet the NSF standard and vice versa."—[Official Report, 3 February 2005; Vol. 430, c. 1119W.]

That really beggars belief. It is optimistic, but when the Department was signing off the QOF why did not it ensure that the NSF standard would be achieved? What is the point of producing the NSF standard if it is not being used in that way?

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this debate. Let me assure him that he is not the only one with those concerns. There is a growing number of elderly people in my constituency. If there were to be more regular medication reviews, how would that burden affect already overstretched local GP services?

Mr. Burstow: I shall probably come to that later in my remarks. There could be an additional burden on GPs and also on pharmacists, and some useful evaluation of the relevant guidelines has been conducted.

On the point that I was raising about the QOF and the NSF, I was reassured recently by a written answer from the Minister who will reply to the debate. He told me that the NSF standard had not been superseded. That is good news, but the truth is that the standard has not been achieved either. In a written answer, the Minister told me:

"Historic data for both measures"— the milestones set in the NSF for older people—

"collected from the 146 PCTs taking part in the programme"— the national medicines management collaborative programme—

"suggest that there have been significant and sustained improvements in the number and quality of medication reviews."—[Official Report, 16 June 2005; Vol. 435, c. 642W.]

Where is the evidence to support that contention? Certainly the evaluation of the implementation of the "Room for Review" guidance on medication reviews published by the medicines partnership earlier this year does not point to significant and sustained improvement.

Part 1 of the evaluation found that only 8 per cent. of primary care trusts had met the NSF standard for annual medication reviews for patients aged over 75. Worse still, just 5 per cent. had met the target for six-monthly reviews for patients over 75 who were on four or more medicines. The NSF milestone for medicine reviews was 2002. That is when this was meant to be in place, albeit with the potential burdens that would arise from it.

Even in 2004, 47 per cent. of PCTs were reporting that they would not be able to conduct six-monthly medicine reviews for over-75s on four or more medicines. Delve a little deeper into part 1 of the evaluation and one finds that even in those PCTs that said they were doing it, not every GP practice was actually conducting and taking part in medication reviews. More worrying still, the evaluation found that in the PCTs that had implemented medication reviews, only a minority of reviews were conducted face to face. That type of patient-centred review was therefore being considered by PCTs as "aspirational"—as a gold standard—and therefore limited to more complex patients.

As I am sure the Minister will know, "Room for Review" defined four levels of medication review—levels 0 to 3. Of these, level 3 involved the patients in face-to-face discussion about their medicines and therefore offered the opportunity to explore the patient's views and experiences of using medicines and allowed them to share in the decision-making process about future prescribing—

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing the debate on this exceptionally important issue. One of my constituents has brought this problem up. One drawback seems to be that a lot of people in care homes have some sort of dementia, and therefore the face-to-face review is more difficult, and I get the feeling that because it is more difficult it is not being done.

Mr. Burstow: I fear that that is a problem. All too often, repeat prescriptions are ordered by care staff and inappropriate historic prescriptions continue without being properly checked and vetted. That is why the process really has to engage with the patient and, if necessary, carers and other family members who have authority to take informed decisions and give consent.

The lack of a specific requirement for level 3-type reviews in the NSF and the quality and outcomes framework has reinforced the view in PCTs and among practitioners that patient-centred reviews are "nice to have" but not a "must have".

Part 1 of the evaluation was conducted in January 2004 and published in March 2005, which really does prompt the question, why did it take so long to publish the findings? While I am asking about part 1 of the evaluation of "Room for Review", I hope that the Minister can clear up a mystery surrounding the publication of part 2, on the patient's view. I was told in July that part 2 would be published over the summer. It was not, so I asked another question about when it would be published and I was told this time that due to ethics clearance requirements it would not be published until the end of 2006. Then I got the news, thanks to Mr. Speaker, that I had secured tonight's debate, and the following day my office took a call from the Department, telling me that part 2 would be published on 5 December. So Christmas has come early, and that is good news. But what is going on?

Certainly, part 2 paints a mixed picture of patient experience of medication reviews. Part 1 talks about face-to-face reviews being the gold standard, yet the evidence from part 2 suggests that there is quite a long way to go before the potential of that gold standard is realised. Many of the comments from patients suggest that they had been given the impression—I emphasise, given the impression, and that is how they saw it—that the purpose of the review was cost cutting. One woman is quoted in the evaluation as saying that the reason she was given for being called for a medication review was that the PCT wanted to change her tablets

"not for my benefit, but to bring me into line with the PCT."

A man echoed that when he recounted a conversation that he had had with a doctor drawing the review. The doctor told him that "capsules are dearer so they've got to give you the cheapest medication they've got."

The concern that medication reviews are essentially about reducing NHS expenditure and saving money is a strong theme running through the second part of the evaluation from the patient's perspective, and it clearly is a problem in terms of how we make these reviews something that people feel comfortable with and see the value of from their own point of view.

Another concern that emerges concentrates on who conducts these reviews, and it touches on the intervention by the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone). When it came to GP-led reviews, while most people felt comfortable that their concerns were being addressed, points were made as to whether the GP had sufficient knowledge compared with colleagues in secondary care, which really did fuel a suspicion that the reviews were just being done to save money.

Another set of concerns arose about pharmacists who were leading reviews. The main issue was about the fact that pharmacists did not have access to the medical records or knowledge of the individual medical situation, but above all there was a real concern, and a question mark, over whether the pharmacist could get medication changed; if they could not, delays were occurring while people waited for their practice to change their medicines.

With the new pharmacist contract opening up the possibility of a greater role for pharmacists in medicine management, there is a need for clarity. As the medicines partnership points out in its report, the medicine reviews used by pharmacists are not the same as medication reviews. In the executive briefing published yesterday, the medicines partnership said:

"As with the NSF milestone, there was no published definition of what sort of medication review would qualify for QOF purposes. There is potential for overlap between the different medicines review services and some confusion as to which sorts of reviews 'count' towards which targets. This suggests a need to refocus attention from quantity to quality. PCTs need to consider how the various types of medicines review can help them deliver their objectives and priorities, making sure that reviews deliver maximum benefit to patients and that people with the greatest need and greatest potential to benefit have their medicines reviewed.

We consider that it is important for PCTs, GPs, nurses and pharmacists to have a clear picture of how the various forms of review fit together and how they can be used to meet local priorities and support care for people with long term conditions."

To summarise in two words, confusion reigns. That confusion has caused a failure to join the dots between the rise in the prescribing of anti-psychotic drugs, the rise in adverse drug reaction to anti-psychotic drugs and the worrying 35 per cent. increase in the number of non-fatal ADRs among the over-75s and the alarming 83 per cent. increase in fatal ADRs among the over-75s.

A recent report in the British Medical Journal found that significantly older people were admitted most because of ADRs. The cost to admissions authorities is huge, and the consequences for the individual go without saying. The study concluded that the NSF needs to be implemented. Yes, the NSF medicines standards should be implemented. That would be a step in the right direction. Medication reviews would help to safeguard the health and welfare of older people.

To conclude, I have some questions. First, will the Minister confirm that the NSF standard for annual and six-monthly reviews is still the standard that the NHS should be measured against? Secondly, when will the NSF standard be achieved, and how will we know? Thirdly, does he agree that we need to look into the national minimum standards for medicines management in care homes for older people to ensure that medication reviews are triggered in accordance with the NSF standards and that the timing of medication is made clear to managers and staff? Fourthly, will he act now to clear up the confusion identified by the evaluation of the medicines partnership and ensure that clear guidance is issued to the NHS, so that everyone is clear what is expected?

I agree with the medicines partnership that there is a need to focus on quality—that is absolutely right—but that is not sufficient if the NHS is to meet the needs of millions of older people in this country, whose quality of life is impaired because they are not getting the right medication, at the right time and in the right place. I hope that the Minister has something helpful and positive to say.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): I congratulate the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) on securing this debate. He has indeed taken a long interest in the subject.

Medicines are by far the most common form of medical treatment in the UK. People with long-term conditions, many of whom are older, are reliant on those medicines to stay healthy. In fact, 80 per cent. of people over the age of 75 take at least one prescribed medicine and 36 per cent. of them—just over a third—take four or more medicines each day. With that level of medicine prescribing comes the challenge of ensuring that people with long-term conditions, including those who are older, get the maximum possible benefit from that medicine, and the hon. Gentleman made that argument rather eloquently.

Half of all people—not just older people—on regular treatment do not take their medicines as intended for a number of reasons. Problems with medicines may be the cause of as many as 10 to 15 per cent. of hospital admissions. So people need simple information and advice if they are going to get the best benefit from their medicines. They need to know what their medicines are for, how they work and how they need to take them. However, people also have their own health beliefs, which can affect the way they take their medicines. That is why, as the hon. Gentleman said, involving people in decisions about how medication is taken is an important way in which we can help to ensure that they take medicines effectively. That explains why medication review is important. It is good that the hon. Gentleman has secured such a debate on the Floor of the House because the matter sometimes does not get the airtime that it deserves.

A medication review occurs when a health professional reviews a patient's medicines. The health professional ensures that all medicines that would be of benefit are prescribed and that the various treatments work well together and do not cause problems. That might be done if a GP prescribes someone with repeat medicines, but there is also a place for more in-depth reviews in which a health professional sits down with a patient and discusses his or her medicines in detail. That might occur if someone is on an especially complex regime, or if a patient is experiencing problems. Such reviews are important, not least because they allow patients to ask questions about their medicines and to be more involved in any decisions that are taken.

Given the importance of medicines to many people and the importance of medicine reviews, when we published the national service framework for older people in 2000, we produced a booklet that focused on the specific issue of medicines and older people. As the hon. Gentleman knows, that drew together the available evidence and made recommendations on how to improve older people's medicine taking.

Within that, we set a specific milestone on medication reviews. We recognised that the more medicines people take, the more likely they are to experience difficulties, so the scheme had two elements. First, by 2002, all people aged 75 and over were expected to have medicine reviews at least annually, and, secondly, those taking four or more medicines were to be reviewed at least every six months. Although it was largely for the NHS, working with other stakeholders locally, to implement the NSF on older people, we have nationally supported the improvement of medicine-taking in several ways. Before the publication of the NSF, medication reviews were not systematically undertaken or recorded.

Let me outline several of the measures that we have taken to support the policy. We have supported several primary care trusts to identify what works best and to share that learning with others through the national medicines management collaborative. About half of PCTs have participated in that programme to implement local medicine management schemes so that people get more help in using their medicines from not only their GPs, but pharmacists and others.

One of the measures used for assessing improvement was the proportion of people aged over 65 who were on four or more regular medicines and had received a documented medication review in the previous 12 months. There was a significant increase in activity and, in some cases, the reported rate of reviews more than doubled.

Another measure was the percentage of patients in care homes who had had a documented review of their medicines in the previous year. I am aware that some people believe that people in care homes do not have their medicines reviewed regularly, or sufficiently regularly, but the data from the collaborative work showed that the situation was slightly different. The increase in activity for patients in care homes was similar to that for those living at home, although the two groups had slightly different starting positions. The extent of patient involvement in medication reviews was measured for PCTs in wave 4 of the programme. It increased from 22 per cent. to 62 per cent. in a single year.

After drawing on this learning, guidance on medication reviews was widely disseminated through "Room for Review: A guide to medication review", which was published by the medicines partnership in conjunction with the national medicines management collaborative in 2002. The document set out a framework on how medication reviews should work, together with supporting tools and advice for managers and health care professionals.

Two years later, the medicines partnership commissioned an evaluation of the impact of "Room for Review", first to determine the extent to which the guidance had been adopted by PCTs and, secondly, to assess the experience and opinions of a sample of patients who had had a medication review. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the original plan was to publish both parts of the evaluation together. However, there were unexpected delays in publishing the part involving patients because of the two practical issues—the need to obtain ethics committee approval and the need to identify a suitable sample of patients through GPs. The medicines partnership did not wish to withhold the findings, so it went ahead and disseminated the survey of PCTs in March 2005. Part 2 was published yesterday.

I am glad that I have helped to ensure that Christmas has come early for the hon. Gentleman. From the survey of PCTs undertaken in 2004, we know that the majority of PCTs had a written strategy and that more than 60 per cent. of them had agreed local guidelines. About 45 per cent. of the PCTs that responded to that survey indicated that they were achieving or likely to achieve the older people's NSF target. Just 30 per cent. of PCTs said they were unlikely to achieve the target. If the survey were carried out now the figures would be very different, and I shall come on to the results of the GP quality and outcomes framework data later. The relationship between the national service framework and the quality and outcomes framework is important. The NSF indicator is still very much in force, but the way in which it has been implemented through the QOF target has become slightly more flexible to make sure that there is local managerial flexibility for doctors who implement it.

Mr. Burstow: That is one of my main concerns, and a key issue in the executive summary of both parts of the evaluation. At the heart of the problem is the fact that a clear working definition of a medication review was not in place when the QOF and the NSF were set. Without such a definition, it is difficult to know what one is measuring and thus be confident that progress is under way.

Mr. Byrne: May I write to the hon. Gentleman on that point, as it merits more consideration than I can provide this evening?

I have talked about the efforts to support PCTs in establishing medicine reviews. We have also ensured that through the new general medical services contract steps are in place to encourage medication reviews. Across the country, about 90 per cent. of GP practices reported that at least 80 per cent. of their patients who were prescribed four or more repeat medicines had had a medication review in the preceding 15 months recorded in their notes. Over four fifths of GP practices reported that at least 80 per cent. of their patients who were prescribed repeat medicines had had a medication review in the preceding 15 months, which is an achievement.

Alongside the role of PCTs and GPs, we should consider the role of local pharmacists. We have gone to some lengths to underpin the important contribution that pharmacists make through the new community pharmacy contract. In the first six months, pharmacy owners have focused on the delivery of essential services. Even so, by the end of October, more than 20,000 people had had the benefit of a face-to-face consultation with their pharmacist to discuss their medicines and resolve problems. It was clear from the national consultation that we undertook as we developed the health White Paper that the role of community pharmacists was considered important by local communities. We will reflect on that in the White Paper to be published at the turn of the year.

Mr. Burstow: Will the Minister ensure that further consideration is given to the need to make sure that, with patients' permission, pharmacists have access to patient records so that they can take their history into account when they look at medicines that are being prescribed?

Mr. Byrne: That may, or may not, appear in the White Paper—time will tell.

From the medicines partnership evaluation that was published yesterday we know that patients welcome medication reviews. To gain the full benefit, they say that they need to be better prepared for the review. We must ensure that there is shared understanding of the purpose of the review to create an environment in which patients are empowered to ask questions about their medicines. We have taken that on board by supporting the medicines partnership in producing a guide to medicine use reviews, which patients can use to prepare and identify the questions that they want to ask before they consult their pharmacist. Copies will be available by the end of the month.

We have also commissioned NICE, the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence, to develop a clinical guideline that sets out best practice in involving patients in decisions about prescribed medicines.

The hon. Gentleman highlighted the role of the Commission for Social Care Inspection in ensuring that medication reviews were carried out in care homes in accordance with statutory regulations and national minimum standards. Where inspections are uncovering instances of inappropriate or over-prescribing of medicines, enforcement action is being taken. I am aware that in the past the hon. Gentleman raised the specific issue of the inappropriate or over-prescribing of anti-psychotic medicines. These medicines have an important role to play in the management of a range of conditions and they have a good safety record, but it is vital that they are used with care and in appropriate clinical situations. The role of non-pharmacological therapies is considered where that is an appropriate course of action.

CSCI inspectors routinely check records to ensure that medicines are properly controlled and correctly administered. Where the CSCI finds evidence of over-prescribing or inappropriate administration of medicines, such evidence is reported to the police and the professional bodies of those involved in such activities. The CSCI also employs pharmacist inspectors who can be called on for advice.

Furthermore, I understand that a report that focuses specifically on the management and administration of medication in care homes and in children's homes is expected to be published by the CSCI early in the new year. That report will be important because it will help to identify in much greater detail how care homes are performing against medication national minimum standards. It will also incorporate an analysis of complaints about medicines that the commission has received from care homes. I know that that will be of great interest to the hon. Gentleman.

In summary, the milestone in the national service framework for older people raised the profile of the importance of effective medicine-taking, and in particular the benefit of regular medication review. Significant action has been taken by primary care trusts and others to put in place the infrastructure to deliver those medication reviews. From the first year of the new general medical services contract, we can see and celebrate the progress that has been made, with the vast majority of people taking regular medicines.

Mr. Burstow: The Minister has been generous with his time. Will he undertake to consider the requests that I made at the end of my remarks, particularly the issue of the clarity of medication reviews, which was identified by the medicines partnership in the report that has been available only since yesterday?

Mr. Byrne: I shall look into that. There are different types of medication review, and it is for the clinician to determine which is the most appropriate for an individual patient. Sometimes that will involve a face-to-face consultation, but that will not necessarily be the right solution for many patients. I will happily come back to the hon. Gentleman with more detail on that.

We have seen a great deal of progress since the advent of the older people's national service framework. It is part of a broad package of improved care for older people that we have seen unfold over the past seven years. That is a reform programme that we intend to continue.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Africa

1. Christine Russell (City of Chester) (Lab): What steps his Department is taking to promote economic growth in Africa. [34883]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): It is good to see so many Members in their place in anticipation of International Development questions, is it not?

Economic growth is fundamental to reducing poverty in Africa. The continent needs more private sector investment, better roads to link producers to markets and fairer global trade. At Gleneagles, the G8 agreed a comprehensive plan to support Africa's economic development. As part of this, the UK has recently announced £17 million for the African Union-New Partnership for Africa's Development investment climate facility, and a trebling of UK "aid for trade" to £100 million a year by 2010 to help poor countries boost exports.

Christine Russell: I thank the Secretary of State for that very positive reply, but does he agree that one of the best ways to promote economic development in Africa is to unlock the continent's vast agricultural potential? Will he therefore assure the House that at next week's World Trade Organisation ministerial talks in Hong Kong, he will lead the way in lobbying for the removal of, or a reduction in, the unfair trade barriers that deny African farmers access to world markets?

Hilary Benn: I agree with my hon. Friend. Some 70 per cent. of people in Africa work in agriculture and if their lives are to improve, they need to have a better chance of exporting their products to the rest of the world. She can rest assured that the Government will go on doing what they have been doing: pressing for changes that will unlock that potential, so that Africa can have a better future.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): The Commission for Africa stated that developed countries must complete

"the current Doha Round of world trade talks in a way which does not demand reciprocal concessions from poor African nations."

So what are Ministers expecting African countries to do at the WTO talks to ensure a deal on unfair trade barriers? What pressure is the Secretary of State putting on Peter Mandelson and what does he expect from African countries at the talks in Hong Kong?

Hilary Benn: It is more a question of what African countries are expecting from the Hong Kong talks. They are looking for recognition of the need to improve access to their agricultural markets and of their different starting point. They are looking for special and differential treatment, and those are the proposals that they have tabled. They are also looking for a special safeguard mechanism that will enable them to protect themselves against surges in imports. In the end, their contribution is to look at a deal and to decide whether it will be in their interests. The truth is that we have a long way to go if we are to achieve the outcome next week that all Members want; but that does not mean that we should stop trying, and we will not.

Roger Berry (Kingswood) (Lab): Given the Government's opposition to forced liberalisation in African countries, as in other developing countries, what is my right hon. Friend's attitude to International Monetary Fund conditionality, which seeks to impose precisely that in many African countries—for example, Ghana?

Hilary Benn: The Government's position on conditionality was clearly set out in the policy document that we published earlier this year. I have been working to get the World Bank and the IMF to review the use that they make of conditionality. In the end, it is about enabling developing countries to take their own decisions, but all Governments have responsibilities in deciding how they are going to spend their money, such as managing their economies effectively and keeping inflation low, because high inflation impacts on poor people in particular.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): The Secretary of State was entirely right to identify Conservative Members' intense interest in International Development questions today. As the Prime Minister made clear in his recent Guildhall speech, the engine of economic growth in Africa and elsewhere is free and fair trade. Does the Secretary of State accept that the WTO meeting in Hong Kong next week, which both he and I hope to attend, is in danger of being derailed by the European Union's subtle yet blatantly protectionist negotiating position, particularly on agriculture?

Hilary Benn: May I say to the hon. Gentleman that I am very glad to see him still in his place this morning? I share his aspirations for the outcome of the world trade talks and his frustration at their current state. The EU has tabled one offer and then a second, but in order to unlock these negotiations there needs to be movement on all sides. The question is: can we, in the short time remaining, enable that movement? The effort currently being put into those major negotiating issues means that the issues that the poorest developing countries are concerned about, to which I referred a moment ago, are not getting a look in. There is one exception: the agreement on trade-related aspects of intellectual property rights, which I welcome greatly.

Mr. Mitchell: None the less, the position that the Secretary of State sets out is a serious and depressing one for the talks next week. Will he press the European Union negotiators, even at this late stage, to put on the table a meaningful real-terms cut in trade barriers, rather than the current phoney offer, which cuts tariff headrooms but not the actual tariff levels? Do not those tariffs prevent some of the poorest countries on earth from starting to trade their way out of poverty?

Hilary Benn: They certainly do prevent the poorest countries on earth from doing that. The fundamental problem, as the hon. Gentleman is only too well aware, is that there are 25 member states of the European Union and not all of them share the perspective that he and I share. That is part of the problem, and it would help the EU to move if there was some movement by others in those negotiations. At the moment, however, we are stuck, because everybody is waiting for somebody else to move.

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will know that economic development also depends on secure and sustainable public access to water. Across Africa, there have been huge and growing protests against water privatisation, which has priced the poor out of access to water resources. He will also know that there has been a growing counter-movement to develop public-public partnerships in water management provision. Can he tell the House what involvement the UK Government have had in those public-public water resource management projects?

Hilary Benn: I share my hon. Friend's concern about the need to ensure that more people get access to clean water, not least because it will improve children's health and enable more girls to go to school. Some 95 per cent. of our bilateral spending on water goes to support public provision, community-led provision or humanitarian provision of clean water supply, and that demonstrates where the Government's priorities lie.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD) rose—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps I may point out to the hon. Member for Na h-Eileanan an Iar (Mr. MacNeil) that it is not the done thing to stand in front of a Member who is addressing the House.

Andrew George: Although I exonerate the Secretary of State from my criticism, how can the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer trumpet the so-called success of the Gleneagles agreement and claim historic debt write-off when, this year, African countries will pay back a great deal more in debt repayments than the UK will provide in monetary aid?

Hilary Benn: The Government are right to take pride in what we have been able to achieve, with the support of others, in obtaining support for a multilateral debt cancellation deal, because it will mean, for between 18 and 38 developing countries—14 of the initial countries are in Africa—that up to $55 billion worth of debt is cancelled for ever. That was not the case when 2005 started. However, the process of debt relief and cancellation is a continuing one. At the beginning of the year, few people thought that it would be possible to get a deal on that scale and it is a result, in particular, of the efforts of my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to which I pay tribute. When that deal comes into effect, African countries will have to spend less of their precious resources on servicing debt that is not sustainable.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): In the spirit of congratulating the Government when they deserve to be congratulated, will the Secretary of State accept that some Opposition Members think that the Government have taken a positive initiative towards improving the lot of those countries in Africa and the developing world? But does he recall the Bill that I introduced earlier this year to deal with corruption in Africa? He mentioned conditionality, so will he impose a condition of external audit, if the countries concerned are not prepared to agree voluntarily, to eliminate corruption?

Hilary Benn: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his kind words and I know that he takes a real interest in these questions. Tackling corruption and promoting good governance are absolutely fundamental to economic growth, which is the subject of the original question, especially in Africa. Many of the poorest countries, are those in which there has been corruption and a failure of governance. We have to try to achieve a position in which countries audit their own spending, so that they can be accountable to their own people. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I take seriously the responsibility that we have to ensure that the funds we use are audited and tracked properly, so that we can account to the House for the way in which that funding has been used. I look forward to continuing the discussion that we have already started on that subject, because it is a very important issue.

International AIDS Day

2. Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the Government's plans to mark international AIDS Day. [34884]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): On world AIDS day the UK highlighted the importance of more and better funding for the fight against AIDS, and of working towards universal access to AIDS treatment by 2010. As EU President, the UK hosted a meeting that launched an EU statement on HIV prevention for an AIDS-free generation. The Government also published a briefing paper on "Harm reduction—tackling drug use and HIV in the developing world".

Ian Lucas: May I raise a particular issue affecting young children in the developing world who suffer from AIDS? At present, drug companies do not manufacture dedicated drugs for young children and as a result there is some over and under-prescribing of drugs. Will my right hon. Friend use his good offices to raise the matter with drug companies so that young children suffering from that terrible disease receive the appropriate treatment?

Hilary Benn: I have seen the report from Médecins sans Frontières to which my hon. Friend draws attention. I share his concern and happily undertake to take up the issue, because it is important that we use all the means at our disposal to fight that terrible disease, which presents a real threat to the future development of Africa.

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): Could the Secretary of State tell us about co-operation between his Department and non-governmental organisations such as Tearfund and Christian Aid in tackling the AIDS problem in the continent of Africa?

Hilary Benn: We work with a wide range of voluntary and community organisations in the development field and I pay tribute to them for the work they undertake in helping communities to overcome stigma and, in particular, in providing support to orphans and vulnerable children. In the developing world, 13 million children have lost one or both of their parents to AIDS. The work done in local communities makes the biggest difference; if the disease is to be beaten, treatment is hugely important for those who are already HIV-positive. The only way to achieve an AIDS-free generation is if people do not acquire the HIV virus in the first place. That is why being open and honest about the virus—how people catch it and how they can protect themselves and fight it—is fundamental to winning the battle. The work of the organisations to which the hon. Gentleman referred is hugely important in supporting communities to have the confidence to be open and honest about how to defeat the disease, and I applaud them for the work they are doing.

Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford) (Lab): May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the Select Committee report on that very subject, published last week? Will he support one of our recommendations and agree that, as in many countries, if people need drugs, they also need the money to pay for them, that will make universal access to treatment impossible? Will he work with UNAIDS and the World Health Organisation to issue an international policy statement on free access to treatment for AIDS at the point of delivery?

Hilary Benn: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend's point about the importance of ensuring that people can gain access to the drugs that will save their lives. It is no good if people cannot afford them because the price is too high. That is why much of the £1.5 billion that we are committing to the fight against AIDS over the next three years—which, as my hon. Friend knows, makes Britain the second-largest donor in the world in the fight against AIDS—is going to support building the capacity of developing countries to improve their health services and make those drugs available to people. That is the only way we shall save people's lives.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that the Committee welcomed the role of his Department in securing the 2010 target but expressed some concern at the need for annual monitoring to ensure that the target is reached? Will he consider incorporating targets on access to HIV/AIDS treatment in the next spending round? Will he report on cross-Whitehall co-operation and explain what review of programmes his Department is undertaking in the light of the AIDS crisis? It affects countries such as Botswana, where his Department has little aid engagement at present, threatening their very survival.

Hilary Benn: On the hon. Gentleman's last point, Botswana is of course a middle-income country whose economy has been growing fast and well. In the end, the Department and I have taken the view that it is important to prioritise our efforts where we think we can make the most difference. There is a lively and real debate about targets as we move towards "all by 10". The first thing we need is for individual countries to set their own targets, because a global target to measure progress as we go may not capture the ability of countries to build up capacity as quickly as we would like. Secondly, the global steering committee is looking at that question and, in particular, at which milestones we should use to measure the progress we make between now and 2010 in achieving access for all. The committee will report in the middle of next year and we shall look carefully at its recommendations.

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): I have recently returned from a Commonwealth Parliamentary Association delegation to Swaziland. While out in Swaziland, we were informed by non-governmental organisations and Government officers that the AIDS rate there could be as high as 43 per cent.—almost one in two of the population and the highest rate in the world. Will my right hon. Friend consider given extra ring-fenced funding to Swaziland to help it combat that AIDS rate?

Hilary Benn: I can tell my hon. Friend that we are, through a regional project, funding work to support the fight against AIDS in Swaziland. The Government there also have a responsibility to ensure that they use their resources effectively to put money into the fight against AIDS, which is affecting the population there to the extent that he describes.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chamber is far too noisy.

Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): The AIDS pandemic is causing devastation in developing nations and now not only in Africa. It is crippling economies, devastating key-worker sectors and threatening security and stability. This year alone, it is estimated that 4.9 million people contracted the virus and only 1 million are receiving treatment out of a total infected global population of more than 40 million. It is disastrous that the three-by-five initiative appears to have failed and that the G8 aspirations for HIV/AIDS appear to be adrift. What is DFID's strategy to ensure that developing-nation Governments recognise and prioritise prevention and treatment and that the pharmaceutical industry allows the manufacture of cheaper, generic antiretroviral drugs?

Hilary Benn: I share the hon. Gentleman's concern, and the statistics that he describes paint a very depressing picture. However, the three-by-five target has been a good thing because, at the end of June, 500,000 people were on antiretrovirals in sub-Saharan Africa—treble the number of 12 months earlier. Is that progress? Yes, it is. Is it enough? No, it is not. Having a target encourages people to get themselves organised, which is why we fought so hard for the new target.

On prevention, the policy statement that we achieved for the first time in the EU makes the argument that is it only by prevention that we will defeat this disease. Openness and honesty is the key. On access to drugs, the agreement that has been reached to extend the period in which countries have to apply the TRIPS agreement—the least developed countries did not have to do so anyway until 2015–16—gives those countries the opportunity, if they have not got manufacturing capacity, to import from elsewhere, and we have to work with them to enable them to use that new freedom to get the drugs to those who need it.

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend has just referred to the agreement on the amendment to the TRIPS rules. That agreement is very welcome—I pay tribute to him for his role in bringing it about—but he will also know that the previous agreements have not led to a single case of the rules allowing antiretroviral drugs to be brought to those who need them. Will he take steps to ensure that the new amendment brings affordable HIV/AIDS medicines to those who need them in the poor countries of the world?

Hilary Benn: The reason why the agreement has not yet delivered the benefits that we would like is that legislative changes were needed both in developing countries and in the EU—the EU has now put them in place—but we have been providing technical assistance to help countries to take advantage of that new freedom. We must now step up the international effort, because those poor countries that cannot manufacture those drugs now have the opportunity to import them, and it is important that that freedom is used.

Overseas Development

3. Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): What percentage of his budget for overseas development will be given to Commonwealth countries in 2005–06. [34885]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): Last year, 46.5 per cent. of DFID's total bilateral funding was allocated to Commonwealth countries. We expect spending in the current financial year to be at about the same level.

Daniel Kawczynski: I should like to thank the Minister for that reply, but I am a little concerned that I think I heard him say that the figure is only 47 per cent. for Commonwealth countries. He will know that many Commonwealth countries are very poor. Should we not be prioritising helping our Commonwealth brethren, rather than Francophone countries that receive money from France?

Mr. Thomas: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman recognises that we have a rising aid budget thanks to the decisions that the Labour party has taken, which is in stark contrast to the record of the Conservative party when it was in government. A little more credit for what we have been able to achieve in helping Commonwealth countries to tackle poverty might be appropriate. Let me cite just one example of the continuing support that we give. There was a recent announcement of some £50 million for Bangladesh over five years to help 10 million poor people in rural areas to get access to electricity for the first time.

Mr. Piara S. Khabra (Ealing, Southall) (Lab): Will the Minister tell the House what sort of development aid is being given to India? Can he give us some figures on that?

Mr. Thomas: As I am sure that my hon. Friend knows, we have an increasing aid programme for India. One of the specific sources of funding that we provide is to help it to try to achieve its target of getting all Indian children a primary school place by 2010. We have provided some £210 million for that purpose, and in the past two years, the number of out-of-school children in India has fallen from 25 million to 13.5 million. Clearly there is a lot more to do, but that is a sign of positive progress as a result of the money that we have provided.

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): When Zimbabwe was suspended from the Commonwealth, were our aid programmes also suspended? What hope can the Government give to people experiencing severe poverty in that country—both black and white?

Mr. Thomas: The hon. Gentleman might know that our aid programmes to Zimbabwe before the country was suspended from the Commonwealth did not go through the Government of Zimbabwe anyway. We continue to provide funding to the people of Zimbabwe through UN organisations and NGOs with which we have close links and in which we can be confident that they genuinely deliver aid to the people who need it most.

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend give us an update on the amount of aid that is being given for the relief of earthquake victims in Kashmir?

Mr. Thomas: My hon. Friend might be aware that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State recently announced an extra £25 million for the immediate relief effort to help earthquake victims in Pakistan to survive the difficult winter period. That brings our total aid for the immediate period to some £58 million. Two weeks ago, we pledged £70 million to help to address the long-term reconstruction needs in earthquake-affected areas.

Trade Policies

4. Anne Main (St. Albans) (Con): What recent assessment he has made of the effects of protectionist trade policies on poor countries; and if he will make a statement. [34886]

5. Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): What assessment his Department has made of the implications for developing countries of President Bush's recent comments on reducing global tariffs; and if he will make a statement. [34887]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): We welcome moves to reduce tariffs, subsidies and other barriers to the free flow of goods and services. The UK has made assessments based on research by the World Bank, United Nations organisations and the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development that suggest that substantial gains for developing countries could result from the liberalisation of agricultural and industrial trade. The actual gains will depend, of course, on the level of reform and the policies that developing countries themselves put in place to take advantage of a more open trade system. Assistance to help the poorest countries to do this will be important, and the UK Government are committed to trebling trade with them and increasing support to £100 million a year by 2010.

Anne Main: The Secretary of State talks about a logjam in Europe. Instead of dealing with generalities, would he like to be specific: which countries are causing the logjam?

Hilary Benn: The hon. Lady is well aware that agriculture support is a big issue in France, is she not? I made the point earlier that there are 25 member states in Europe that have different views. In the end, there must be agreement in Europe so that progress can be made.

Mr. Vaizey: The Secretary of State said earlier that someone has to move in the world trade talks. Is it not the case that the United States has moved and that President Bush has said that he is ready to eliminate all tariffs? Is that not an offer that the European Union and Britain cannot refuse?

Hilary Benn: I welcome the offers that are on the table, but the question is how we unlock the logjam that we have got into. As far as Europe is concerned, some movement on the part of the G20 might allow progress to be made when we actually get to Hong Kong, but there is precious little time in which that can happen.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): My right hon. Friend is aware that moving trade barriers can have a real effect on the poorest countries, such as those in the Caribbean which have been dependent on protection for sugar cane. Will he ensure that there will be help and support for those Caribbean countries that have benefited from trade protection?

Hilary Benn: I share my hon. Friend's concern about the problems that sugar producers in the Caribbean face. What is currently on offer is €40 million of support from Europe. The British Government's view is clear: that is insufficient. We will continue to press for more support to help those countries to adjust to changes that have to take place.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): To take the example of one industry, in textiles and clothing the combination of low quotas and high tariffs means that north America and the EU cost 27 million jobs and $50 billion-worth of exports, which is not helping to alleviate poverty. Is not it true that we are helping to stitch up those poorer countries?

Hilary Benn: My hon. Friend makes a powerful case for why the current trade rules need to change so that developing countries can use their skills and expertise to bring a better life to their people.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [34898] Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 7 December.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Mr. O'Brien: Does the outgoing Prime Minister—[Interruption.] Does he agree with the chairman of the Cheshire police authority, Labour Councillor Peter Nurse, when he says in his recent letter to the Home Secretary:

"Restructuring policing with such haste and without considering the long term implications is dangerous and not in the interests of the people of Cheshire"?

The Prime Minister: That is precisely why we must consult fully on it, which we will, and ensure that we get the right proposals for policing in the hon. Gentleman's area and others. However, I point out that he has record numbers of police in Cheshire, just as he has record numbers of people across the entirety of the public services. On every score—health, education and crime—things are better today than they were in 1997.

Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend tell me how he will deal with a young, handsome, intelligent, charismatic politician, such as myself—[Laughter.]—and how Parliament can better engage ordinary people in the political process?

The Prime Minister: I have always thought that my hon. Friend was a model to follow, although I have never quite managed it myself.

The best way to make progress is to continue with the strong economic growth and the investment in our public services that we have seen across the whole of the public services. Every single indicator has improved since 1997.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): The first issue that the Prime Minister and I are going to have to work together on is getting the good bits of his education reforms through the House of Commons and into law. [Interruption.] That is the problem with these exchanges—the Labour Chief Whip shouting like a child. [Interruption.] Is the right hon. Lady finished?

The Prime Minister and I both agree that schools with greater freedom produce the best results. Will he confirm that all of the freedoms for schools in the White Paper will survive into the Bill?

The Prime Minister: Yes. It is important that we give schools the freedoms that they need. I am delighted to hear that the hon. Gentleman supports these reforms. I assume, therefore, that the Conservative party will be voting for them.

Mr. Cameron: Absolutely. [Interruption.] With our support—[Interruption.] With our support, the Prime Minister knows that there is no danger of losing these education reforms in a parliamentary vote. So he can afford to be as bold as he wants to be. That is when he is at his best—or so I am told. Can we agree that that means trust schools owning their own buildings and land, employing their own staff, setting pay locally, developing their own culture and ethos and controlling their own admissions?

The Prime Minister: Of course it means all those powers that currently are available to foundation and voluntary aided schools being extended to other schools as well. That is the purpose of the proposals. Incidentally, before I answered any questions, I should have welcomed the hon. Gentleman to his new position and congratulated him on winning the Conservative leadership election. But can I tell him where I feel that we may—and I am sorry to say this—have a disagreement? As I understand it, his position is that all schools should be free to set their own admissions procedures. I am afraid that I believe that the present admissions code should remain in place. So perhaps we can clear that up, too.

Mr. Cameron: I want schools to control their own admissions. That is what is in the White Paper, and let us see that it turns into the Bill. [Interruption.] It is only our first exchange, and already the Prime Minister is asking me the questions. This approach is stuck in the past, and I want to talk about the future. He was the future once. Education is one of the public services in desperate need of reform, so does he agree with me that our aim should be to ensure that all schools have these freedoms? Will he ensure that this is one reform where he will not look back and wish that he had gone further?

The Prime Minister: I certainly can say, as I have said before, that it is important that all schools get these freedoms. However, it is obvious that we disagree on the issue of admissions. I think that if schools are free to bring back selection at the age of 11, that would be regressive for our country. So I am afraid that in this grand new consensus we have to disagree on that point.

The other point, which is very important, is this: we also have to keep the investment going into our schools. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the Conservative party voted against that investment, but as a result of the investment and the change, through specialist schools, city academies and the literacy and numeracy strategy, we now have the best ever results at 11, at 16, at 18 in our schools. Therefore, I have to say to him that it is not merely in respect of education policy that we have to agree. We have also to agree that the investment that is so necessary to back up that reform continues. I am afraid that his economic policy, which is to cut back investment, because of his desire—[Interruption.] I am happy if this is another policy that he is about to change. He is saying that this year he would not have put all the investment in but rather have shared that investment half and half between tax cuts and investment. That would mean substantial cuts in public investment. I am very happy to have this new consensus with the hon. Gentleman, and I am delighted that he has said today that the Conservative party will vote for these education reforms, but it has to be on the basis of agreeing the investment also.

Hon. Members: More.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): Would my right hon. Friend like to comment on the experience of Mr. Chuttun, a Tooting resident, who unfortunately was sick on Sunday and had to go to St. George's? He had an ECG, two types of blood tests, X-rays and various blood pressure tests, and was treated wonderfully by doctors and nurses. He said:

"This is the first time that I have used St. George's A and E. I was thoroughly impressed by the hospital and the conscientious staff."

Does my right hon. Friend not agree that if Opposition Members are serious—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the Prime Minister will be able to answer the hon. Gentleman's question.

The Prime Minister: The type of improvement that my hon. Friend is describing is one that is happening right across the national health service at the present time. It is extremely important that it continues. It is the result of investment and reform, which means that over the past eight years waiting lists have come down by almost 400,000. We have the lowest waiting lists that this country has had since records began.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Lochaber) (LD): The United States Secretary of State said yesterday that "extraordinary rendition" had been conducted in co-operation with European Governments. To what extent, therefore, have the Government co-operated in the transport of terrorist suspects to Afghanistan and elsewhere, apparently for torture purposes?

The Prime Minister: First, let me draw a very clear distinction indeed between the idea of suspects being taken from one country to another and any sense whatever that ourselves, the United States or anyone condones the use of torture. Torture cannot be justified in any set of circumstances at all. The practice of rendition as described by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has been American policy for many years. We have not had such a situation here, but that has been American policy for many, many years. However, it must be applied in accordance with international conventions, and I accept entirely Secretary of State Rice's assurance that it has been.

Mr. Kennedy: Given that assurance, can the Prime Minister therefore explain why the published evidence shows that almost 400 flights have passed through 18 British airports in the period of concern? When was he as Prime Minister first made aware of that policy, and when did he approve it?

The Prime Minister: In respect of airports, I do not know what the right hon. Gentleman is referring to. In respect of the policy of rendition, it has been the policy of the American Government for many years.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): Why?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman says, "Why?" It is as well to remember that we need to detain some of the people we are talking about for reasons of action against international terrorism. Some of those people are highly dangerous, and some of them can provide information that is of fundamental importance in preventing terrorism. Of course, there should be proper treatment of anyone who is detained, and I have already made it clear that, as far as I am aware, it is not an issue here. However, the American policy has been clear for ages. That is not a matter of contention, and I fully endorse what Secretary of State Rice said yesterday.

Rosemary McKenna (Cumbernauld, Kilsyth and Kirkintilloch, East) (Lab): In the week of additional moneys for local government and the Scottish Parliament, will my right hon. Friend join me in condemning East Dunbartonshire Liberal-controlled council, which this week cut 64 jobs, reduced services and increased charges?

The Prime Minister: That is very typical of the Liberal Democrats. It will not surprise my hon. Friend that whenever the Liberal Democrats get their hands on any power in local government there is a clear difference between what they say they will do and what they actually do.

Q2. [34899] Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): In 1998, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that productivity was the "fundamental yardstick of economic performance".

Does the Prime Minister agree that the collapse in Britain's productivity growth from 2.7 per cent. in 1997 to 0.5 per cent. today represents a fundamental failure by his Chancellor?

The Prime Minister: I do not accept the figure that the hon. Gentleman gave. Productivity in this country has been catching up with and even surpassing Japan and Germany. As the Chancellor of the Exchequer pointed out on Monday, the only year in which productivity fell was in a period of Conservative government.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): What plans do the Government have to increase the supply of affordable housing, especially family housing with gardens, in house-price hotspots in the north of England such as the City of York?

The Prime Minister: Both in my hon. Friend's constituency and elsewhere, the proposals introduced by my right hon. Friends the Chancellor and the Deputy Prime Minister for shared equity in homes are a major step forward that will allow many couples who want to get their feet on the first rung of the housing ladder, but who may not be able to afford the full 100 per cent. equity, to build up their equity stake over time. Together with the very considerable investment in social housing, that will make a difference in my hon. Friend's constituency and elsewhere.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): The Montreal climate change conference is taking place this week. We support the goal of a new Kyoto-style treaty that will tackle carbon emissions. Earlier this year the Prime Minister said that he had been changing his thinking on the issue. Can he set out his new thinking? In particular, is he still committed to a proper successor to Kyoto based on clear targets and including all the major carbon-producing countries of the world?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I most certainly am committed to that. The reason it is important that we change our thinking on the matter is that I do not believe that the successor to Kyoto can work unless it has not just the United States involved in such targets and such a framework, but India and China, because they are the major emerging economies of the world. In China, for example, one power station is being built every week or every two weeks. Therefore, unless we manage to get a comprehensive framework that also involves India and China, it will not be of much use to us. I entirely agree that the issue is immensely important. That is one of the reasons, of course, why we passed the climate change levy. I hope the hon. Gentleman's question indicates that he will support us on that, too.

Mr. Cameron: I am grateful for the Prime Minister's answer. His Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs said in advance of Montreal:

"Without mechanisms in the form of compulsory action, such as targets to cut emissions, existing and new technologies will never be rolled out on the scale we need".

and I agree with that. The Prime Minister said last month that people get "very nervous and very worried" about this approach, and that we need a "better, more sensitive set of mechanisms".

Will he confirm that he still genuinely agrees with what his Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs said?

The Prime Minister: I just said in answer to the previous question that it is important that we get binding targets. Emerging economies will want those to be sensitive to the needs of their economic growth, but one of the important issues that was not part of Kyoto but needs to be part of a new protocol is technology transfer. As we develop the research that allows us to have clean energy, we need to share that research and that technology with others. I am sorry—I was pointing my finger; I would not want that to break up the new consensus. It is important not merely that we say how much we care about climate change, but that we take the action necessary. Therefore, it will be no use the hon. Gentleman's saying that he supports the aim unless he also supports the climate change levy, the renewables obligation and the extra investment that we put into energy efficiency. If he is prepared to have a consensus on that basis, I welcome it.

Shona McIsaac (Cleethorpes) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend recall that in 1997 maternity pay in this country was a miserly £55 a week and new mums got only 14 weeks' paid maternity leave? I am sure the whole House will agree that the Government have done more for women and working families than any other Government. Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that he will not slow up in helping working families and working mothers?

The Prime Minister: I can assure my hon. Friend of that. It is one reason why it is important that we keep policies such as the families tax credit, which has helped so many families balance work and family life, and why we keep on with the investment in the wrap-round child care between the hours of 8 am and 6 pm that we will be developing over the next few years. That is important, not just to give women and, indeed, men within the family the ability to work and care for their family life. It is a vital part, as well, of increasing the number of people of working age at work, which is of fundamental importance to the pension reforms that we want to see. So my hon. Friend is right to stress the importance of that support, and we must continue it.

Q3. [34900] Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): Couple support programmes in Australia and America have cut divorce rates by half in some cities. Does the Prime Minister agree that health visitors, registrars and local authorities should co-operate fully with similar schemes in the UK, such as community family trusts?

The Prime Minister: First, I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving me prior notice of his question. I understand that the aim of community family trusts is to reduce family breakdown in the way that he describes, by strengthening and building confident, committed relationships within families. The trusts should be commended for their work. From April next year the new children, young people and families grant will provide support to organisations that support families, including adult couple relationship support. I understand that community family trusts have applied for funding from that grant, and decisions on successful bids will be made by March 2006. I commend the trusts for their work. Obviously, I cannot say what will happen in the bidding process, but money will be available from April next year for precisely the type of scheme that the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill) (Lab): In view of the Chancellor's clarification of the Government's support for the British film industry, does my right hon. Friend agree that this is a splendid opportunity for the industry to reciprocate by producing more and more movies, especially here in the United Kingdom?

The Prime Minister: I have been told by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor that the latest "Harry Potter" will be produced in Britain. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill (Mr. Clarke) has said, the Government are replacing the existing film tax relief with a new film tax credit, which will be available to support British films by increasing support for producers and helping large-budget films and small-budget films. I know that my right hon. Friend has campaigned for many years in support of the British film industry, which, I am pleased to say, is in a healthy state, and I hope that the support announced by the Chancellor on Monday will make it healthier still.

Q4. [34901] Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): Given that the Prime Minister told us last summer that the UK budget rebate was "non-negotiable", what is his current definition of "non-negotiable"?

The Prime Minister: I will tell the hon. Gentleman: a rebate that goes up—it is actually going to increase. The rebate will be paid in full on all common agricultural policy and on all expenditure in the original 15 member states. However, on new member states, whose economic development we support along with their membership, it is important that Britain pays its fair share. That is a principled position, and it is useless for Conservative Members to say that they support enlargement and helping those new countries if they then say that Britain should walk away from those countries. That is not responsible leadership, and I do not intend to engage in it.

Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): Does the Prime Minister love the country as it is now rather than the way it used to be? Who deserves the credit for the way things are now compared with how they used to be?

The Prime Minister: Well, in my view there have been many improvements in the past few years—the strength of the economy, investment in public services, the introduction of the minimum wage and the repeal of section 28. All those achievements have two things in common: first, this Labour Government introduced them; secondly, the Conservative party opposed each and every one of them.

Q5. [34902] Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): Like many market towns, Taunton suffers from chronic congestion, which harms the environment, business and local people's quality of life. What measures can the Government take to tackle that problem both in Taunton specifically and in hundreds of other towns across Britain?

The Prime Minister: First, I understand that Somerset county council, which is the local transport authority for Taunton, has received more than £20 million for local transport, which is an increase of more than 20 per cent. in the past few years, and has indicated that congestion in Taunton will be a priority. Towns have been given new powers under the Traffic Management Act 2004, which include the ability to co-ordinate utility and telecom companies' roadworks, parking enforcement, bus lanes and even some moving traffic offences. In the end, it is our job to provide the powers and the money, and it is the local authority's job to make the best use of them. I hope that that happens in Taunton, which, like many towns, faces a congestion problem, because the local authority has additional powers and resources.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend accept that in the war against the mass murderers whose hatred of humanity is no less than that of the Nazis it is necessary to win hearts and minds, particularly in the Arab world? In view of what the United States is alleged to be doing, does he really believe that having mini-Guantanamos across Europe helps to win hearts and minds in that war? It is essential that UK facilities are not used, if there is any possibility of the United States using torture.

The Prime Minister: I totally agree with my hon. Friend's last point. That is why I have drawn a very clear distinction on any suggestion that there can be any use of, or condoning the use of, torture. That is completely unacceptable on any basis. In respect of the allegations of so-called torture facilities or detention facilities across Europe, I have to say to my hon. Friend that I really know nothing about them at all—I only know that there are not any such here. If he reads the very clear statement by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday, I think that he will find that it is consistent with all that I have said.

As for Guantanamo Bay—I think there are now under half the numbers there that there were some time ago—I have made it clear throughout that that is an anomaly that should be brought to an end, and I think that it is important over the next period of time that it is.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): I intervene on the remarkable school reunion between Fettes and Eton to ask the Prime Minister this: are there any remaining differences of political principle—not details of policy, but political principle—between the Prime Minister and the new Leader of the Opposition, and if so, what are they?

The Prime Minister: There are many—for example, the new deal on unemployment. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman may not think that that is a principle; I think that helping the unemployed is a principle, as is the investment in public services, and the European social chapter. Let me tell the hon. Gentleman the difference that I have with him. He wants Scotland wrenched out of the United Kingdom; I believe that the future of Scotland lies within the United Kingdom. I have differences of principle with both hon. Gentlemen.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend recall saying that whenever he introduced a reform he always, with the benefit of hindsight, regretted not going any further? Is the proposed limited ban on cigarette smoking a case in point? Could I encourage my right hon. Friend to be a little bolder and at the very least ban cigarette smoking in restaurants and pubs that do serve food, not just those that do not? [Interruption.]

The Prime Minister: There will of course be a ban on the vast majority of smoking in any form of premises at all. There is an interesting debate going on as to whether we should go further. We have held to our manifesto commitment. However, I have no doubt that this discussion will continue.

Q6. [34903] Mr. Shailesh Vara (North-West Cambridgeshire) (Con): In a response that the Prime Minister gave earlier to a question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), he spoke of action. May I remind the Prime Minister of something that he said in April:

"We cannot let the evil of ethnic cleansing stand"?

May I remind him that more than 300,000 people have been butchered in Darfur? Will he kindly tell the House at what stage he intends to move from words to action?

The Prime Minister: We have already moved a long time ago from words to action. It is partly as a result of what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development did that the African Union has put together a peacekeeping force that is now 7,000 or 8,000-strong. We ourselves have put an immense amount of overseas aid into Sudan. We have been leading the way on ensuring that the proper talks take place in order to get a long-standing settlement. I think that the action that we have taken speaks volumes for the commitment of this country as well as the commitment of this Government. It obviously continues to be a deeply difficult situation, but the only proper way through is to build up the African Union force so that it can keep the combatants apart long enough for us to be able to get a peace deal negotiated.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will understand why New college in my constituency has been placed as one of the top schools and colleges in the country because of his visit earlier this year. [Laughter.] Is it not right that education is best when children get the best start in life? Will he come back to my constituency to visit the Sure Start programme to see how the £11.5 million that has been invested in that has been spent, and ensure that the investment in education under this Government not only continues but grows?

The Prime Minister: I had hoped that the judgments were somewhat more objective than that. My hon. Friend is right to say that, as a result of the investment and reform in constituencies such as hers, education has improved considerably. Sure Start has made a real difference to people's lives. I know that there are conflicting reports estimating the value of the scheme, but I believe from my own experience of visiting many Sure Start schemes round the country, including those in my constituency, that they have made an enormous difference not only to the children but to the parents. I have talked to many families who have gained skills and jobs for the first time through Sure Start. That is why I believe that it should continue.

Q7. [34904] Mrs. Theresa Villiers (Chipping Barnet) (Con): Crime and antisocial behaviour are undermining the quality of life of many of my constituents. In Barnet, we have fewer police officers per head than many other London boroughs that have far lower levels of crime. When are the Government going to give Barnet its fair share of police officers on the beat to tackle crime?

The Prime Minister: If the hon. Lady wanted to be fair, in this new spirit of debate, she would accept that we now have record numbers of police officers, including in Barnet, just as we have record levels of investment in education and health. We have been able to put this extra money in as a result of the strong economy, and because we have chosen to put investment before tax cuts we have managed to keep that investment going. If the hon. Lady supports our policies over the next few years, I am sure that, in Barnet and elsewhere, we will get the numbers of people we need, in terms of a visible uniformed presence on the streets, and the legislative measures that we need to make a real difference to crime in her area. If she is signalling that our investment and antisocial behaviour plans will be supported by those on the Conservative Back Benches, I am delighted at yet another outburst of consensus.

Parliamentary Constituencies (Equalisation)

12.31 pm

Mr. John Maples (Stratford-on-Avon) (Con): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to equalise of the size of parliamentary constituencies; and for connected purposes.

The catchy title was not my first choice; I wanted to call the Bill the rotten boroughs Bill, because that is what we have at the moment. Those of us who did our history before the national curriculum was introduced thought that this problem had been solved in 1832, but it has not. There are 230 small parliamentary seats in this country, in which the electorate is more than 5 per cent. below the national average. I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that several of them are in Scotland, and many are in Wales. Very few are controlled by the Conservatives, although that is of course irrelevant to the purpose of introducing the Bill.

There is something in the Bill for the leaders of both parties. The constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) has 9,000 voters more than the average. If that figure were reduced to the average, it would give him more time to campaign for a Conservative victory—of which we are now more confident, thanks to his accession to the leadership—as he would not have to spend so much time in his constituency. There is also something in the Bill for the Prime Minister. A cursory look at who represents these small seats reveals a disproportionate number of Labour Members who cause him trouble. So the Bill could provide a cost-free way of getting rid of some of his enemies.

The nature of the problem is quite extraordinary. The smallest seat represented in the House has 21,169 voters. The largest has 107,767, which is more than five times as big. The Member who represents the smallest seat got here by getting 6,213 votes; the Member who represents the largest had to get 32,717. That cannot be right.

The average electorate across the whole UK is just under 68,500, but 239 seats are more than 10 per cent. above or below that target, which creates a variation of nearly 14,000 votes. That is a third of all the seats in this place, and if we include the numbers that are 5 per cent. above and below, that is nearly two thirds of the seats, which is still a difference of 7,000 votes. About two thirds of the seats in the House are therefore more than 5 per cent. above or below the average. Self-evidently, that seems unfair. Whatever the party advantage or disadvantage, it surely cannot be right that some people can get here with one fifth of the votes from one fifth of the electorate with which other hon. Members have got here.

My Bill is designed to deal with that unfairness, not to deal with other questions of the fairness of the voting system or the size of Parliament, although I am in favour of a smaller Parliament. I have drawn on a report from the Electoral Reform Society, however, and a pamphlet written a couple of years ago by my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie), who used the issue as part of his argument for a smaller Parliament.

The problem derives from us—it is a self-inflicted wound. Usually, the House deals with injustice created by events beyond our control. In this case, however, under the Parliamentary Constituencies Act 1986, the boundary commission has instructions that have led to the conclusions that I have itemised. The injustice is therefore created by us, and it is in our hands to remedy it.

Let me examine the problem in a little more detail. The Act gives Wales a minimum of 35 seats, but it has 40. I do not think that there is a case for the over-representation of any part of the United Kingdom, but Wales now has its own Assembly, and Assembly Members duplicate work with Members of Parliament. If it had the same quota as the rest of the United Kingdom, it would have 32 seats. As a result of that anomaly, 33 Welsh seats are more than 10 per cent. below the average UK electorate. Of the 50 smallest seats in the whole United Kingdom, half are in Wales.

There used to be a similar problem in Scotland, which was in part corrected—wholly corrected, I thought, until I examined the figures—by the Scotland Act 1998. It is supposed to use the same quota as England, which would give it 57 seats, but it has 59—again, it is over-represented. Scotland has even less of a case than Wales for over-representation—it has its own Parliament, and Members of the Scottish Parliament perform constituency functions that, in England, usually fall to English Members of Parliament. If any part of the United Kingdom does not deserve to be over-represented, therefore, it must be Scotland.

A few very small seats in Scotland are created by a geographical exemption which the boundary commission is allowed to use. I think that that exemption should go. Even if it should remain, however, surely the problem should be dealt with in Scotland. If it wants to have three or four small seats because of Orkney, Shetland or the Western Isles—I have been mugging up on the correct pronunciation of the new name for the Western Isles seat, but seeing you there, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that my courage fails me, and I am sticking to the old English words; it seems to me that the new name is unpronounceable for anyone from south of the border—it should stay within its 57 seats and have a couple of larger ones to make up for it.

Paradoxically, Northern Ireland is given 16 to 18 seats in the boundary commission instructions, and it is mandated that there should be 17 unless there is a compelling reason to the contrary. It has 18, is at the top of the range, its average number of voters is nearly 10 per cent. below the UK average, and if it had only 17 seats, the average number of voters in a Northern Ireland seat would still be below the UK average. In the case of Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, therefore, we must move to a United Kingdom average, which would remove a large part of the problem, but far from all of it.

England has a different problem. One seat is palpably too large—the Isle of Wight—and it is under-represented in this place. As I understand it, however, that is the Isle of Wight's choice—it does not want to be divided into one and a half seats—

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Hear, hear.

Mr. Maples: I am endorsed by my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner), who comments from a sedentary position. I took the precaution of discussing the matter with him in advance. I think that the Isle of Wight is a special case, and if it chooses to be under-represented, that is its choice.

The huge disparity between the other over and under-represented constituencies, however, arises from about four causes. The first is the population shift, year after year, from cities to suburbs. The boundary commission works from old electoral registers. In the current review, it is working from electoral registers from 2000. The election at which the new seats come into operation will be in 2009 or 2010 probably, although the sooner the better. The registers will be nearly 10 years out of date at that point. The reviews take place only every eight to 12 years, so there is little opportunity to make up for the discrepancy between Parliaments.

The second group of reasons relates to the boundary commission's instructions not to cross county and London borough boundaries except in exceptional circumstances, which produces some odd results. My county, Warwickshire, is small. We have had five seats, and my own seat has had 85,000 voters. It will come as a shock to a Welshman or a Scot that any seat could be so large. We were entitled to 5.45 seats, so we have five. Now, apparently, we are entitled to 5.52 seats, and will have six. Following a very modest increase in the number of voters, we are gaining a 20 per cent. increase in the number of seats. Obviously some counties will have two fewer seats, because their entitlement is slightly below 5.5. I believe that in such cases we must let—indeed, instruct—the boundary commission to cross county and London borough boundaries.

According to the 1991 electoral register, the Banbury constituency was already 8,000 voters too big by 1997, 15,000 voters too big by 2001 and 19,000 too big by the time of the election that was held earlier this year. As for the other side of the coin, Sheffield, Brightside was already 5,000 voters too small by 1997, 13,000 voters too small by 2001 and 19,000 too small by 2005. We must let the boundary commission adjust the boundaries in accordance with what it expects to happen.

Most of the seats whose electorates are too big are held by us, and most of those that are too small are held by Labour. Of 118 seats that are more than 10 per cent. below the average, 83 are Labour-controlled. That strikes me as palpably unfair.

The remedy is obvious. First, the quota must be paramount. There should be a United Kingdom quota, and the boundary commission should be instructed that it may not deviate by more than 5 per cent. in either direction. There should be a single boundary commission for the whole United Kingdom, so that the same rules are seen to apply everywhere. Secondly, boundary reviews should happen more frequently. I suggest at least one review every four years—one for each Parliament. That would allow more frequent, but necessarily smaller, adjustments.

Thirdly, the boundary commission should be entitled to take projected population changes into account. We know that in Stratford-on-Avon about 1,000 people a year will be added to the population because of planning approvals that have already been granted, and houses that are already being built. Fourthly, the commission should be allowed to cross county and London borough boundaries to adhere to the quota. Fifthly, geographical exemption should be abolished in all parts of the United Kingdom.

I believe that the injustice is self-evident, and that the cure is obvious and in our own hands. I hope that the Bill is acceptable to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. John Maples, Mr. Stephen Dorrell, Mr. John Gummer, Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory, Miss Julie Kirkbride, Mr. Brooks Newmark, Richard Ottaway, Hugh Robertson, Mr. Andrew Tyrie, Mr. David Willetts and Mr. Tim Yeo.

PARLIAMENTARY CONSTITUENCIES (EQUALISATION)

Mr. John Maples accordingly presented a Bill for the equalisation of the size of parliamentary constituencies; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 20 January, and to be printed [Bill 98].

Point of Order

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will know of the concern about the fact that the Government are now allowing time for a debate on police restructuring. I wrote to the Home Secretary last week, because he had said outside the House that the House would have three opportunities to debate the matter before the Christmas recess. At business questions last week, the Deputy Leader of the House confirmed that there would be no such opportunity before Christmas. There appears to be an inconsistency.

I wrote to the Home Secretary to inform his private office that I would raise a point of order last Friday. I have still not received a reply. Perhaps you will advise me, Mr. Speaker, on what steps I should take next.

Mr. Speaker: All I can tell the hon. Gentleman is that he should wait for tomorrow's business statement. Things happen quickly in the House, despite what people say.

Fisheries

[Relevant documents: The Sixth Report of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee, Session 2004–05, on the Future for UK Fishing (HC 122) and the Government response thereto, First Report of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee, Session 2005–06 (HC 532).]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Tony Cunningham.]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): It gives me great pleasure to open our traditional annual fisheries debate. I am grateful both to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the business managers for enabling us to adhere to the recent convention that the debate should be held before the important December Fisheries Council. That allows hon. Members to make points of particular interest to their constituents, and me to take them on board before entering the negotiating rooms in Brussels. I know that hon. Members are extremely grateful for that opportunity.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): I am sorry to interrupt the Minister so early in his speech. This debate is important in the context of the Council and the Government's position, but would not it be useful to have another parliamentary debate before the EU-Norway negotiations? Although there are things to be decided at the forthcoming Council, the framework and the total allowable catches have already been set in the negotiations with Norway. It may be useful for the Minister and Parliament to engage before the EU-Norway negotiations.

Mr. Bradshaw: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that the EU-Norway negotiations are important. They were successfully concluded last week. My officials put a great deal of work into them and most, if not all, of the United Kingdom's main objectives were achieved. Whether Parliament can find time to have a debate every year before the EU-Norway negotiations is a matter not for me but for the House. However, it is open to hon. Members to request such a debate, or even to apply for one in Westminster Hall.

Total landings of fish from UK vessels increased last year. They are now worth about £510 million to the UK economy. Our exports of fish and fish products were also up, valued at around £880 million. The pelagic sector, which relies mainly on herring and mackerel, continues to do well, as does the shellfish sector. The importance of nephrops, more commonly known as prawns, continues to grow as a proportion of the UK's total catch. However, some other species are still in decline, or their stocks remain at dangerously low levels, most notably cod.

The UK also has a substantial fish processing industry that continues to go from strength to strength; in all, it is worth about £1.5 billion a year. I am pleased to report again, not least because of the benefits to our nation's health, that fish consumption in the UK is still growing.

[Mr. Bradshaw]

This year has reminded us of the dangers faced by those involved in the harvesting of the sea's natural resources. Indeed, commercial fishing continues to be the most dangerous of occupations.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): Will the Minister raise with the Irish Fisheries Minister my concerns about the Irish drift net fishery, which is ravaging salmon stocks bound for Scottish, Welsh and English rivers, and ask him to take action on it?

Mr. Bradshaw: I have already raised that matter not only with the Irish Minister but with the European Commission. I understand that the Government of the Republic of Ireland are working on proposals that, I hope, may go some way to dealing with the hon. Gentleman's concerns.

This year has reminded us of the dangers faced by fishermen. Losses of UK vessels amounted to 27, of which 22 were lost at sea, and there have been seven fatalities involving fishermen. I am sure that the sympathy of the whole House will go out to the families and friends of those who have lost their lives at sea and as a consequence of harbour accidents.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): I echo the Minister's sentiments about the dangers that are faced by the fishing fleet in our waters and elsewhere. Does he share my concern, and will he speak to his colleagues in the Department for Transport, about the new search and rescue helicopter contract, which is currently held by Bristow's and operated in my constituency from Sumburgh and elsewhere? There are concerns both about the helicopters that are to be used and the transfer of staff who are currently operating the helicopters. Will he convey to his colleagues in the Department for Transport the serious concerns in the fishing industry about that contract?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am helpfully informed by the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight), that he is having discussions with colleagues in other Government Departments this very day on that issue, because I think that he has a similar constituency interest.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): Let me associate the Scottish National party and Plaid Cymru with the Minister's remarks about those who have been lost at sea over the past year.

The Minister says that many stocks are under pressure but, as he knows, all white fish stocks and indeed others are to some extent being dictated by the cod recovery plan. Therefore, even if a stock is in robust condition, because of the attachment to cod in a mixed fishery, it can have a very low quota estimate. Is there not a case for a full review and public examination of the cod recovery plan, taking into account recent scientific evidence on climate change and other factors, which perhaps can look to establish a plan that does not discriminate against other fisheries in pursuit of an attempt to recover cod in the central North sea?

Mr. Bradshaw: I certainly agree that it is sensible continually to review our fisheries policy, not least the cod recovery plan. In tactical terms, it would be a mistake, however, for the UK Government to argue for an earlier review, because I suspect that that might open up a number of proposals that the hon. Gentleman would find much less attractive than the status quo. We are, however, constantly trying to satisfy ourselves that the plan, which has not had long to work in fisheries calendar time, is right. At the December Council we will argue very strongly against further pain being inflicted on the UK fleet—I will deal with this issue in a moment—including the important Scottish white fish fleet, because in our view we have yet to give the plan enough time to work. So to call for a review of it would not serve our interests well.

Mr. Angus MacNeil (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP): Given what the Minister has just said, will he therefore oppose any future plan to ratchet up the cod recovery plan?

Mr. Bradshaw: We accept that the cod stock is still very low in historical terms and does not show any sign of recovery. However, it is our very strong view that the United Kingdom has done more than any other member state to reduce effort on cod, and the Commission accepts that. We have reduced it by some 62 per cent. since the cod recovery plan came in, so in our view it is other people's turn to take a bit of pain.

This year has also been a very important one for the development of fisheries policy. In June, my colleagues in the devolved Administrations and I published our response to the Prime Minister's strategy unit report, "Net Benefits". That response, "Securing the Benefits", sets out a framework for the development of fisheries policy around the UK and how we will change for the better. I followed up "Securing the Benefits" by publishing a detailed action plan, "Charting a New Course", in October. This plan sets out how the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs will deliver the commitments made in "Securing the Benefits" in England. These actions will help to deliver a more sustainable and profitable sector.

We have already made progress in delivering these commitments. "Net Benefits" recommends that fisheries management take more account of recreational sea angling interests. We recently launched a consultation on proposals to increase the minimum landing size of bass, in recognition of anglers' strong interest in this stock and of pressure for a bass management plan. These proposals could provide real benefits to all interested parties by increasing the overall value of landings and by allowing more fish to spawn. We have also increased the representation of recreational angling interests on the sea fisheries committees.

The documents that I have just mentioned, together with our response to the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution's report, which we anticipate making in the spring, set the tone for how we will address the challenge of achieving the sustainable exploitation of marine resources that we all want to see. This is a major and global challenge that we must not underestimate.

It is with the aim of achieving real integration of the management of human activities in the marine environment that the Government are now preparing a marine Bill. The Bill will introduce a new framework for the seas—based on marine spatial planning—that balances conservation, energy and resource needs. We need new approaches and better arrangements to replace systems that have grown up piecemeal over the years and do not meet current needs.

Our coasts and seas are biologically productive and support a wide range of marine life, but they are coming under increasing pressure through development and exploitation. Fishing is one among many developing industries operating in this extremely important but delicate natural environment. Any new legislation will have to recognise the importance of all those interests, as well as the need to protect the environment in which they operate.

Mr. Walker: Will the Minister update us on the status of commercial sand eel fisheries, which have had a catastrophic effect on the food chain in our oceans?

Mr. Bradshaw: The fishery to which the hon. Gentleman refers has been closed for the past two or three months because of the collapse of the stock. The UK will certainly argue very strongly in the December Council for continuing measures to protect the sand eel stock.

We want a framework that helps us to use our marine resources in a sustainable and environmentally sensitive way, in order to conserve ecosystems and to achieve maximum environmental, social and economic benefit from the marine environment. We wish to promote and encourage environmentally sustainable use of natural resources to ensure long-term economic benefits and sustainable employment.

The Government have also listened very carefully to the concerns expressed in the royal commission's report about the environmental effect of bottom trawling—an issue that I take extremely seriously. The UK's position is that where there is no competent regional fisheries management organisation or arrangement, we now favour a moratorium on deep-sea bottom trawling in known areas of vulnerable or high biodiversity.

There have been one or two other important developments this year that I should mention before turning to the detail and to our priorities for the December Council. Modernising and streamlining fisheries management has been another priority. In October, I launched the new Marine Fisheries Agency, which is formed from the sea fisheries inspectorate and other delivery teams within DEFRA. Separating policy and delivery functions in this way will strengthen our ability to provide a professional and efficient service. This change goes hand in hand with improving compliance, so that we can secure an industry that is profitable in the long term.

Another high priority for the Department is the better regulation initiative. Rules are necessary to manage the fisheries, but the combined effect of current controls on fishermen is to impose too great a burden on them. We need to cut back on red tape wherever we can, and I am very pleased that DEFRA has linked up with the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations in a joint project to identify what changes we can make. Working with the NFFO, we have already proposed to the European Commission a number of changes that should be made to EU law. We have pressed Brussels for an effective action plan to cut burdens on fishermen, and the Commission has promised to provide its ideas at the December council.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Given that the Minister has been talking about ecosystems and the health of fish stocks, can he tell us about the consequences of the 1998 ban on the dumping of sewage in the North sea? Has there been a noticeable improvement in the marine environment, and is he satisfied that other EU countries with North sea coastlines are complying with that regulation?

Mr. Bradshaw: Yes. That regulation has had an enormous impact on the quality of our marine environment; indeed, the measures that the UK and other countries have taken to deal with sewage in a more sustainable way have contributed to our seas being cleaner than at any time since the industrial revolution. But there are other pressures, which are still growing. One reason a marine Bill is so important is that it will enable us to take an overall, holistic approach to the management of our marine environment. That is an enormous challenge, given that most of what happens occurs underwater and is invisible to the human eye. Nevertheless, we are talking about a very important resource for our country.

Mr. Salmond: Before the Minister moves on to the Fisheries Council, will he comment on a point of detail concerning the pelagic fleet? A scheme has recently been developed through which white fish licences can be aggregated into the pelagic sector. That is obviously a very good thing for the five boats that have such licences, but the other 15, which will not have time to acquire such licences and aggregation, are to some extent being discriminated against. At first sight, this scheme therefore appears to discriminate against some fishermen and in favour of others. Will the Minister have a look at this issue and see whether the time scale can be extended, so that all boats can be treated on equal terms?

Mr. Bradshaw: I certainly will examine this issue. The decision to which the hon. Gentleman refers was subject to extensive consultation over a number of years and was taken with the support of fishing industry representatives. But I undertake to write to him or to say a little more about this issue at the end of the debate.

Another issue flagged up in "Net Benefits" is problems with the current quota management system, which is regarded as confused and confusing. I agree, and in response we initiated a major programme earlier this year to reform our quota management arrangements. The programme is being undertaken in collaboration with the devolved Administrations and in full consultation with the industry. The plan is to deliver changes by 2008. They will bring clarity to the use and transfer of quota, while recognising the impact on vulnerable communities and on the small vessel fleet.

In addition to effective management of quota, the fishing fleet must be of the right size to take advantage of fishing opportunities in a sustainable way. This balance of capacity and opportunity is particularly relevant in the western channel, where the Commission proposes further restrictions to protect flatfish stocks. In addition, our economic modelling of the south-west beam trawl fleet, which targets these stocks, suggests that there is some overcapacity. I have therefore asked for an assessment of capacity across all fleet segments so that I am in a position to take a strategic view of how best to achieve a fleet structure that is sustainable in the long term. On the basis of that work, and in the light of the conservation needs, I will be actively considering further decommissioning in England and Wales in 2006-07.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby) (Lab): The fear, certainly in Grimsby, is that in the process of decommissioning—unfortunately, some Grimsby owners want to decommission, because the industry is not profitable—preference will be given to the south-west, especially the beam trawlers, which are heavy users of fuel. The problems of the whole nation, and particularly of Grimsby, need to be taken into account and the aid should not be focused only on the south-west.

Mr. Bradshaw: I assure my hon. Friend that the Government will take a holistic approach to the capacity situation. He is right to highlight the problem caused to particular sectors of our industry by high fuel prices, but I suggest that they are here to stay. If we are to achieve a sustainable and profitable fishing fleet in the long term, it makes sense to take such considerations into account when considering decommissioning. I will certainly bear in mind the representations that my hon. Friend has made and will no doubt continue to make on behalf of his constituents.

For the second half of this year, much of our focus has been on delivering a successful UK presidency of the EU. Further progress in engaging stakeholders has been made through the setting up of regional advisory councils. The UK has been a key player in this process, and under our presidency we have seen the launch of both the pelagic and the north western waters RACs. Those new RACs have already provided advice on the annual quotas regulation. The established North sea RAC has also made significant developments, including providing advice on the Shetland box that has directly influenced European policy. The RACs are now planning to advise on key Commission policies, such as maximum sustainable yield, over the coming year.

We have also achieved agreement on measures to restore and maintain healthy fish stocks. We agreed a recovery plan for southern hake and nephrops in the Cantabrian sea and western Iberian peninsula, and technical conservation measures for the Baltic sea were agreed last month in the Council. Both will be of long-term benefit to fish stocks.

One of our other objectives is to improve decision making under the CFP, with better stakeholder involvement, and we hosted a constructive meeting on that at the October Council to consider possible changes to working methods for adoption of the annual fisheries total allowable catches—TACs—or what most people refer to as the fishing year. We now expect the Commission to make concrete proposals for changing the fishing year in the spring.

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): While the Minister is talking about improving the way in which those issues are dealt with, will he consider how advice from the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea is released? The run-up to the Council is always a difficult time for fishermen, but this year advice was released from ICES that haddock stocks were plentiful. Within a week we were told of a proposal for a 40 per cent. reduction. I appreciate that that reduction has been scaled down since, but it caused much anxiety to fishermen, who feel as though they are on a rollercoaster ride.

Mr. Bradshaw: I should point out that the reduction was successfully negotiated by my excellent officials, but the hon. Gentleman has a point. That is one of the reasons why we wanted to put the issue on the agenda for our presidency. Although there is general support in the Council for some change, countries do not necessarily agree to the same changes, depending on their own interests. However, I am confident that a more sensible fishing year will emerge from the process, with maximum periods between the receipt of the scientific advice, the Commission's proposals and the need to agree them in Council. We also need to bear in mind the need that some people perceive to inject some discipline into the process, which is one of the few advantages of having the Fisheries Council in the run-up to Christmas.

Sir Robert Smith: The Minister talks of building a better process, but does he agree that the RACs need to be allowed to grow and build so that eventually those affected by decisions in, say, the North sea are the ones who make the decisions about what happens there? That would result in more buy-in to the proposals and more cohesion.

Mr. Bradshaw: I hope that that will be the case. It is worth pointing out that those organisations are only a year old. Many people were cynical about how effective they would be, but they have been proved wrong. Already, for example, the North sea advisory council has done some excellent work, produced some very good papers, engaged constructively and effectively with the Commission and managed to keep together in one body diverse interest groups with, on the face of it, different views of what we should do in the North sea. That is no mean achievement.

We also co-hosted a seminar with the Commission on fisheries partnership agreements with third countries—often poor African countries—and agreed a series of actions to ensure that those third countries' fisheries are not unsustainably exploited. That is not a major issue of concern in this country, although it should be. My concern was that in the past many of those agreements were not properly monitored, with the result that a renewable resource for some of the poorest countries in the world was being unsustainably exploited by some of the wealthiest nations, including members of the EU.

We also successfully resisted attempts to end the moratorium on commercial whaling at last year's International Whaling Commission in South Korea. We highlighted the cruelty involved in whaling. Our challenge now is to encourage more conservation-minded countries—all hon. Members have a role in delivering this message on their travels—to join the IWC, which has been subject to a vigorous recruitment campaign in recent years by the Japanese and their pro-whaling allies. We must be serious about that challenge if we are to defend our simple majority on the IWC.

The UK has also taken even more of a leadership role on illegal, unreported and unregulated fishing on the high seas. The high seas task force, which I chair, is due to report on combating IUU fishing in March next year. We are working with other countries and external bodies to support the implementation of that report.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): Will the Minister comment on salmon stocks, especially the interception of migrating salmon off the west coast of Ireland? That is particularly damaging in view of the fact that Ireland received a grant from the EU to promote rod-caught salmon and tourism, but that country continues to grant licences for salmon that would otherwise end up in English rivers, especially in the south-west.

Mr. Bradshaw: I am happy to repeat what I said in answer to the same question from the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mr. Walker). I do not think that the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) was in his place at the time. We share the concern that he expresses about the effect of Irish drift-net fishing on salmon stocks and I have raised the issue personally with my Irish counterpart and the Commission. My understanding is that the Irish Government are also well aware of the level of public concern in the Republic of Ireland and elsewhere and are considering what measures they may take to help to address those concerns.

The main priority of our presidency has been successfully to manage the December negotiation of the TACs and quota regulations for next year. Our primary objective will be to ensure that a balanced agreement is reached that respects the CFP's objectives of securing sustainable fisheries and the protection of the marine environment. We will aim to maximise economic opportunities for the UK industry within that context and seek to protect the viability of vulnerable sectors of the UK fleet and the interests of particularly fisheries-dependent communities. The latest scientific advice should mean that the Council can agree increased TACs for western monkfish and for nephrops. But there are likely to be some tough decisions needed on those stocks that are not doing so well, including North sea, west of Scotland and Irish sea cod, and a number of flatfish stocks. The scientific advice also highlighted the challenges faced in managing vulnerable deep-water species. Some industrial fisheries, such as North sea sand eels, continue to be severely depleted. Again, this year, I and my officials have gone to great lengths to ensure the active participation of the industry in discussions in the run-up to the Council. We have been ably assisted by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, who will sit in the UK chair for the Council. We will continue to keep in close touch with the industry up to and during that meeting.

Our analysis of the Commission's earlier proposals was that they would have cost the UK about £25 million, or 5 per cent. of the value of UK landings, but hard work by my officials has turned that around to a small increase of 1 per cent., as things stand at present, in the value of TACs next year.

1.10 pm

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): I echo the Minister's comments: I am delighted that there is a full day's debate on fisheries, giving the industry its due importance. Like him, I begin by offering our condolences and sympathies to relatives of the fishermen who were lost last year. According to figures from the Maritime and Coastguard Agency, 24 fishing vessels were lost and, sadly, nine crew members died last year. Preliminary figures for this year show that there have been five deaths. We extend our deepest sympathies to the families and friends of the brave men who risked their lives every day to supply us with one of our most popular and healthy foods.

The industry should be providing prosperous and sustainable long-term employment in some of our most remote communities—I emphasise the word "should". Two years ago, having visited only one serious fishery, which was in the Falklands, I took on shadow responsibility for fisheries, so I made it my job to visit the fishing communities on our coasts. It has been a huge pleasure and privilege to learn about the industry and the communities that depend on it, but it has also been deeply sad and depressing. Whether it was Whalsay in the far north of the Shetlands—where the nearest railway station is Bergen—Peterhead, Stornoway—in the western isles—Whitby, Hastings, Plymouth or Brixham, an appalling picture of the desolation of our marine environment and the destruction of our fishing communities emerged.

One example encapsulates the problem. In Fleetwood, which I have visited on several occasions, there was a fleet of 140 vessels in the 1960s; today, there are five. I met an engineer who used to employ 60 people; he now employs one fitter. There is no clearer example of the insanity of the current system than my experience when I sailed overnight in the trawler Kiroan. The owners fish for plaice in the Irish sea. They are allowed 22 days fishing per month with 80 mm mesh, at which they are viable, and only 17 days if they use the more environmentally friendly 100 mm mesh, at which they are unviable. I asked them to use both mesh sizes and they trawled twice during the night. The 100 mm net came up twice with two thirds saleable adult fish. Twice, the 80 mm net came up absolutely bursting—almost too full to pull on board—with 90 to 95 per cent. of tiny baby plaice, which were all dying.

I told the Minister about that a year ago, yet when I went back to Fleetwood this autumn I was astonished to learn from the same fishermen that 80 mm cod-ends are still being used, with 80 to 90 per cent. discards. The owner of the Kiroan told me:

> "Things have never been worse. Nothing has been done over the past eight years to make fish stocks better. The position on cod is worse than ever due to tiny mesh sizes."

It is hard to understand how intelligent, sane human beings can enforce such a policy. He went on to say that the Faroes and Norway have bigger mesh sizes; and those problems do not occur. That is my central point. We do not have to inflict that damage on our marine environment.

In the past two years, having already seen order and prosperity brought to the Falklands by local control, I have also made it my job to visit successful fisheries. I visited Norway, the Faroes, Iceland, Newfoundland and New England and I am flattered that the Minister trotted after me to some of those successful fisheries. Yesterday, I spoke to Oli Breckmann, who is a Conservative MP in the Løgting, the Faroes Parliament. By contrast to what we have just heard, my notes of the conversation spring off the page:

"Cod stocks are improving as food is improving. Coley is fishing well. Fish prices are improving and there is a buoyant mood in our industry. We are confident that cod is recovering. Haddock is OK. There is very little grumbling amongst our fishermen. Fishermen's incomes are considerably improving. We expect to improve our tax due to higher volumes and higher prices. It is absolutely ludicrous for the EU to be cutting our capacity. Here, we are improving capacity and efficiency, discarding old vessels"— not fish—

"and buying new ones. Four new trawlers have recently arrived from Iceland so we are dumping old vessels."

They are opening some areas near the shore to summer fishing of flatfish, as the fish were "dying of old age", and using selective gear to let cod escape from the top. They maintain a discard ban and the most important thing is to land everything. The sand eel fishery has been stopped as the fishing industry did not want to restore it.

Mr. Breckmann reckoned that fishing was responsible for about 10 to 20 per cent. of mortality in the Faroes and confirmed that the industry is self-regulating. That is popular with fishermen. There is collaboration between fishermen and scientists. Above all, they know that cod numbers are decided by phytoplankton and protoplankton, which depend in their turn on temperature and salinity.

A few weeks ago, I talked to Höskuldar Steinarsson of the directorate of fisheries in Reykjavik. He said:

"Things are going well without a doubt".

Yesterday, I talked to Paul Howard, executive director of the New England fishery management council. Their policies of days at sea in closed areas have led to a huge revival of fish stocks and improvement in the marine environment. I give one example that is easy to understand. Closed areas have led to scallop landings increasing from 12 million lb in 1996 to a projected 43 million lb in 2005 and 78 million lb for 2007. In the USA, 20 fish species have been removed from the over-fished list in recent years.

On the basis of many weeks of travel and long hours of discussion with people who run successful fisheries that actually improve the marine environment, we published a Green Paper in January, describing how our seas should be managed for the benefit of the nation. There is not a single original idea from me in the paper; it is a compilation of the best practices that I have seen working in other fisheries. Our policy objectives are clearly set out:

"Our policy is to manage the sea fisheries in UK waters in such a manner as to safeguard the natural environment; to rebuild and preserve our fish stocks and wildlife; to maximise the economic value of exploitable stocks, both in the short and in the long term, commensurate with the natural resource available and the environmental impact of so doing; to create a stable, equitable framework within which the fishing and allied industries can operate, including the recreational fishing sector and tourism; generally to protect the interests of the United Kingdom."

We set out a management framework with a series of tools and controls that have worked effectively in successful fisheries. The most important is effort control based on days at sea instead of fixed quotas. The immediate effect of adopting an effort control system to conserve fish stocks is that Government bodies, scientists and fishermen will be relieved of having to administer the labour-intensive and unpopular system of quota control. For many fishermen, it also relieves them of the double burden of having to deal with the EU imposition of quota controls and days at sea, with a significant reduction in bureaucracy.

The Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution, which reported a year ago, stated:

"We recommend that the UK Government should move towards managing fisheries on the basis of effort controls."

The two best examples that I saw of such controls were in the Faroes and New England, where days at sea have completely rid fishermen of any incentive to cheat and land black fish and have broadly eliminated the hideous problem of discards. Above all, fishermen are co-operating with scientists. That is fundamental. In the UK, I am afraid that there is still a poisonous distrust in many areas between the scientific establishment, environmentalists and fishermen. The key gain is accurate data—that is fundamental because there is such a high level of discards and black fish landings that neither the Government, ICES or the EU commission know exactly what is going on. They are flying blind.

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): Will my hon. Friend confirm for the layman that discards do not amount to throwing back small fish that might grow into bigger ones, but that the great majority of discarded fish are dead? They pollute the environment and represent an environmental scandal.

Mr. Paterson: My hon. Friend is right. This is a complete scandal, and the facts are unknown. I cited the example of Fleetwood, where I saw 90 to 95 per cent. of tiny baby plaice being discarded. If they had been allowed to grow, with sensible mesh size regulations, they would have become commercial fish. Most fishermen tell me that they believe that more fish is dumped as pollution than landed for human consumption, and a large number of those fish must be saleable, commercial fish. I have heard that some beam trawlers in the south-west dump 20 boxes of cod a night because they do not have the quota for it. The lesson from the Faroes and New England is that if those fish are landed, we know what is going on. Bluntly, we do not know what is going on now because there is such a level of discard and black landings. Having accurate data is an absolute basis of any management system, and my contention is that we do not have accurate data.

Mr. Carmichael: I accept the hon. Gentleman's point about the importance of accurate data—it is a very good one and we have all suffered over the years because of the lack of accurate data—but he has twice mentioned that a lot of black landings are going on, although, as he says, we do not know that. I caution him that it does the interests of our industry and our Ministers in representing our industry no good to make such wide statements about the level of black fish landings.

Mr. Paterson: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that comment, but I am reporting what I found on my travels. It is common to every quota system that quotas inevitably lead to discards and black landings. That is an ineluctable fact. The point of our policy is that we have seen that where days at sea rules have been introduced—I think that this is the third time that I have said so—there are fewer black landings and fewer discards. That is the most fundamental gain, and accurate data are produced. The royal commission said:

"Our view is that a discard ban should be introduced. Under such a scheme, all fish caught should be landed."

Mr. Salmond: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman's travels may have taken him to the major pelagic fish factories in Norway, where the nearest fisheries inspector will be well over a day's travel, perhaps two days' travel, away. From his travels or perhaps just from intuition, can he say what that might mean, for example, to the percentage of herring and mackerel going into such a Norwegian pelagic fish factory?

Mr. Paterson: I have been to Oslo and Bergen, but I cannot speculate on those questions because I did not discuss them with the people there.

I wish to return to the closed area proposals. Closed areas were also endorsed by the royal commission, which regards them as "a vital tool in the conservation of the environment", and they have been used successfully in each of the fisheries that I have mentioned. New England closes as much as 33 per cent. of its fishing grounds—an area of 8,000 square miles. We would certainly encourage a system of no-take zones, particularly in spawning and nursery areas, which are biologically sensitive, or in areas with corals or reefs, which might be exploited by divers or those with tourism interests. There is also a case for temporary closed areas.

Again, I have been struck by the speed of response that is available to those countries that run independent fisheries systems. In the Falklands, each vessel is required to report its catch every night by satellite. If a vessel that is after squid runs into too many hake, a message will be sent to it overnight requiring it to steam on for a few hours to avoid an excessive by-catch. In Iceland, messages are sent by radio within hours of a vessel reporting running into juvenile fish, and announcements are made on all the radio stations requiring vessels to stay clear. Such instant management is impossible under the system from which we currently suffer.

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): The hon. Gentleman has been indicating his view of the merits of independence. Is it still Conservative party policy that Britain should withdraw from the common fisheries policy?

Mr. Paterson: Yes. I have made that clear on many occasions—it was our policy at the general election. Our policy is that we believe that national and local control can deliver the measures that I describe. Sadly, they are not possible now. My contention is that the Minister should take on board those measures.

Mr. Bradshaw: Given the leader of the Conservative party's pledge to jettison unrealistic, extreme policies based on dogma and his failure in his leadership campaign explicitly to support the Tory policy of attempting to withdraw from the common fisheries policy, is the hon. Gentleman absolutely certain that his new leader supports that policy?

Mr. Paterson: It is very interesting that the first time that the Minister jumps up, he avoids the technical details that would improve our marine environment and gets into tittle-tattle. I was delighted by both of our leadership candidates. As Anatole Kaletsky reported last week in The Times, my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) said that he "would return national powers from EU level", which would have included fishing, and my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) said that he "would reverse EU control of fisheries policy and withdraw from employment and social policies."

On numerous occasions during the campaign, my hon. Friend stressed employment and social policies—and my word, fishing certainly comes into that category. I can assure the Minister that we are all Cameronistas now.

The Minister does not want to talk about the detail, but I have often brought the use of selective gear and technical controls to the House's attention during our numerous sparring matches in European Standing Committee A and at other times. The obtuse attitude of the Commission and the Government to the possible gains from using selective gear is extraordinary. Selective gear is quite simple—it is designed, to quote one scientist, to "surgically extract" a species from a mixed fishery without affecting any others, and many techniques can be used. As the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) has said many times, it is ludicrous that when our haddock stocks are at a 30-year high we are letting such catches go to waste and concentrating entirely on cod.

I have visited Manomet in Massachusetts, which is the world's leading research centre for selective gear. I have told the Minister about the details when he asked me about them behind the Chair. We could use those techniques. The Manomet centre has managed to separate cod and haddock with an 81 per cent. success rate. It has separated cod from flat fish with a 100 per cent. success rate. When the Minister leads these discussions in Brussels, will he please get his colleagues to understand the environmental benefits of using selective gear, because many of those techniques are not allowed by EU regulation?

We would also opt for a rigorous definition of minimum commercial sizes. Ideally, we would like a commercial size to be set to ensure that mature adults are able to survive at least one and preferably two breeding seasons without being caught. We would ban industrial fishing. I am pleased that that is one of the lessons that the Government and the Commission picked up and, very late in the day, the sand eel fishery was closed. However, as the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds has said, it was "unprecedented action to close the North Sea sand eel fishery . . . but this was not implemented until July, when the season was over and the Danish fleet . . . had already returned home."

[Mr. Paterson]

Internationally important seabird populations have suffered widespread breeding failures, partly owing to climate change, with warmer seas altering the plankton cycle, thus reducing the availability of sand eels, which the RSPB describes as "a vital food source for seabirds."

That makes it doubly important that the industrial fishery for sand eels should not worsen the situation.

Mr. Salmond: I want to make a friendly intervention this time. Many hon. Members have sat through fisheries debates over the years and there has been virtual unanimity among most fishing MPs to ban the industrial fishery. Yet, year after year, ICES produces the most extraordinary figures—many hundreds of thousands of tonnes—for the permissible fishery. Is it not passing strange that, after all those years, the welcome decision has now been made to close the sand eel fishery? Does that not bring into question the nature of the scientific advice that, year after year, against all experience and all common sense, has suggested that hundreds of thousands of tonnes of fish could be swept from the North sea and elsewhere?

Mr. Paterson: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. It is extraordinary that it has taken so long for the message to get through, but we must be grateful that the authorities have got it at last. It is not just a question of depriving haddock and cod of a food source; there is a considerable by-catch of juvenile commercial species. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right, but I will come later to the grave doubts that I have about the scientific basis for the whole policy.

We would set up a completely different system for management and the creation of fishing plans. The idea is drawn from my experience in the States, where the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act sets the strategic framework. A diverse group of people serves on regional councils to devise the policy and, above all, enforce it. Commercial fishermen, recreational anglers and environmentalists—all those with a local interest—take decisions and debate matters. Apparently, the debates can get very rowdy and the police have been called on some occasions in New England. There is a strong tradition of local democracy and accountability there and, of course, the town meeting goes back to the 18th century.

There is great merit in having the activity managed as locally as possible by those who really understand it. We would want all local producers, processors, marketers and, above all, recreational fishermen to be involved. It is extraordinary that although we have 1 million recreational fishermen who spend £1 billion a year on their activity, they are totally excluded from making decisions on what could be a really exciting and expanding sector of the economy. We would expect such people to have full influence when recreational angling gives significant value to a fishery. There are 17 million sea anglers in America who sustain nearly 350,000 jobs. It is bizarre that this country excludes such an important group, which could grow and benefit our marine resources. We would like more to be done on marine ecosystems.

Mr. Bradshaw: I am not quite sure whether I heard the hon. Gentleman correctly, but he seemed to be implying that the Government were ignoring the interests of recreational fishermen. Was he listening at all to my earlier remarks? Perhaps he would like to associate himself with the proposed consultation on the increase in the minimum bass landing size as a sign of his commitment to recreational fishing.

Mr. Paterson: We have made it absolutely clear in our discussions with recreational fishermen that we would not stop at bass. We would like minimum landing sizes for all species to be increased. I know that the focus—the battering ram—is bass because there will be great value in that. Decisions will be taken in Brussels, but I do not understand how the interests of recreational fishermen will be represented there. However, account is taken of such interests in America because of the regional councils. There are 5 million recreational anglers in Florida and they are directly involved in submitting their own information and contributing to the debate. Above all, they are involved in enforcement. For example, it is compulsory there to report every landing—hundreds of thousands of tonnes of fish are landed by recreational anglers. The current system does not allow such a thing to happen.

On research, we would like far more emphasis on the impact of climate change and natural phenomena such as the north Atlantic oscillation, because such matters affect phytoplankton and zooplankton, which ultimately determine fish biomass. Such matters have much more influence on our fish stocks than fishing effort.

An interesting report has been produced by the Institute of Marine Research and the Bjerknes centre for climate research in Bergen, Norway. It has been pointed out:

"The speed at which cod grow is very dependent on water temperature. Average bottom temperatures account for 90 per cent. of the observed difference in growth rates between different cod stocks in the North Atlantic".

Temperature affects the condition of cod and the speed at which they become sexually mature.

The report says that a sustained 1°C change in average bottom temperatures would lead to rapid and serious change here. It is reckoned that:

"Stocks in the Irish Sea, the southern North Sea, and Georges Bank would decline owing to decreasing recruitment."

The report shows the dramatic changes to the cod population that would occur if the temperature rose by 2, 3 or even 4°C. It states that future warming would lead to cod spreading even further north, but no account of that seems to have been taken at any stage of the deliberations.

The problem is confirmed by an entirely independent fishing expert, Menakhem Ben-Yami. He is an Israeli skipper who has worked for the Food and Agriculture Organisation and advised on fisheries throughout the world. He has made several interesting comments. He said:

"Illegal fishing and misreporting are direct results of wrong management, which in turn is the product of flawed science. Scientists are unable to properly assess stocks, or make reliable predictions, as long as they apply the present methodology. Current models are unable to represent marine fishing reality. They are innocent of ecology and ignore environmental factors, such as multi-annual, cyclic and semi-cyclic climatic fluctuations affecting the populations of fish and their prey and predators.

Even with the best information, they would be based mostly on statistical-mathematical manipulation of 'guestimated' values. It's 'garbage in, garbage out'."

Menakhem Ben-Yami proposes:

"Fishery science needs a major shift ... back to on-board, at-sea biological research that would enable management steps in step with the life history of the species fished".

He wants:

"on-going monitoring and analysis, considering all possible correlations between environmental factors and fish populations."

Tellingly, he says:

"When a multi-species fishery is managed by the weakest species, you reinforce the biomass of the prevailing species that often compete with the weakest one over food and habitat. Those species, say, whiting, haddock, in this case, with their large populations, simply benefit from the management applied to the cod, and thus makes its recovery even more difficult."

To pick up on the earlier comments made about the scientific basis of the proposals for the total allowable catches this year, the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations has said:

"It is now widely acknowledged, not least by the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea, that the scientific underpinning for setting quantitative limits on catches is for many stocks wobbly. The number of times the words 'uncertainty' or 'unreliable data' are used confirms that. There is a vicious cycle of poor data, weak assessments, low TACs, leading to weak compliance or discarding. This does not apply for all stocks or all areas but there is sufficient grounds to question the scientific underpinning for many quotas."

As before, we have the standard Community instrument—this one is called COM(2005) 617 final. It is dated 30 November 2005. It is the proposal for the regulation

"fixing for 2006 the fishing opportunities and associated conditions for certain fish stocks and groups of fish stocks, applicable in Community waters".

The Commission claims:

"The annual fishing opportunities Regulation is the main instrument of our conservation policy under the Common Fisheries Policy."

It says that the regulation has become "increasingly complex"—it is certainly right there—and that that is mainly due to the recovery plans.

The Commission's contention is:

"Fishery resources are, in many cases, overexploited".

In the litany of woes, there is only one main reason for that: "excess fishing". It says nothing about food supply, other predation, climate change or plankton variations. In the Commission's book, the matter is black and white. It also takes a swipe at member states for "poor enforcement".

There is a weary predictability about the matter. The Commission is again looking to a "longer term approach whereby the level of fishing is gradually reduced to long-term sustainable levels", with a "decline in fishing effort" and

"reductions in the catching sector in terms of number of vessels and/or in the average fishing effort per vessel".

However, as the Minister said, the UK has already reduced its effort in the main cod fishery by 67 per cent. through a combination of decommissioning and effort control measures.

What is going to happen is that the Minister will disappear for three days and nights and a vast amount of detail will be decided without proper consultation. Commercial fishermen, recreational anglers, environmentalists and anyone else who might exploit the marine environment will not be involved. Something like the 887 pages of detail that I have with me will emerge—we got a further 17 pages on the day that the matter was last considered in Committee.

Mr. Robert Goodwill (Scarborough and Whitby) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that although the people who he listed will not be involved in the negotiations, member states that are completely land-locked will be? Does he think that fishing will be their priority in the negotiations?

Mr. Paterson: I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Goodwill) is in the Chamber, because having someone who is really interested in fishing present to speak on behalf of Scarborough and Whitby is in stark contrast to the situation last year. He is absolutely right that decisions will be taken at the Council by nation states with no real interest in fisheries, no real understanding of fisheries, or any background in fishing. Buccaneering countries with real agricultural interests, such as Hungary and Austria, will be present, but those interests will be traded off with deals on other people's fishing interests. That is not the way in which things should be run. In reality, there are 887 pages of detail somewhere in the Commission, which, in fairness, the Minister cannot possibly understand. Last time there were two big slips, although I do not blame him for that.

Mr. Carmichael: The hon. Gentleman remarked on the former Member for Scarborough and Whitby, who served in the House before the general election. He was not a member of my party and I have no interest in the politics of Scarborough and Whitby, so I shall not get involved in that. However, the hon. Gentleman referred to him in a way that was, frankly, unworthy of him. The former hon. Member always attended and spoke in fisheries debates. He and I were usually boxing and coxing for the last speech, trying to get in after the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman had, as seems still to be the practice, taken so long. The hon. Gentleman should reflect on that.

Mr. Paterson: I am perfectly happy to apologise if the hon. Gentleman thinks that I cast a slur on the previous Member for Scarborough and Whitby. My point was that when I went to Scarborough and Whitby, my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough and Whitby, the new Member, introduced me to fishermen and we had a most interesting discussion because of his real interest in the subject. I did not mean to cast an aspersion on the previous Member, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that I will shortly draw my comments to an end. I do not intend to plough through the 887 pages of the documents.

I do not blame the Minister for this, but there were two serious slip-ups last year. One was in the North sea, when a complete muddle led to fishermen buying 120 mm nets when the regulation was intended for the Baltic. The other was in Trevose, where there was a muddle over a closed area. Those serious problems for British fishermen were not even mentioned in the enormous bundle of documents.

It is no wonder that the chairman of the Icelandic bank, the largest investor in fishing businesses around the world, has made it company policy not to invest in any Russian or EU fishery because of the arbitrary political nature of decision making. No other fishery in the world is run quite like ours and none is run quite so badly as ours. The CFP is a biological, environmental, economic and social disaster. It is beyond reform. Our policy is to establish national and local control.

1.42 pm

Geraldine Smith (Morecambe and Lunesdale) (Lab): I welcome the debate and the opportunity to raise once again inshore fishing in Morecambe bay and the need to change legislation so that there is proper regulation of shellfishing and a national licensing scheme.

I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for recently meeting me and Steven Atkins, the chief executive of the North Western and North Wales sea fisheries committee, along with Margaret Owen and Mark Hamer, who sit on it. Margaret and her husband Trevor have fished in Morecambe bay for many years and are well aware of the dangers posed to inexperienced strangers who cockle out in the sands of the bay. I was grateful to my hon. Friend for the generous amount of time that he allowed for us to apprise him of our concerns about health and safety, damage to the natural environment of Morecambe bay, the loss of taxation revenue, and fishing and the depletion of stocks.

My hon. Friend is aware of the dangers of Morecambe bay, with its fast rising tides and shifting sands. Indeed, he was the first politician to visit it after the terrible tragedy in February 2004 when 23 Chinese cockle pickers lost their lives in appalling circumstances. People who live around the bay value its beauty, but they are well aware of the need to take great care when venturing out on to the sands. It can be treacherous for those who do not have local knowledge of the tides and the shifting quicksands. Indeed, the Queen's sand pilot, Cedric Robinson, who has been leading walkers safely across the sands for more than 25 years, recently told the BBC:

"for strangers to come into the area and go cockling, it is dangerous".

I share his view completely.

The cockle beds that surround Morecambe have been closed since April 2005 by the North Western and North Wales sea fisheries committee. Legislation allows it to close beds to protect cockle stocks, but not to close them to protect human lives. That is crazy and unacceptable. The law must be changed to take health and safety concerns into account.

The closure of the cockle beds was warmly welcomed by me, the police, the coastguard, the lifeboat, the parish councils of Slyne with Hest and Bolton-le-Sands, Lancaster city council and, indeed, the local fishing community. I am pleased to note that the sea fisheries committee has not reopened the beds. However, a cockle bed further down the coast at Fleetwood reopened yesterday. My concern is that the beds will reopen and that, without proper regulation, they will once again put people's lives in danger. When the Morecambe bay beds were open for cockle fishing, the lifeboat had to be called out on numerous occasions to help cockle pickers who were in danger. In fact, the lifeboat locally became known as the "cockle taxi". People cockling were taking serious risks with their lives and were often unaware of the danger in which they placed themselves.

The problem is that Morecambe bay is a public fishery, so just about anyone can go cockling when the beds are open. A permit scheme is in operation across the bay, but again, anyone can apply for a permit by providing identity and a national insurance number. When the beds were open, hundreds of permits were issued. It is alleged that many people obtained permits to fish who were in receipt of state benefits and were not declaring their income, and that others gave bogus or fake national insurance numbers. Although several million pounds-worth of cockles were collected from the bay, I am sure that many cocklers did not pay taxation on their income.

As the sea fisheries committee has limited resources and there is only a small number of fisheries offices to deal with enforcement for a huge area, proper checks on permits did not take place. There also appeared to be problems with sharing information across Departments as a result of the Data Protection Act 1998. The weakness of the permit scheme is that just about anyone with a national insurance number and identification can apply and be granted a permit, regardless of their total lack of knowledge of health and safety issues in the bay or, indeed, of any knowledge of fishing.

The Minister knows that the situation is different for fishermen who go out on boats on Morecambe bay, because they require qualifications. There is, however, no restriction on the number of permits issued when the beds are open, which can lead to over-fishing and a depletion of stocks over a short time. Also, no charge is made for issuing a permit. The sea fisheries committee says that it is unable to charge, to restrict numbers or to link the permit to health and safety considerations because of the outdated fisheries legislation. The committee also voiced concerns to my hon. Friend and me about resourcing issues relating to law-enforcement activities in Morecambe bay.

The solution is simple: we need to change the legislation, as I am sure my hon. Friend would agree, to allow a proper licensing scheme to operate. A restricted number of licences should be issued to the bona fide fishermen—those who depend on fishing for their main source of income and who pay taxes on that. They should have first preference to hold licences for shellfishing. A charge should also be made for every licence issued. The fishing community supports that because if they paid for a licence, the regime would almost become self-policing because it would ensure that people who did not have licences were reported to the relevant authorities. That income could go towards employing more fisheries officers to deal with enforcement. A licence should not be issued to anyone who has not taken a short course on health and safety and obtained a certificate of competence. I understand that the sea fisheries committee could organise such courses relatively easily. Small changes to legislation are required, but they could make Morecambe bay a much safer place to harvest cockles and lead to long-term sustainable shellfishing in the bay.

I have talked specifically about Morecambe bay because it is the public fishery about which I have the most knowledge and because it can be so dangerous. However, I am aware of similar problems in other coastal areas, such as the Dee estuary, where a licensing scheme could also be helpful.

Mr. MacNeil: Surely the hon. Lady would not look for a licensing scheme in a cockle fishing area unless actual cockle fishers in that area were in favour of the scheme.

Geraldine Smith: Yes. Obviously, there would have to be consultation, but such a scheme would represent progress as it would ensure that people could work safely in the dangerous environment of Morecambe bay.

As well as health and safety issues, many of my constituents have been appalled by the environmental damage to Morecambe bay. When the cockling beds were opened, they were fished on an industrial scale. Rubbish and netting were left behind by cocklers, and many old vehicles were abandoned in the middle of the bay. I went out with the lifeboat crews on the hovercraft, and saw the problem for myself. It is a beautiful bay, and in the middle of it are several vehicles. They are in the sand and covered by water. Those abandoned vehicles pollute the bay and present a hazard to fishermen who work in small boats should their nets become entangled with the vehicles.

As my hon. Friend the Minister will be aware, the problem is that no agency or Government Department appears to accept responsibility for the removal of the vehicles from the bay. I have tabled several questions to various Government Departments but I have not been able to establish who is responsible for their removal. I would be most grateful if my hon. Friend were to make inquiries and write to tell me who has that responsibility. It may be helpful for him to know that so far the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the Environment Agency, the police and the local authority have all denied any responsibility. I do not know which organisation will be the last to disclaim responsibility.

I hope that the Minister will carefully consider what I have said in my brief contribution to the debate. I look forward to hearing his response when he winds up.

1.51 pm

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall) (LD): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith) to whom we should pay tribute for her tireless work on cockle fishing in Morecambe bay and for the changes that she has brought about. I am much persuaded by what she has said, particularly about abandoned vehicles. I am used to dealing with abandoned vehicles in fields in Cornwall, but to have vehicles abandoned in Morecambe bay seems ridiculous.

I welcome the opportunity to contribute, once again, to the annual debate on fisheries. I pay my respect to the many fishermen who day by day risk their lives. We also remember those who have lost their lives during this year in pursuit of their livelihood.

Later this month, the Council of Ministers will once again have its work to do. It is right that we record the many issues that are facing fishing communities in the UK, some of which have already been raised. Ministers will again decide on the quotas for commercial fish stocks in each and every member state. Too often in previous years decisions on quotas and total allowable catches have been more about short-term political priorities than about informed science and decisions reached after proper consideration and consultation involving the fishing industry.

The UK's presidency of the EU leads some of us to worry that the Minister, in trying to undertake his role as chair of the relevant committee, will pull his punches on behalf of UK fishermen. He has not done so in the past, and I hope that that practice will continue. I also hope that he can assure us that he will go into the negotiations fighting for the UK's interests. Seemingly, other countries have had no embarrassment in doing so on behalf of their fishing industries when they have been in the chair.

We want the 2006 quota regime to be based on sound science and sustainability—sustainability not only in terms of fish stocks but of the industry itself. We are mindful that stocks of many species remain at a critical level, despite a number of beneficial changes that have been introduced, including those relating to mesh sizes. Still, however, not enough young fish are being allowed to grow to maturity, with a consequent continuing decline in some fishing opportunities.

The penalties that are exacted upon those who buy and sell black fish are punitive, and this is having a real effect on the incidence of such fishing. It is, however, obviously difficult to measure the trade in black fish. It is a practice that none of us can condone, and I am pleased to note that there is some evidence to suggest that that activity is beginning to be reduced.

The cod recovery plan was well-intentioned, and originally we all supported it, but it is not working. Before any further reductions in quotas or efforts are considered, I suggest to the Minister that there should be a full review of the current plan. It should address especially the issues of by-catch and discards, and data. Merely going on with more of the same, but at an even more draconian rate, is unlikely to improve stocks to the extent that we would all wish.

We certainly need much better information on by-catch and discards. Some recent improvements need to be factored into scientific assessments relating to new data on that, but some scientists are a little behind.

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): The lack of any real quality data is at the heart of the scientific debate and of the difficulties that scientists face. Will my hon. Friend suggest to the Minister that using our own fishermen productively to create such data and to help in its capture would be a positive way forward?

Mr. Breed: That is an excellent suggestion, and one that has been considered in the past. The means by which that data will be collected and the arrangements governing inspectors on ships and on other vessels are yet to be established.

Mr. Bradshaw: The Government have funded to the tune of £5 million what are called fishery starts partnerships, which are doing exactly what has been suggested. The data on which the recommendations are based are themselves based not only on research that has been undertaken in the seas but also on real catch data.

Mr. Breed: I thank the Minister for that helpful response. Informed data—that which is robust and clear—is at the heart of decision making, or at least it should be.

Does the Minister envisage any cap on the effort in the haddock fishery? Will he tell us what perhaps he might be arguing for in the Council meeting on UK interests? The Commission has submitted its proposals for TACs, and he will know that there is considerable concern about haddock, especially in connection with the bilateral negotiations with Norway. Will he confirm that the bilaterals still take place between officials and that there is no direct ministerial involvement? Perhaps he might comment on whether he thinks that there should be such involvement.

We welcome the continued development of the regional advisory councils, which we have supported over many years. We hope that those councils will develop somewhat more rapidly to take on more of a management role rather than merely an advisory one. Even in that role, however, the councils have not been given sufficient time to respond properly to the Commission's proposals. It is vital that the RACs are in possession of information and are aware of proposals in good time for them to respond. Will the Minister, in future, insist that they receive information in good time so that they might respond in a proper manner?

We are delighted that at long last sand eel industrial fishing has been stopped. We assume that that will continue to be the case for the foreseeable future. Does the Minister expect that the issue might be raised at the Council meeting, with a date for its recommencement? Perhaps he will comment on that.

Mr. Carmichael: Does my hon. Friend agree that if that fishing were to be restarted, the test that must be applied is one that enables the industry to demonstrate that the fishing can take place without damage to the stock levels of other species, rather than simply taking the approach that has been adopted in the past by the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea—ICES?

Mr. Breed: I quite agree. Earlier, the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) suggested that the scientific evidence had been available for some time. How that argument held sway at such a late stage has never been explained, but clearly an explanation will be required if there are any proposals whatsoever to reopen the fishery.

Last week, Commissioner Borg indicated his intention to introduce new proposals, and began by stating that much of the scientific evidence on which proposals are based is often weak and, in some cases, non-existent, due to poor or non-existent landing data. What plans does the Minister have to improve that important data to achieve more informative decision making? Scientific underpinning for the setting of quantitative limits on catches is clearly not solid, and if we fail to include proper data that will only continue. Once again, the Commission and member states will be almost blind when they make important decisions on the livelihoods of many people and the economic future of many communities.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman has been generous in accepting interventions. Does he agree that we can have all the agreements in the world, but we cannot do anything without policing to deal with foreign trawlers that fly different flags and use different names to land as many fish as they like on the same vessel? That is the big problem. Whatever fine words we use, we need to take action.

Mr. Breed: I agree. The implementation of the agreement and the way in which it is enforced are at the heart of many problems and cause frustration among fishermen who try as far as possible to keep within the regulations.

Given that the Minister will be chair the Council meeting, may I ask what the UK presidency has done in the past six months to ensure that TACs and quota decisions are made on the basis of sound science and in full consultation with the fishing industry? We hold a fisheries debate every year, and the Council meets every year so it is sensible for information to be made available over a reasonable period. However, at this time of year, things are squeezed into a few weeks, often resulting in some people being unable to provide the information that, quite properly, they want to contribute to the debate. I welcome the Minister's confirmation that a marine Bill will be introduced. It will be a significant piece of legislation for fishermen and will provide extremely important measures on use of the sea, including spatial planning and environmental degradation in some areas. We therefore hope that it will be introduced at the earliest opportunity. It would benefit significantly from pre-legislative scrutiny, as the Animal Welfare Bill has done.

I, too, think that we must not forget sea anglers. In Cornwall, sea angling contributes a great deal to seaside activity, as I am sure is the case in many resorts with significant recreational and commercial sea angling operations. As appears to be the case in other countries, sea anglers should be included in discussions so that they can play a role in the constructive governance of UK fishing. Once again, the Minister will have considerable responsibilities at the end of the month, and we wish him well. UK fishermen have responded to many challenges, including the recent hike in fuel charges and so on, that have been inflicted on them. However, I hope that he realises that there remains a genuine belief that other countries are less robust in their implementation of EU policy. We would not wish UK fishermen, particularly in the south-west—I know they are very much in the Minister's sights—to be penalised once again because of the inadequate enforcement by other European states of TACs and quotas, which constitute the only available framework to address both the environmental and commercial aspects of fishing.

2.4 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby) (Lab): May I begin by joining criticism of the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) for his unwarranted and unfair attack on Lawrie Quinn? As chairman of the all-party fisheries group, I can testify that Lawrie Quinn worked long and hard for the cause of fishing, particularly in his constituency. I accept that the hon. Gentleman would wish to welcome a new Member to the House—that election, however, was decided more on the issue of fox hunting than on fishing—but it is not legitimate to do so with an attack on the newcomer's predecessor, who is missed by Labour Members and who worked vigorously and diligently for the cause of fishing. I therefore hope that the hon. Gentleman was sincere when he withdrew the aspersions that he cast on Lawrie Quinn.

In the parliamentary life-cycle, it is traditional to hold a fisheries debate at Christmas, which could be regarded as a Christmas party—usually a depressing one—for the industry and MPs from fishing constituencies. To be fair, it is our only chance to say what we would like for the industry and to brief the Minister before he goes to Brussels for the Council meeting. On his return, he usually says that he could not secure what the industry wanted, but gained the best deal that he could from the negotiations. We always end up with less than we want.

This year, two factors complicated the position. First, timing has been a problem. Commissioner Borg adopted a new approach, and suggested that he would provide advance notification of what he wanted to achieve in December. Even though he was not required to provide figures, the general principles of such a statement would have provided a useful basis for discussions, particularly those with Norway that effectively set total allowable catches. After a suspension last year, those discussions were delayed this year so, in addition to the fact that Commissioner Borg's prediction has not been forthcoming, we have had to wait for a last-minute decision, which has put the industry and ourselves at a disadvantage.

Secondly, I fear that the British presidency has been a handicap in certain negotiations. We are so anxious to bend over backwards to secure an agreement and conciliate people that we do not assert our national demands and interests as vigorously as the Dutch did when they held the presidency. They used their position ruthlessly to gain what they wanted on fishing. Why do we not do the same? Our civil servants are brought up in the best tradition of British sportsmanship—probably in an arcane game such as cricket—and they always want to be fair to the poor continentals, particularly at a time when we have to show leadership. However, that is not what the industry wants or needs. We want a vigorous assertion of our demands and interests.

Mr. Salmond rose—

Mr. Mitchell: No doubt, that assertion is about to be made.

Mr. Salmond: Is the hon. Gentleman, who chairs the all-party fisheries group, saying that the Minister is not ruthless enough? Does he not recall that at a meeting of the group at the beginning of the presidency we instructed the Minister to be ruthless? Is he saying that he has disobeyed us and kowtowed to unreasonable demands elsewhere instead of ruthlessly asserting his position?

Mr. Mitchell: I am not up to the clever techniques of Scottish politics because I am a decent, inhibited English Member. I think that the Minister has done an extremely good job and been effective in pushing our demands, and particularly effective in maintaining close and continuous contact with the industry, to listen to what it wants. I am not criticising the Minister, but I am criticising a position which makes a British Government who are in a difficult situation in Europe more accommodating than they might otherwise be, because they have the presidency and want to show responsibility. It was certainly not a criticism of our Minister.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): I understand the image that the hon. Gentleman is painting. The picture of the Minister as a sporting loser is about right, but is he not going into the conference chamber naked? Are his hands not tied? As the House can see, I am making the image more colourful by the moment. The truth is that the Government as a whole do not prioritise fishing. It is traded off against other countries that do prioritise it. We do not value fishing highly enough. Is that not the truth of the matter?

Mr. Mitchell: I shall not attempt to reply to that. The loser image was a description of my own position and sporting instincts. I was not saying that our Minister was a loser. I was saying that the difficulties of combining the presidency with arguing for national interests make the British Government more inhibited because of their instinct for fairness and conciliation. I go no further than that. I am not entering into the old in and out argument, as the hon. Gentleman may want me to.

I am sure that the new leader of the Conservative party does not want to recruit dinosaurs, and on this issue I am one. I believe that, from a fishing perspective, we would do better having national control over our own waters. That is a goal that I still support and work for. It is true that we would still need to co-operate, but we would co-operate and consult from a more powerful position if we had such control. We would act with more muscle.

As we are now arguing about the cash return on Europe, particularly the rebate, and asserting the fact that the common agricultural policy costs us dear and benefits France, it is important to point out that the common fisheries policy also costs us dear. The policy was stitched together at the last minute to get access to British waters. As the evidence produced from Scotland shows, civil servants were told to regard the fishing industry as disposable.

Mr. Salmond: Expendable.

Mr. Mitchell: Expendable. That was disgraceful, but it was accepted by the late Sir Edward Heath in his passionate desire to get into Europe. We got a worse deal than was justified. We made the biggest sacrifice.

[Mr. Mitchell]

We have had the biggest loss of catches, and the total amount of fish taken out of British waters by European vessels will come to a huge total—measured in billions—added to which is the cost of the run-down of the British industry and the run-down of fishing communities. So there are very heavy costs which need to be taken into account in the financial argument that we are involved in.

The industry has been blighted by the common fisheries policy. The English industry has borne the brunt of the cuts—substantial cuts, more than we should have taken and more than have been necessary in any other country. I can become positively elegiac when I consider the position of Grimsby, which in the days of fishing in Icelandic waters and big fishing in Norwegian waters had a powerful fishing industry as Britain's and perhaps the world's premier fishing port, and I see the present shrunken state of the industry, with owners who have invested in the industry now asking why decommissioning money cannot be channelled to them because they cannot fish profitably and want to get out. That saddens me, but I have put their demands to the Minister.

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): How does the hon. Gentleman view the fact that the Republic of Ireland is building boats yet our Northern Ireland fisheries are asked to decommission? Quotas and the tie-up schemes are decimating our industry, yet across the border we see a vibrant fishing industry compared with Northern Ireland in particular and the rest of the United Kingdom in general.

Mr. Mitchell: I did not intend to reach Grimsby via a detour to Northern Ireland, but I agree. The problem for fishing communities such as mine and other communities in Northern Ireland and Scotland is that if the cuts go on, the critical mass of the industry will be insufficient to support the facilities needed to keep it going.

Mr. Bradshaw: If my hon. Friend did not already know, it might interest him and the hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) to learn that the Government of the Irish Republic are in the process of implementing the decommissioning of 20 per cent. of their current fleet.

Mr. Mitchell: After the huge vessels that have been built in the Republic of Ireland, that is more than welcome.

With regard to critical mass, we have already had a report on the east coast fisheries industry which suggests that one or more of the white fish ports there will have to close. We have seen what has happened in Lowestoft.

Mr. Salmond: Does the hon. Gentleman think that the Minister, who is extremely vigorous and ruthless, could be persuaded to lay before the House an examination of the capacity in the Irish white fish fleet over the past 10 years, compared with the capacity in the fleets of England, Scotland and the other countries of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Mitchell: That would be interesting to know, and it would be interesting to have it reinforced by figures for new build in other European countries, particularly that financed by the European Union in Spain. The figures make me envious, so reading them will be a form of masochism, but it is necessary information that should be provided to us.

When the industry shrinks to a level below the critical mass, we need to take measures to support it—for example, to keep a regional industry going by buying licences and track records to keep them in the area, otherwise the Scots poach the lot. I do not want to sound contentious towards my colleagues in Scotland, but that is what has been happening on the east coast.

When we pressed for some measure of financing to allow the fishing communities to keep quota locally, we were referred to the regional development agencies. They initially took a firm line that they were not allowed to give support to the industry because it was against European competition rules. The only support that was offered was for health and safety measures, which would have enabled the Grimsby industry to purchase millions and millions of plastic helmets for fishermen to wear. We saw the Minister in August and I hope that he has put that right. Yorkshire Forward, for instance, is still too slow to provide the help that is necessary, and is unadventurous in keeping catching capacity in the area so that we have no further shrinkage.

I chaired the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Sub-Committee inquiry into fishing, which produced a very good report. The report emphasised the need to move forward through co-operation and devolving power from Brussels to the regional advisory councils. The Sub-Committee backed the approach developed by the strategy unit, which resulted from the Prime Minister's intervention. The Government reply to the report was lethargic and did not indicate that the issue was being pursued with the necessary dynamism. It did not address the concern that if we are not going to provide the direct aid that the industry wants—I still think that the industry should receive it—we must be vigilant in order to prevent others from providing it to their industries, which returns us to the Irish Republic and Spain.

There have been attempts to reopen the issue of whether there should be investment in new vessels and new capacity. Such investment should have ceased and that position must be maintained, but the Government must safeguard our industry against other industries that receive support.

Mr. Paterson: Conservative Members endorse the hon. Gentleman's comments. When I attended a meeting in Northern Ireland, strong words were used to criticise the handing over of money to the southern Irish. There is no place for subsidies—the lesson of Newfoundland concerns the grotesque damage caused by excessive subsidised capacity. In our paper, we make it clear that there is no role for subsidies.

Mr. Mitchell: I wish the hon. Gentleman joy in announcing the Tory policy of no subsidies for the fishing industry, which in my view requires a measure of Government support to perform the necessary transition—in particular, it needs the Government to be vigilant on subsidies to competing European industries. I am worried about fuel subsidies, which have recently become an issue in France. They are a traditional French reaction to a difficult situation, and they are totally unacceptable, because our industry is subject to the same costs. If our industry is not subsidised, nobody's industry should be subsidised.

The slower approach than I would have liked has left the industry to seize the initiative, which it has done because it wants to co-operate. The RACs resulted from not only the importance placed on them by the strategy unit, but the importance attached to them by the industry, which has committed itself. They have been handicapped by the lack of advance information on the Commission's proposals. If they had received an indication of the Commission's proposals by the middle of the year, they would have been able to develop plans on how to apply them and to make suggestions on what should be done. However, they had to work in the dark, and the timetable was put back to a November meeting, which did not achieve as much as it should have done because it did not have the material to bite on.

Mr. Hayes: My hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) is right about the difficulties for the industry in long-term business planning and investment, because the policies change year by year. Because the industry does not know where it stands, it cannot invest, but that does not seem to be the case in Ireland. In 1973, the total catch by the Irish fishing fleet was 78,068 tonnes; by 2003, it had risen by 195 per cent. Somebody is doing well within the EU, and it is not the UK—it is, as the hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) has said, Ireland.

Mr. Mitchell: The problem in this country is that the fishing industry has never been big enough to be a powerful influence on Government. It is more powerful in Scotland, and it exercises more influence on the Scottish Executive than it does on the UK Government. Smaller countries with bigger fishing industries focus more intensely on the issue and can achieve more.

The building of ever bigger and more powerful vessels goes against conservation. We need older and less efficient vessels, such as those in Grimsby, because their catches are much less damaging environmentally. What has happened in Ireland is bad for the industry and bad for conservation. It is unfortunate that the machinery in Europe is so cumbersome that it does not allow us to stop such practices immediately.

There is a case for re-organising the fishing year, which is out of kilter. We should bring forward what the Commission wants to achieve and hold earlier talks with Norway to set total allowable catches. We should also revise the scientific advice, which is increasingly questioned. It provides a freeze-frame of the previous year, so it may well be out of date by the time that judgments are made on it—it is published in the middle of the year, and the decisions are made in December.

I agree with the evidence put forward by the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations, and the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea and others have acknowledged that the scientific underpinning for the catch limits is wobbly. The number of times that the words "uncertainty" or "unreliable data" enter into those calculations means that we should not base tough judgments and restrictive measures on them.

The fishing industry and I welcome the fisheries science partnership. That welcome innovation by the Government allows fisheries vessels to undertake DEFRA-funded research, which has been very successful in making the scientific advice more practical. Given the wobbly scientific underpinning, decisions on restrictions and cuts are based on inadequate information. The industry is right to protest against the proposals on cuts, because it has been slowly ratcheted downwards by that process. We need a better organisation of the year and more information to allow the industry to become more involved in taking the necessary decisions.

We must take a long-term view of how to reach sustainable catch levels and a sustainable industry, but the Commission is still motivated by a short-term view. I was disappointed when Commissioner Borg's promise on advanced information about the Commission's objectives was not fulfilled. Unless we receive such information, the RACs cannot work effectively, because they need to take views on what the Commission is proposing in order to allow their own views to be taken into account. Those views should be enforceable, so we do not want advisory councils; we want regional managerial committees to determine the targets for their area and the means of reaching those targets—in other words, how to limit catches, if they are to be limited. What the industry wants is right. We must move on to the future by co-operating with other countries, through the RACs and more powerful bodies that will succeed them, and with scientists and Government. That is the only way in which we will achieve a sustainable industry.

I am grateful that some of the industry's demands have been taken into account and that it has been consulting so effectively. More power to that process, because the industry needs to be brought much more into it. The industry's aim, like that of the Government, is sustainability. It might be necessary to give it more financial support than the Government have been prepared to give. However, there is a common aim that will be achieved by better organisation of fishing in Europe, with more flexible management instead of blanket bans and the cod fish recovery programme.

We need more temporary closures of areas and more selective measures taken vigorously through the RACs. We need the ban on industrial fishing for which we have been asking for years. I was delighted to hear from the Minister that the effective ban on sand eels and pout will close down much of the industrial fishing, which has been an abomination. I could never understand the scientific advice on which it was maintained. Licensing will deal effectively with the black fish industry. The industry grumbles about the regulation involved, but traceability and registration are the only effective way forward in that respect.

That brings me back to the main issue that faces us: cod recovery. It is clear that the cod recovery plan is not working, yet it inhibits the rest of the industry, because what it can catch is geared to it. Haddock is more plentiful and can still be caught, yet it is not allowed to be caught because of the coupling with the cod recovery programme. The industry wants a full review of the cod recovery programme in 2006. I would go further, although it grieves me to do so, because Grimsby has always been a cod port. The time may have come for us to recognise the fact that cod stocks are not going to recover. In the North sea, the decline was mainly caused by over-catching. That has brought stocks to the point where it is questionable whether they will survive. There is also the problem of climatic effects and the warming of the waters, which was mentioned by the Opposition spokesman.

Frankly, we do not know in scientific terms whether cod stocks will recover if the cod recovery programme is maintained. If they are not going to recover, that is an end of it. Let us remove that ratchet, which is screwing down on the rest of the industry, and give up on cod. Certainly, the Canadian experience indicates that there will not be a recovery. When cod stocks reach a particularly weak point, predators come in and eat the eggs and the whole environment becomes more hostile. We may have reached that point.

I am not qualified to evaluate whether the warming of the waters will be countered by what is happening to the gulf stream. I am affected by that only to the extent of bathing from Cleethorpes beach, and I am not qualified to assess the effect on fishing. However, there is a process that is driving out the cod. It might be as well to recognise that and to say that we are not going to engage on a ratcheting process which is screwing the rest of the industry down on the basis of a cod recovery programme that will not succeed, especially as we could achieve the same objective by other means— for instance, geographically focused measures on cod taken by the RACs.

That brings me full circle to the argument on whether we are in or out of Europe. I hope that the Conservatives' position is not changed by the rush to the middle ground—or middle waters—that the new leader seems to be embarked on, and that they will maintain a position that is important, because it is an assertion of our national rights. Whatever position is taken, the transfer of power needs to be away from Brussels and down to the national and regional levels so that the industry can shape its own future and has the necessary powers to do so. That is the only way in which to achieve the sustainable industry and sustainable targets that we really need and should be the basis of our discussions today.

Mr. Robert Goodwill (Scarborough and Whitby) (Con): I commence by saying a few words about Lawrie Quinn, my predecessor. Mr. Quinn was a very hard-working MP. As Hansard shows, he regularly attended these annual fisheries debates.

When my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) visited the constituency, he witnessed real anger in the fishing community. Some of the anger was directed at the Member of Parliament, but I suspect that it should have been more rightly directed at successive Governments who have failed to deliver for the fishermen of the north-east coast, and even more at the European Commission, which has failed to deliver a common fisheries policy securing, in the words of the Minister, sustainable fisheries and the marine environment. We have had 22 years of the common fisheries policy, which has not delivered those objectives. How much longer do we have to wait to realise that the solution to the problem is that which Conservative Front Benchers, and the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), suggested?

Fishing was a central issue during the election campaign. I am pleased to say that I had the warm support of the fishermen, not least because in one of the debates at Whitby community college before the election proper started, my predecessor said that not many people were involved in the industry any more—the implication being that it therefore did not matter. I must make it clear that every one of my constituents matters, not least the fishermen. We have a vestige of a once-great industry, but we must hold on to it. There is no point in having a cod recovery plan if, when it does recover, we have no industry to capitalise on the harvest of the seas.

My constituency includes the two fishing ports of Scarborough and Whitby. People from Scarborough rarely agree with people from Whitby, but one thing that they do agree on is that the fisheries policy promoted by this Government and, I am sad to say, the previous Government, has not worked. Last week, at Hull Crown court, 10 Whitby skippers and two Whitby trawling companies pleaded guilty to 55 charges of not properly recording fish landings. The accused represented 90 per cent. of the Whitby fleet. For three months during the late summer and autumn of 2003, only 50 per cent. of landings were recorded. They were fined £122,800. I must make it clear that there was no suggestion of fraudulent activity in relation to the Inland Revenue; in fact, tax was paid on all the fish landed and harbour dues were paid on the fish that came into Whitby harbour. In fact, DEFRA spent £21,000 on forensic accountants to try to determine whether any fraud of that kind might have been committed.

I must stress that the people involved are not wealthy men. Evidence given to the court revealed that the income of the skippers was between £8,000 and £20,000. The highest-paid skipper involved in the case earned one third of the salary of a Member of Parliament—without the generous pension provisions, I hasten to add. The biggest fine was levied on Arnold Locker of Locker Trawlers. Twenty-one offences involving seven trawlers resulted in Mr. Locker being fined £52,500. I am told that similar offences in French ports would have resulted in warnings being issued.

Fishermen such as Mr. Locker, who is the chairman of the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations, faced a terrible choice at the end of 2003: break the rules or go out of business. They faced a 65 per cent. cut, due to the recovery plan, and they had already invested in more quota and new vessels. Mr. Locker had a £1.5 million overdraft because of such investments in the future of the industry. The Whitby fishermen have also invested in the young people there. We have the best training in the country for fishermen, because the Whitby fishermen have faith in the future. There are also problems relating to days at sea and the increasing pressure on them.

I must stress that those fishermen are not dishonest men. They are decent men who have been driven to dishonesty by the common fisheries policy. We have seen 22 years of failure of that policy, in which stocks have crashed and employment has gone down. Those fishermen are the people who would be in the lifeboat if someone got into trouble in their yacht off the east coast and needed rescuing. They are not criminals; in many cases, they could be called heroes. The common fisheries policy is the problem, not the solution. While I cannot condone anyone breaking the law, I think that we can all understand the desperation that they would feel when faced with the loss of their business and their home, and perhaps with the family breakdown that could result from that.

What made the fishermen in Whitby even more bitter was the fact that—no disrespect to the Scots—they knew that the Scots had been given a £50 million package to tide them over, consisting of £40 million for decommissioning and £10 million in interim aid. That worked out at £14,000 per vessel per month, or roughly £50,000 in cash to tide each skipper over. Skippers in the north-east of England got none of that money. In Northern Ireland, 16 vessels together received £900,000 to tide them over, and fishermen in Wales also got assistance. But England, for once the poor relation—

Mr. MacNeil: For once.

Mr. Goodwill: Indeed. England got nothing. Mr. Locker sold four vessels. One went to Northern Ireland—surprise, surprise!—and three went to Scotland. That enabled him to reduce his borrowing and to keep going. As I said earlier, there is no point in having a cod recovery plan if there is no industry in England left to capitalise on it.

Skippers and fishermen in Whitby feel that the science that is being used is in many cases not robust. I can understand why it is important to have figures that can be compared from year to year. However, much of the light tackle that has been used for the past 40 years to sample the stocks does not perform in the same way behind high-powered trawlers as the old tackle did. May I suggest to the Minister that we have a few years in which the two different types of tackle are used in parallel, so that we can also use modern fishing methods to sample the stocks? In that way, we would be able to pass the figures on from one year to the next.

I was going to say that the industry in the north-east had been decimated, but we know from our Roman history that decimation was what happened when a legion had not lived up to the standards of the empire and one in 10 of its soldiers were taken out. The situation in the north-east is worse than that. I have here the employment figures in UK fishing for the two years in question: 2003 and 2004. In Scotland in 2003, the figure stood at 5,276, and in 2004 it was 5,275—almost the same. In England and Wales, the figure for 2003 was 6,270, and in 2004 it was 5,665, a reduction of 9.6 per cent. But in the north-east of England, the figure for 2003 was 695, and for 2004 it was 192. That represents a reduction of 72 per cent. in employment in the east coast fishery. That is worse than decimation; that is one in three people going out of the industry in one year because of the effects of the cod recovery plan.

I thank the Minister for attending a meeting in August that was facilitated by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). I presume that the "Great" in "Great Grimsby" refers more to the football team this season than to the fishing industry in that once great fishing port. During his speech, I could not help thinking that perhaps we should have sent him to Brussels to negotiate on our behalf, as he seemed to be talking an awful lot of sense—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear!"]

The meeting that the hon. Gentleman facilitated at DEFRA in August was attended by our fishing leaders, including Mr. Fred Normandale, a Scarborough fisherman, and we tried to come up with a way of facilitating some aid for the Yorkshire coast fishermen within the rules. Yorkshire Forward said that it would make £500,000 available to the industry over two years, and it was suggested that that money could be used to fund mandatory safety equipment. I understand the arguments of additionality in this context, because if something is mandatory, there is no real gain for the taxpayer in giving people money to do something that they have to do anyway. However, the industry and Yorkshire Forward thought that that would be at least one way of levering some money in to help the industry. The Minister was very helpful and listened to everything that we said at the meeting, but I am sad to say that, so far, no money has been made available.

So, what is the future for the fishing industry on the east coast? Looking back over the debates on the issue, in which my predecessor spoke every year, I see that there was never any good news. I wonder whether there will be a future for the industry. On the bright side, we have seen a renaissance in shellfishing. The port of Bridlington is now entirely a shellfish port. It has been suggested that we are fishing our way down the food chain: we have caught all the big fish and now we are going for the small stuff. The fleet in Scarborough has been switching over to shellfish, and there has been some investment in jobs on shore. Whitby scampi is also becoming famous.

There is a company in Whitby run by a gentleman called Mike Russell, the coxswain of the Whitby lifeboat, and he knows everything there is to know about lobsters. Everything that I know about them I have learned from Mr. Russell, and he has not told me half of what he knows. Whitby has developed a thriving export market to Spain, but I was interested to hear that only the good lobsters go there. A lobster casts its shell because the meat inside its body is bursting to get out. Those are the lobsters that we send to Spain. When it has cast its shell, it goes off somewhere to hide for a couple of weeks because it is particularly vulnerable at that time. When it comes out again, it is very hungry, so it goes into the first lobster pot that it sees. However, at that stage, it is not crammed full of meat; its shell is in fact quite empty. Those are the lobsters that we tend to eat in Britain. It would be uneconomic to transport those lighter lobsters to Spain anyway. When right hon. and hon. Members visit Spain, they should make sure that they try the lobster, as there is a fair chance that it has come from my constituency. If they visit my constituency, however, they should not pay over the odds for a lobster, because the chances are that it will be one of the outgrades, which, although tasty, do not have as much meat in them as those that they will find in Spain.

The brown crab is not as abundant as it once was. Whitby fishermen are developing a market in Spain for the velvet crab, however, which is much smaller—it has a diameter of perhaps less than 10 cm—and used to be thrown overboard or destroyed because it was predating on other species that fishermen wanted to catch. Before the election, there was an interesting culinary evening to which local people were invited to sample the velvet crab. I suspect that velvet crabs will not catch on in Whitby, however, because tackling one involves an awful lot of work for not too much meat.

Until a lorry arrives from Spain that can carry a full load of 25 tonnes, the problem posed by the velvet crab is storage. Currently, velvet crabs are being stored offshore in nets, which causes the problem of crabs predating on themselves. There is also the problem that if the seas are particularly rough when the lorry from Spain is scheduled to come, the fishermen cannot go out to retrieve the crabs. I am therefore pleased that Scarborough borough council and Yorkshire Forward are working together to get a quayside storage facility for velvet crabs, so that the fishermen can capitalise on something that they once thought worthless but is now becoming a useful source of income. I hope that that will go ahead in the next few months. I also hope that a local businessmen will get a franchise on that operation, because under the tendering rules it will have to go out to widespread tender. I am sure that we would all be disappointed to see that go to a large multinational company. I know that the borough council has that in mind.

On the bright side, Whitby also has a vibrant shipbuilding industry. It has a long tradition of shipbuilding, going back to the days of Captain Cook and before. The Parcol yard, which is on the banks of the River Esk, run by a Mr. Jim Morrison, is doing a good trade selling boats, mainly for the shellfish industry, to the Shetlands and Scotland. It seems to be the Scots who have the money to buy the boats. I was pleased to visit the yard shortly after the election, to see the tremendous work going on there, and to see that the tradition of shipbuilding is being carried on in Whitby, which is not the case in many of our traditional shipbuilding ports. Several people have said to me that it detracts somewhat from the traditional, picturesque view of Whitby, but Whitby can be successful only if it is a truly working port, with working fishermen and people working in the shipyard.

I invite the Minister, when he has time on his hands, which I am sure is not too often, to come to my constituency. I assure him that he will get a warm welcome. If the weather is inclement, we will take him either to the famous Magpie restaurant, where the queues snake around the block, or to Trenchers restaurant, which, many people contend, serves better fish and chips, although it is not as famous. If the weather is clement, I am sure that we can sit on the quayside and eat fish and chips out of the paper in the traditional way. He will then be able to hear first hand what the Whitby fishermen have to say, and he will experience the frustration and anger that they feel. They are proud men, who have worked for many generations in the industry, and who would like their sons and grandsons to go into that industry. Their real concern is that no industry will be left in two, three or four years if assistance is not forthcoming.

The frustrations of those fishermen are generally directed at the rules with which they must contend. I commend the work done by my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire in examining successful fishing communities such as that in the Faroe Islands. It has used long-lining and automatic baiting to catch the big fish and leave the little fish in the sea. We should also consider what Iceland did to take control of its waters and rebuild its industry. Norway, too, has a vibrant industry—a couple of boats from Whitby fish in Norwegian waters and have seen how stocks are recovering there.

I am saddened that, in future, we will just see more of the same—more of the medicine that, in my view, is poisoning the patient. Surely now is the time for a different prescription, and for considering how we can take back control of our waters. I do not talk as a little Englander. I was I am almost ashamed to say, a Member of the European Parliament for five years before entering this proper—as the Chief Whip told me—Parliament. I understand the difficulties of getting agreement in the Council. I understand how, with the presidency, the Minister's hands will be even more tied than normal. I understand the difficulties of trying to negotiate about fish with Czechs, Slovaks and Hungarians, who could not care less about the North sea or fishing in general, but who will negotiate and build coalitions with other countries, such as Spain and France, if they can get what they want on the agricultural front. It is somewhat bizarre that agriculture and fishing can be traded off against each other. I must declare an interest as a farmer—I am responsible for supplying the chips to go with the fish. It is disappointing that the fishing industry often seems to be the poor relation when the Council decides the way forward, and that fishermen often get the rough end of the deal.

Fishermen who have pleaded guilty to breaking the law have no confidence in the rules that they are being asked to apply. They have no confidence that what they are being asked to do will deliver a vibrant and forward-looking industry in the future. I am sure that they do not like throwing dead fish back into the sea—we have heard about 90 per cent. by-catches—as they realise that by doing so they are polluting the marine environment, not contributing to it. If we had a system whereby days at sea were controlled, and fishermen had to land everything that they caught, the industry would feel confident that what it was doing would deliver a future and the sustainable fisheries that the common fisheries policy was meant to achieve.

I commend the programme set out by my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire, and I hope that it will at least form the basis of a way forward. While I know that it has been said that negotiating an opt-out would be impossible, surely, for the sake of fishermen in Scotland, Northern Ireland and the north-east of England, we must try to build a future based on the confidence of the people who must implement the rules, not on a plan in which, in my opinion, the industry has no confidence. It is no wonder that so many fishermen, unfortunately, are ignoring the rules.

2.58 pm

Mr. Iain Wright (Hartlepool) (Lab): I want to associate myself with the comments made by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) and my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) regarding the criticism made by the hon.

Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) of Lawrie Quinn. The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland was very gracious—he did not have to make those comments. It strikes me, however, that there are many physical similarities between him and Lawrie, and I do not think that I have seen them in the same room. Perhaps Lawrie is back in the House, in which case he is warmly welcomed. [Laughter.] He is on the wrong side of the House, but he is welcome.

I understand that Lawrie worked hard on behalf of the Scarborough and Whitby fishing industry and always participated in the annual fisheries debate. I felt that the comments of the hon. Member for North Shropshire were unnecessary, and made a mockery of the new Conservative leader's claim that we would see an end to "Punch and Judy politics". That's not the way to do it.

Like the hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Goodwill), I am making my first contribution to the annual fisheries debate. I hope that it will be the first of many, and that during my time in the House the fishing industry of the United Kingdom, and that of Hartlepool in particular, will go from strength to strength. As it is my first fisheries debate I hope that, before I speak of the challenges facing the industry in Hartlepool, the House will indulge me for a moment so that I can briefly set out the history of the fishing industry in my constituency.

Fishing has a long and proud history in Hartlepool. Before the industrial revolution and the rapid expansion of the town, it was predominantly a fishing settlement. The town received its charter in 1201 from King John, not only because of its military and strategic importance as a port against the French, but because of the strength of its fishing fleets and the regular town market's influence on the commercial activity of the north of England.

The harshness of the sea and the difficulty of making a living injected a great deal of character into the local people. In his "A History of Hartlepool", written in the middle of the 19th century, Sir Cuthbert Sharp expressed himself vividly:

"The inhabitants of Hartlepool consist principally of fishermen, a hardy race: their manners are courteous and civil, especially towards strangers; their mode of life and thinking is characterised by stern and unbending independence. They are in general sober, and their luxuries seldom extend beyond the indulgence of fine white cakes. They marry early, have in general large families, and their wives are universally the purse bearers."

Reading that, I know that I have Hartlepool blood flowing through my veins.

Sir Cuthbert went on

"The women perform the most laborious part of the occupation on shore. They are seen to be on the beach waiting the return of the cobles and carry the lines home; the task of baiting is performed by them, and they likewise have to procure the mussels from the scalps".

Within living memory—although not mine—it was possible to leave the pub, "The Fisherman's Arms", and walk on to the fish quay, where a fishwife, shawl on her head and knife in her hand, would give people a cod slice from her pram while they waited. That was a good meal, certainly on a Friday.

Sir Cuthbert's comments were written just before West Hartlepool was established. Because of the rapid expansion of the town through the industrial revolution and the growth of heavy manufacturing, we as a community have not been as reliant upon the sea and fishing as other constituencies may have been. Nevertheless, in the oldest part of Hartlepool, the headland, we still have a strong and proud fishing community that catches fish that is renowned for its quality. Not for nothing is Hartlepool fish served at the tables of the finest seafood restaurants in the north of England. Some, such as Ocean and Big Mussel—along with Don Bee's and Verrall's fish-and-chip shops—are in Hartlepool itself. We have a high quality industry with high added value, dating back for many centuries. I want to make sure, during my time in the House, that it remains sustainable and profitable in the long term.

In the summer, I met representatives of the Hartlepool fishing community. They raised concerns with me, which I passed on to the Minister in the form of written parliamentary questions. The four broad themes that I raised in those questions form the basis of my speech.

I asked the Minister about the use of larger mesh nets as a means of enabling younger fish to escape and repopulate the seas. I was trying to ascertain the long-term viability of fish stocks in the North sea, particularly cod. Cod has been the staple catch of Hartlepool fishermen for centuries, but today's fishermen confirm from experience that there has been a massive decline. That was reiterated by the Minister in a reply during last month's Environment, Food and Rural Affairs questions. I understand that if we take a baseline of 100 for the year 1963 in the North sea, current cod stocks amount to about 25.

Fishermen in my constituency vehemently deny that the shortage has been caused by overfishing. Quotas have been too low for too long. The fishermen, many of whom have been at sea for decades, tell me that they detect a change in the habits of the cod. Essentially, they are migrating further north, presumably to find appropriate plankton for food. Evidence on the ground—as it were—seems to support research done in the past few years, which suggests that global warming, and a subsequent reduction in the supply of appropriate plankton, is having a knock-on effect on cod supply. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby that the shortage has not necessarily been caused by overfishing; it could be due to environmental changes.

Mr. Carmichael: I am familiar with the arguments about environmental changes and their impacts, and indeed I have advanced many of them in the past. My difficulty, which the hon. Gentleman may now share, lies with increasing evidence of a growing stock of young cod along the east coast, such as we last saw in, I believe, 1996. That demonstrates that neither the hon. Gentleman nor I, nor even any of the clever scientists, really know what is happening. However, does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is now imperative for the spawning grounds to be protected at all costs?

Mr. Wright: I entirely agree. I want to go on ensuring that the Hartlepool cod fishing industry has a vibrant future, and it is vital to protect as much of it as possible.

There is an absolute need to link the study of the maritime environment with the fishing industry—although I bear in mind the observation of the hon.

[Mr. Wright]

Member for Orkney and Shetland that scientists really do not have a clue about stocks—to determine how the UK fishing industry can adapt to the effects of a changing environment. I hope that the Marine Bill, which the Minister mentioned, will reflect that. It causes me some concern that the Prime Minister's strategy unit has said,

"the UK whitefish fleet is too large to be profitable in the long term . . . we estimate that reductions of at least 13 per cent. of whitefish capacity is needed to ensure long term profitability".

I urge the Minister to manage the process of downsizing extremely carefully, to ensure that fishermen and the infrastructure in the Hartlepool industry are not adversely affected.

Given what has been said, I understand that fishermen cannot catch stock that is not there. That brings me to my next point, which concerns diversification—not only in the industry, but in interests outside fishing. My fishermen tell me that there is a massive stock of shellfish, particularly prawns, in the North sea off the coast of Hartlepool. We are currently developing the velvet crab industry, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby. I hope that the Minister will take that into account when considering the negotiation of total allowable catches and quotas in Europe that will permit the fishermen in my constituency to continue to make a living.

My area in the north-east is all too familiar with the dangers of failing to diversify. The collapse of heavy manufacturing industry in the 1980s, for example, had a devastating effect on communities in my region, and we are only now beginning to pick up the pieces. The town of Hartlepool is regenerating itself as a major tourist and leisure destination, supported by our jewel in the crown, a world-class marina. I do not wish to see the fishing industry in Hartlepool "Disneyfied", as I want it to remain a true, real and vibrant industry, but I think there is an opportunity to expand the role of fishing within the leisure and tourism sectors. There are plans, for instance, for a fish restaurant on the Kafiga landings at the headland, which should give an additional boost to tourism.

The Minister may recall that in his reply to my question about diversification in the summer, he mentioned that his Department tasked regional development agencies with boosting rural economic development. While I welcome that—particularly as I was employed by One NorthEast—I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby that RDAs could do more to stress the importance of fishing ports. Will the Minister tell us in his winding-up speech what additional pressure he is placing on relevant development agencies to boost the fishing industries in their areas?

The Minister also mentioned in his reply that the new EU grant scheme for fisheries, under negotiation in the Agriculture and Fisheries Council, would from 2007 include powers to grant aid for diversification from fisheries. I should like to know what progress is being made and whether the recent debate in Europe on the future of the EU budget has had any impact on that work.

May I mention the increase in fuel prices in recent months and years? Other Members have mentioned that, too. It is having a huge effect on fishermen, as well as others. When I raised the issue with the Minister, he mentioned that DEFRA officials have met representatives of the fishing industry to discuss the increases in fuel prices and how the industry can respond. I would be grateful if the Minister could give the House an update on those discussions.

The Chancellor's pre-Budget report this week mentioned an increase in tax rates on oil companies. I know that there will be a long queue of interested parties who would like to get their hands on that increased tax revenue, but does the Minister think that additional support will be provided to those in the fishing industry whose margins are extremely tight? Fluctuations in fuel prices can mean the difference between profit and loss.

Another factor in ensuring profitability is bureaucracy. That is seen by the Hartlepool fishermen as a major concern and something that takes them an inordinate time to process. I found the Minister's reply to my written question on the matter in the summer extremely helpful. He stated that reduction of bureaucracy and simplification of the legislation was a huge priority for his Department. I welcome the improvement in application procedures for the fisheries grant scheme.

The Minister also mentioned in his reply that work is going on between his Department and the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations on a joint research project to identify specific reforms. I think that he mentioned that in his remarks today. I welcome that and look forward to the industry, particularly that in Hartlepool, reaping the rewards. Also, simplification of EU law is seen as a priority for this country's presidency of the EU, and I understand that an action plan is due by the end of the year. I would like to know from the Minister what progress has been made on that.

Hartlepool has a very long tradition of fishing. I want that to continue and, indeed, to thrive and expand. I hope that the Minister will take on board, when he goes in to bat for Britain in the EU in the coming days and weeks, the concerns of Hartlepool fishermen to ensure that we have a vibrant industry in the years and decades to come.

3.11 pm

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): I congratulate the hon. Members who have spoken in the debate. It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Members for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell)—who gave an insight into his local area and the wider scene as regards European affairs—for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Goodwill) and for Hartlepool (Mr. Wright), from whom we heard a few fishy stories.

On behalf of the fishing industry in Northern Ireland, I would like to share a few thoughts with Members, which I trust the Minister will take cognisance of as he prepares for the Fisheries Council. I also hope that he will encourage his colleague at the Northern Ireland Office, Lord Rooker, to attend with him to bat for Northern Ireland fishermen and to do his best to put forward the case for local fishermen in Europe.

I also hope that, following my remarks, this House will better understand the problems that the industry is facing and the few opportunities that it has. Some of those problems are common to all regions within the United Kingdom. I understand the frustrations that the hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby expressed. I can assure him that those frustrations are felt by Northern Ireland fishermen, especially as the Irish Republic Government seem to secure a more favourable outcome from the talks and negotiations in Europe than the UK Government do on behalf of fishermen in Northern Ireland. There are some issues that are unique to those who fish and depend upon fish in the Irish sea.

Sea fishing is maintained all around Northern Ireland's coastline, but the main commercial activity is centred around three fishing villages, namely, Portavogie in the north, Ardglass in the middle and Kilkeel in the south of the County Down coast. The fishing industry is in reality the community in those villages, and the community is the fishing industry. The two are inextricably linked. Therefore, we can understand what a decline in that industry does to the community. Before I refer to some of the recommendations that those fishermen would like the Minister to take cognisance of, let me give hon. Members some background.

Traditionally, the industry sustained itself and the fish stocks by being able to conduct what was known as a mixed fishery, targeting three main stock groups. For about a third of the year, the fleet would target herring; for another third of the year, it would target whitefish; and for the final third, it would target nephrops, or prawns. Then fisheries managers intervened. Back in 1980, temporary closed areas were introduced in the herring fishery. Twenty-five years later, those temporary closures are still with the industry. One might ask, what has resulted from those temporary closures? For the vast majority of fishermen, the herring fishery disappeared. The local fleet then had to divert its efforts to the remaining fisheries: whitefish and prawns.

Then, at the beginning of the 1990s, the fisheries managers decided that too much effort was being exerted upon the whitefish stocks. Reduced TACs in the Irish sea were the order of the day, but those were compounded in 2000 by the first so-called cod recovery programme to be implemented in EU waters. The temporary area closures were complemented by the imposition of effort controls in 2004. The Irish sea remains the only EU waters where so-called cod recovery combines area closures with effort control.

In 1999, there was a fleet of over 40 Northern Ireland trawlers targeting whitefish for most of the year. Today, the number of trawlers targeting whitefish can be measured in single figures. Consequently, white fisheries managers now give lip service to the mixed fishery model. In fact, the traditional mixed fishery in the Irish sea, which served both the stocks and the industry so well for decades, has been managed into a single species fishery.

Prawns are by far the most important single species to the entire local fishing industry, both at sea and onshore, accounting for more than half the value of all fish and shellfish landed in the Province. Prawns are the bedrock of the local fish processing sector. They account for the vast majority of fishery exports to Europe. That sustains most of the processing sector jobs and has a worth of over £70 million annually to the local economy. Yet despite the fact that fishery managers have cornered the industry into the single species fishery, they are still not happy—they want to go further. How much further can they go?

I am led to believe that the Commission is minded to impose additional management measures on that industry. There are rumours about further reductions in the number of days prawn boats spend at sea. Additional unproven technical conservation measures in the TAC persist and are counter to the science on that stock, which confirms what fishermen have said for years—if anything, the size of the prawn stock is on the increase.

Many fishermen hold out for the future; they look for a new dawn. Fishermen, it should be remembered, are just like everyone else—they are business men; ordinary people desiring to make a living. Each owns assets worth several thousands, if not millions, of pounds. Does anyone really believe that if fishermen did not think that there was a future in fishing the Irish sea, they would be continuing to invest in the industry, despite the problems? I congratulate those who have maintained that hope and encourage Government to defend them in the negotiations in the Fisheries Council later in December.

Fishermen want to safeguard fish stocks—after all, they are their future. Our local fisheries organisation is currently managing various projects, utilising European Union and national funding, that are designed to improve the selectivity of fishing gear. In partnership with local fisheries scientists, they are conducting an attempt to identify simple measures that can be used by the local prawn fleet to minimise discards in its prawn trawls. Fishermen are developing a new partnership with local fisheries scientists to improve data, which, in turn, will improve the science and should improve fishery management in the area. Those are commendable exercises. Fishermen are working with scientists and others in the industry and the Department to try to achieve goals.I simply hope that, in the meantime, the forthcoming Fisheries Councils do not scuttle that work by imposing more meaningless measures on the local industry.

Mrs. Iris Robinson: In relation to the forthcoming Fisheries Council in Brussels and with specific regard to quotas, I am informed that EU scientists have advised the Commission to increase the Irish sea plaice quota by 250 per cent., but that the Commission is set to order a 15 per cent. decrease. Will my hon. Friend join me in pressing the Government to investigate the scientific evidence on which the Commission intends to base the decision?

Dr. McCrea: I thank my hon. Friend for her intervention and simply direct her question and her information to the Minister and press him to take the point seriously and investigate it now, before the Fisheries Council meeting.

I ask the Minister to take account of the current fuel crisis, which is affecting the industry. Hon. Members must be aware of the problems that increasing fuel costs have caused. Some member states have assisted their fishing sector on that but, typically, the United Kingdom has not.

Mr. MacNeil: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the United Kingdom should operate a similar scheme to that in France, whereby the Government supply fuel to fishermen at about 22p a litre? When the price of fuel falls to below 22p a litre, fishermen pay the higher price. However, in the interim the scheme gives fishermen guaranteed prices and they know that they can plan their businesses.

Dr. McCrea: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that. France is supposedly regarded as the great European, yet it always finds a way around European legislation, whether it affects farmers, fishermen and so on. We simply ask for a level playing field in Europe. If that is good enough for France, there is no reason why it cannot be done. Ministers often tell us, "We can't do these things." How can the great European leaders of France do them? If the French Government can do it, why cannot it be done to save our industry at a time of crisis?

The fuel crisis is in danger of overarching all the issues that I have mentioned. The industry could be crippled soon. What more could be done? I make a plea to the Minister to ensure that the forthcoming Fisheries Council bears that major socio-economic issue in mind when it reaches its decision for 2006. The fishing industry cannot sustain the imposition of any further cuts—in for example, quota and days at sea—or the unworkable technical measures. They must be resisted.

I believe that there are those in the industry who feel that there is a future. I ask hon. Members to join me in asking the Minister to ensure, through the negotiations, that he and his colleagues in Europe give our fishermen that future.

Mr. Angus MacNeil (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP): I should like to associate myself with some of the earlier comments about fishing and the attendant dangers. I have known several people who lost their lives fishing, including people with whom I was at school, and I am therefore well aware of the courage and drive of fishermen. That should not be underestimated.

I declare a slight interest in that I have been fishing. Ten years ago, I fished with static nets, west of Uist, in a boat called the Dawn Ann. Two years ago, I was lobster fishing, which the hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Goodwill) mentioned. When lobster fishing, if one sees a good lobster that is going to Spain and one knocks its claws off, it cannot be sold. We also fished brown crabs and the violent little velvet crab. I admire anybody who eats velvet crabs. I am sure that they are tasty and they should command a higher price. I hope that they will in the run-up to Christmas.

As I said, many friends of mine fish. Many are successful fishermen who were given the right chance at the right moment and found themselves in charge of boats at a young age. When given such an opportunity, many young island men have made a great success of it. I hope that the Under-Secretary is mindful of the need for continued support to ensure that, in future, we experience the same success.

On my island, the Isle of Barra, we have the tremendously successful company, Barratlantic, which employs many local people. Many people with whom I went to school work at Barratlantic. Fishing is therefore the bedrock and foundation of my island and my communities. It is interesting to note that many people have come over from the Czech Republic and Poland to work in our factory. It is especially encouraging to witness the good relations that have consequently been established. Many co-workers from the islands have been on holiday with their colleagues in the Czech Republic and Poland. I especially welcome that sort of development and friendship, and the way in which the island people work with those who come to work in their midst.

I welcome the increase in the nephrop-prawn quota in the coming year. The Western Isles fishermen are pleased with that. It means more jobs and, I hope, greater prosperity.

Scotland has approximately two thirds of UK fish landings. With population factored in, that makes fishing 20 times more important to Scotland. Scotland has around 127,000 square miles of the European seas. I am mindful of the comments of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), who said that smaller nations are more aware of their fishing and fishery needs. The hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) highlighted that in practice, when she spoke about looking over the border to the Republic and seeing new boats at Killibegs and similar ports.

With 127,000 square miles of European waters, one imagines that Scotland would be a bigger player in Europe, but it is not and that is unfortunate. The negotiations have already been framed this year in the talks with Norway, which is a power to be envied. It is an independent nation with excellent relations with Westminster. However, Norway negotiates with the EU directly, and when Norway frowns, the EU trembles.

It is useful to highlight the problems that underpin our annual debates on fishing. Recently, the Prime Minister, while abandoning the rebate, has tried to attack and target the common agricultural policy. Perhaps he should have looked at the common fisheries policy. Have the Government looked seriously at the pros and cons of replacing the CFP, which has many problems, with other fishery structures? Of course, no one is saying that we should not have international negotiations on and co-operation between fisheries, but should it be on the current basis? Instead of this horse-trading, would it not be better for nations to be up-front with each other? For instance, why, west of the Hebrides, where there is no overlap, are France and Spain hoovering up many of our fish? I leave that with the Minister.

Consensus at this time of year is difficult to find and the consensus in the Chamber is that the run-up to Christmas is not the right time for such negotiations. I should not be surprised if after a tiring and pressing three days, Ministers make mistakes. As my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) said, their robustness and ruthlessness might decline somewhat by the end of such long negotiations.Consensus is also emerging on the cod recovery plan. It is not doing what it says on the tin—it is damaging other fisheries. It needs a public re-examination and cod needs to be separated from other fisheries.

When the plan fails, we go back for more of the same medicine from the same source of advice—even at a time when many feel that cod are migrating to colder seas.

The demand for a 30 per cent. increase is unrealistic, and if it is not achieved, cuts will come into play for other species. Now is definitely the time for a full re-evaluation. The Minister might say that it is tactically the wrong time, but it is strategically the right time for fishermen. We need to do away with the annual emotional rollercoaster ride that is caused, in the main, by the failure of the CFP. This year, there are projected cuts of 15 per cent. for cod, 13 per cent. for haddock, 15 per cent. for saithe, 15 per cent. for whiting and 2.5 per cent. for plaice. The latter figure is attributable to the particular interest of the Dutch in plaice; they are lobbying quite fiercely in that regard. The CFP clearly has knock-on effects for many other fisheries.

I hope that our Government will push hard for the industry during the negotiations. I point out, particularly to the officials, that any reference to cricket should go. Given that we are in the driving seat—that we have the presidency of the EU—we should make absolutely sure that we are doing the best for our fishermen and getting the best deal. I want to be able to tell my communities that things are going well and that fishing will be looking up in the next few years, not down.

I am also concerned about the cut in pelagic fishing. I know the owner and crew of the pelagic vessel, the Prowess, which operates in the Outer Hebrides, and I hope that that cut will be offset by the increases that scientists say could be made in other areas overseas. I hope that the Minister will look at this issue and ensure that the pelagic cut is not as currently framed.

I wish the Minister well and I hope that the officials will be mindful of my earlier cricket reference. Would it not be better if the Minister were at the top table in Europe with the ally of an independent Scotland, rather than being without one?

3.32 pm

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): This is the fifth annual fishing debate that I have taken part in since being elected to the House and the issues raised are depressingly familiar. They include the usual background of the failure of the cod recovery plan and the knock-on effects for other species. The aims of our fisheries policy should be to create the conditions in which stocks at risk can recover, and to maintain stocks at safe biological limits, so that we avoid the need to take drastic measures to save a particular species. It is also important to ensure the continuing viability of the industry both at sea and on land, and in the many local communities that depend on it.

There is little doubt that the common fisheries policy as currently structured has failed. It has failed to achieve any of its key objectives or to conserve fish stocks, most obviously of cod. I agree with those Members who say that a full review of the cod recovery plan is required; imposing more of the same measures has little chance of success. We need to move away from the annual round of negotiations and horse-trading in Brussels at this time of year. Ideally, we should move toward a system of regional management committees.

The current policy has failed mainly because it is far too centralised and run from Brussels. Decisions are taken in a forum that is far too remote from the fishermen and others affected by such decisions. Whereas the Norwegian delegation at the EU-Norway talks allows its fishermen into those talks, other European fishermen are kept outside. Before Sweden joined the EU, Swedish fishermen were able to take part in the talks; once Sweden joined, they were ushered out of the room. We need to involve fishermen much more in these discussions. I also agree that we need to look at the fishing year; the current system leads to a very rushed series of negotiations at this time of year. There seems not to have been time even to involve the existing regional advisory councils fully in that process.

Withdrawal from the CFP, while it may be tempting, is not a serious option. It was not clear from the comments by the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) whether it was still the Conservatives' policy to withdraw from it unilaterally. I thought from his last remark that that was still their policy, but he may be preparing the ground for a U-turn by the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron).

Mr. Weir: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) has already started that U-turn? It was reported, when he made his brief visit to Scotland during the leadership campaign, that he said that there were more important issues in Europe than fisheries policy and he was no longer committed to withdrawal.

Mr. Reid: That is interesting information and it reinforces my suspicions that the hon. Member for Witney has gone down one leg of the U.

Mr. Salmond: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that at one of the leadership hustings in Aberdeen only 15 people turned up?

Mr. Reid: Were they charging for admission?

As I was saying, withdrawal from the CFP is not an option. Fish swim across national boundaries. They spawn, feed and get caught in different parts of the sea. National boundaries are only artificial lines on the map, drawn halfway between countries, and are not boundaries on which we should base a fisheries policy.

At European level, we need an overarching policy. However, within that policy, management of fish stocks would be best carried out by regional management committees, which would involve local fishermen, scientists, representatives of Government and other stakeholders. I hope that the new regional advisory councils will develop into regional management committees with real power. I am sure that such committees would manage their local fish stocks far better than the present system.

I now wish to say a few words about this year's negotiations. As part of my preparation for this debate, I consulted fishermen in my constituency. The main fishery in the waters off my constituency is prawns. In fact, the prawn fishery is now the most valuable fishery in Scotland. There is universal agreement that prawn stocks are healthy, although it is true that in certain areas, at certain times, there is a more than negligible cod by-catch. However, the cod spawning grounds have been identified and a box has been drawn at the entrance to Clyde, partly in Scottish waters and partly in Northern Ireland waters, in which trawling for prawns is prohibited during the cod spawning season from 14 February until 30 April. As long as the cod spawning box is avoided between those dates, the Clyde Fishermen's Association insists that the cod by-catch when fishing for prawns is negligible, but its fishing effort is restricted. This year the Commission has proposed further cuts in days at sea for nephrops trawlers in the west of Scotland area. The Clyde Fishermen's Association does not see the need for that further restriction because its cod by-catch is negligible as long as the box is avoided at the specific times of the year.

The views of the CFA on the cod by-catch are backed up by a written answer that I received from the Minister's predecessor, now the Minister for Climate Change and the Environment, as long ago as 7 November 2002. It stated:

"We have already reminded the Commission of our view—substantiated last year by detailed scientific analysis—that curbing nephrops fishing brings minimal benefit to cod."—[Official Report, 7 November 2002; Vol. 392, c. 584W.]

Given that longstanding scientific advice, I do not understand why the Commission still insists that further restrictions on the days at sea for nephrops fishing are required as part of the cod recovery plan.

This year, there was some good news from the Commission in that it proposes an increase of 39 per cent. in the west of Scotland nephrops TAC. It is very important that the Council agrees to that measure. Last year, the published scientific data showed that the nephrops TAC for the west of Scotland could be increased by 30 per cent. without any risk to cod stocks, but only a much smaller increase was allowed. I am pleased that this year the Commission has taken the scientific advice and proposed a much larger increase.

The association is also concerned that the European regulations are complex and often change drastically from year to year, which makes it difficult for fishing businesses to plan ahead. The association makes a plea for simplicity and continuity in the regulations. Sometimes, due to their circumstances, individual fishermen suffer greatly from the regulations. The association gave me two examples of such hard-luck cases. I plan to write to the Minister about them in more detail, so I shall only summarise them.

The owner of a scallop boat wants to convert his vessel so that he can fish for queen scallops, but the scallop-fishing gear on his boat falls outside the regulations. Queen scallops also fall outside European regulations but the gear that he requires to fish for them is caught by European regulations designed to minimise cod by-catch. Because he has no record of prawn fishing in 2002, he cannot to convert his gear, yet the local association tells me that it would be almost impossible to catch a cod with that gear.

The second case involves a Campbeltown fisherman who bought a vessel from the North sea white fish fleet in 2002 with the intention of converting it to a prawn trawler and using it in the west of Scotland zone. However, just after he bought the trawler the new days at sea regulations were published, whose effect is that the days at sea applying to that vessel are not the days at sea that apply to the west of Scotland nephrops fleet, but the much lower number of days at sea that apply to the North sea white fish fleet. I am not sure of the logic of imposing days at sea restrictions for a species in one zone that were meant to apply to a different species in a different zone. That fisherman was caught out by regulations that did not apply when he bought the vessel, but had retrospective effect to the time before he bought it. That appears unfair to what must be only a small number of fishermen. The fishermen's association told me that as the regulations are European, the Scottish Executive have no flexibility, so I hope that the Minister will investigate those cases.

Other Members have referred to angling. Angling at sea and in salmon rivers is an important industry and sea management measures can affect it. It is important that the angling industry is allowed to participate in the management of fish stocks.

In conclusion, I live in hope that future debates will be held against the backdrop of a cod recovery plan that has been seen to work and that the regional advisory councils will have been translated into successful regional management committees, so that this annual, pre-Christmas Brussels horse-trading will be a thing of the past.

3.43 pm

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): It is a pleasure to be back in this little club of ours—the annual fishing debate. We have some new members this year. I especially enjoyed the thoughtful contribution from the hon. Member for Na h-Eileanan an Iar (Mr. MacNeil), and also the contributions of the hon. Members for Hartlepool (Mr. Wright) and for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Goodwill). I commend the latter for his generous comments about his predecessor. When I heard that Lawrie Quinn had lost his seat, I mused on the fact that it would deprive us of our annual update on the life and times of Mr. Arnold Locker. I am delighted that we have not been deprived of that, although I am distraught to hear that Mr. Locker has hit hard times. I look forward with some anticipation to next year's instalment, when I hope that his fortunes will have taken a turn for the better.

This is one of the least febrile of the fishing debates that I have attended. It has been much less fraught and heated than some of those we enjoyed in years gone by. There are perhaps a couple of reasons for that. First, I give the Minister credit for the fact that when he went to Brussels with the UK delegation last year, for the first time in my experience he managed to take with him—metaphorically, if not literally—the fishing interest. He was much better at listening to and taking on board the views of the fishermen who were then in Brussels. As a result, they obtained a much better deal, which has better support from the industry.

Perhaps one of the reasons why we are less hard on the Minister this year than in years gone by is that he is not responsible for the industry's most immediate and pressing concern: the cost of fuel, which is becoming a real difficulty for many fishing boat owners in my constituency whose boats operate on the very margins of profitability. I do not yet know—I can only wonder—the effect of the Chancellor's reference in the pre-Budget statement to increases in duty on red diesel. I never quite understand how the red diesel rules work in the fishing industry, but if there is any such effect, the situation will only get worse. Even if there is no such effect, the situation will not get any better. I contrast that, as other hon. Members have done, with the situation in France and Spain, whose Governments have been able to give their fishing industries some support by one means or another.

I reiterate my concern, which I expressed to the Minister in an intervention, about the contract for search and rescue helicopters, one of which is based at Sumburgh airport in my constituency. I am now due to meet the director of the Maritime and Coastguard Agency tomorrow—the meeting had been scheduled for 13 December, but I then discovered that the contract was due to be placed on 12 December—and I shall put my concerns directly to him then. However, I can tell the Minister and the House that my concerns are very real.

There are unresolved issues about the suitability of the aircraft, but I return to the point that I also made to the Minister that it is essential that the terms and conditions of the existing staff are transferred when the new contract is awarded. It is the skill, courage and expertise of the crews of those helicopters that is vital. The reason why that is of such concern to the fishing industry in particular is that barely a month goes by in my constituency without a fishing boat getting into trouble and ending up being towed into Lerwick harbour, and the helicopter at Sumburgh, Oscar Charlie, frequently plays a crucial role in the rescue. If we do not get that contract right, I very much fear that the commencement of these proceedings in future years will feature even more tales of loss of life and injury.

I want to say a few words about the cod recovery programme, which has been with us for a number of years. Of course, on one side of the equation is the reduction in effort and on the other is a growth in cod stocks. We have met our targets on the reduction of effort. That has been an exceptionally painful process, especially in heavily fishing-dependent communities such as Shetland. I have lectured the Minister on the reduction in the Shetland white fish fleet in the past, so I shall spare him it today. The reduction has been massive, but there has not yet been any substantial evidence of a recovery in the stocks of cod. However, I enter the caveat that all hon. Members have applied today—which is, of course, that exceptionally wobbly science seems to be associated with fisheries.

I remind the Minister of the point that I made to the hon. Member for Hartlepool: there seems to be some evidence of a good recruitment of young cod along the east coast of the United Kingdom. That is not unknown; there was a similar situation in 1996, or perhaps 1995. Unfortunately, as a result of the fishing practices at the time that involved smaller mesh sizes, especially for the nephrop sector, the immature class was slaughtered. We now have a window of opportunity, albeit a small one. The spawning grounds with immature cod must be identified and protected, because this might be our last chance. We can only speculate on the impact of climate change on cod stocks, but if we have the opportunity to improve the situation, we must not allow it to pass.

I add my voice to those of other hon. Members who have said that this is a point at which we should be reviewing the cod recovery programme. We must examine the targets that have been set. Is a 30 per cent. increase in the spawning stock biomass year on year realistic or achievable? Is the time frame in which we should achieve the targets realistic? Should we now be considering a more evolutionary approach?

When we review the cod recovery programme, there must be a central role for the regional advisory councils, especially the North sea regional advisory council. The Minister must be aware that when the RACs were set up, they were greeted with a degree of scepticism—I think that he used the word "cynicism" earlier, but I hope that "scepticism" is nearer the mark. It is fair to say that the jury is still out on RACs in fishing communities and the fishing industry. However, there is a need to nurture the RACs for the benefit of those of us who hope for a regional or decentralised structure of fisheries management.

I was most concerned to hear today from the lobby from the Scottish Fishermen's Federation and the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations that the November meeting of the North sea regional advisory council was not given the figures on which the Council will make its judgment in December. There was not even an oral report to the Council from the Commission. If RACs such as that for the North sea are ever to do the job that the Minister and I would like them to do, they will need rather better treatment than that. I suggest that the first step towards giving them better treatment and improving their standing and stature would be to task them with the review of the cod recovery programme in the North sea.

I want to say a few words about black fish landings. I note that the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) has returned to the Chamber, so I caution him about the terms in which we all should speak about the matter. It is exceptionally difficult to make estimates about the situation—it is like proving a negative. The problem is more acute in different parts of the country at different times of year due to the circumstances that arise because of different quotas that are set. Any bold or sweeping statement will almost inevitably be out of date by the time that it is made, yet will be damaging to the wider interests of the fishing industries of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Goodwill: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the two Shetland-based fishermen who pleaded guilty to landing illegally 7,600 tonnes of fish in Denmark without declaring it to fisheries officials, fixing log sheets and making £3.4 million in the process could be described as being involved in black fish?

Mr. Carmichael: I have no difficulty in saying that that would generally come under the term of black fish landings. The hon. Gentleman refers to the Altaire case, which I have followed closely for obvious reasons as both gentlemen in question are my constituents.

In the Altaire case, the criminal justice system and the confiscation procedures have been rigorous and have been followed. If that case is cast up to the Minister when he pleads our case in Brussels, he can point to our criminal justice system and confiscation procedures and say, "We have been rigorous. We have made our policing work." If there is an absence of similar cases in other jurisdictions within the United Kingdom, that should not be taken as evidence of their not having a problem; rather, it should be evidence of the fact that they are less rigorous in policing fisheries. I asked the Minister about that not long ago in Department of Environment, Food and Rural Affairs questions, and he has spoken about it. I hope that the case in my constituency and that in the constituency of the hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby will be taken as evidence of the fact that we are rigorous in our policing and that such cases are not necessarily indicative of any wider problem.

It has long been my view that we are among the most enthusiastic of enforcers of fisheries law. I remember discussing that with the hon. Gentleman's predecessor, who took the same view. Having worked in the criminal courts as a solicitor and having acted in many fish landing cases, I have a great deal of sympathy for many of the skippers who get caught out. Very often, it is the result of mere sloppiness. On occasions, it is because the nature and complexity of the fisheries regulations with which skippers are expected to comply is such that it would be barely safe to set to sea without first completing an LLB; people need to be qualified lawyers before they can be expected to find their way around the full range and complexity of the regulations. However, I did not come across many solicitors queuing up to go to sea during my time as a practising solicitor—indeed, I have not come across many since I came into the House. That might be why cases continue to arise.

The Minister finished his speech more abruptly than I thought he would. I had hoped that he would come on to say a few more things about the upcoming Council. Again, I echo the comments of other hon. Members about the fishing year. I commend Commissioner Borg for being prepared to say that he will consider it. Along with that—this thought came to my mind as I listened to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell)—we should revisit the question of multi-annual quotas. No matter what point in the year we pick to set the quota for the next year, it still leaves the industry able only to plan one year ahead. I know of no other industry that would allow its businesses to organise things in that way. There has to be a longer-term vision for the industry, especially when—hopefully—stocks across the border are more stable. That will allow for proper financial planning, which, frankly, is next to impossible as things stand.

I should also pay tribute to Commissioner Borg for his performance as commissioner, which is infinitely to be preferred to that of his predecessor. I was privileged to lead a delegation of fishermen from Shetland and Orkney to meet him in April—I suspect that I would not have got within a country mile of his predecessor—and he was open with them, he engaged with them, he listened, and he was sympathetic. That is a significant advance. He has undertaken to visit Shetland, or the northern isles, in the course of next year, and I hope to see him. I know that he will be most welcome. I am delighted that Ross Finnie will be visiting Shetland next week to take the soundings of the industry. I pay tribute to the way in which Mr. Finnie, my colleague, has taken the time and trouble to engage with, to listen to and to advance the case of Scotland's fishermen.

The proposal to which we have not given sufficient attention is that of days at sea. As I understand it, the proposal of the Commission, in the round, is a reduction from 108 days to 104. That in itself will be highly problematic for the white fish fleet in my constituency. The situation is even worse than it might at first have appeared. I am told that in the past year, fishermen in my constituency on white fish boats were able to take advantage of an extra 12 days that was made available to them. That was one day a month, as a result of the elective measures on administrative penalties. We still have the administrative penalties as part of the regime, but there is no question about the days that go with them.

When the Minister replies, will he tell me that he will give some priority to ensuring that the carrot-and-stick approach is still on offer and that he will not return home from Brussels without the extra 12 days? If he fails to do so, the white fish industry in my constituency will be left 16 days a year down from an already exceptionally low base. That threatens the viability of the more marginal boats in my constituency.

May I strengthen the resolve of the Minister on the haddock quota? It is proposed that there should be a 13 per cent. cut, which will cause severe hardship. I accept that some progress has already been made, but a 13 per cent. cut—an improved position though it may be—will cause exceptional difficulty. There are the difficulties of science, and the haddock supply highlights that better than almost anything else. Last year, on the basis of the data available to ICES, the spawning stock biomass for haddock was calculated at about 400,000 tonnes. At the EU-Norway talks earlier in the year, that same data was remodelled to give a spawning stock biomass of 280,000 tonnes. That shows the exceptional difficulties that one experiences when assessing the credibility of the science that is available on fisheries stocks. When the remodelled figures were produced, one could hear in Shetland the glee from Norway. There was no doubt that Norway's hand would be significantly strengthened in the EU-Norway negotiations.

My final substantive topic is industrial fishing. Like every other Member, I welcomed enthusiastically the closure of the industrial fishery this year. I note with exceptional pleasure the recommendation that there should be a zero total allowable catch for sand eel and pout. There is no doubt in my mind that industrial fishing of the sort that we have seen for so long is the antithesis of sustainable fishery. If evidence is needed of that, the Minister need not just have regard to fish stocks, where there has been an impact. Along the cliffs of Shetland and Orkney, the sea bird population has been decimated. I recall speaking to constituents on Foula earlier this year, who were broken-hearted given the way in which the breeding stock of the various seabirds has disappeared in recent years. Like fish stocks, breeding stocks for birds, once lost, are difficult to restore.

Hon. Members have suggested that, as president, the UK is in danger of playing too fairly. There has been talk of cricket—a game about which I know little and care less. I acknowledge that there is a balance to be struck when we assume the presidency, but we should not allow our role and fairness as president to damage our own industry and national interests. Instead of taking cricket as his model, may I commend to the Minister a splendid game that is played every year in my constituency on Christmas day and new year's day called the Ba'? [Interruption.] No, it is the Ba', and it is played in Kirkwall in Orkney.

Three hundred grown men—perhaps more—play a traditional ball game in which they take a ball from the market cross in the centre of Kirkwall either up the town or down the town, where the game ends in the harbour. It lasts for hours. When the Ba' went up on new year's day, it was almost dark. It is a tremendously spirited game that is keenly contested. Less generous observers have described it as a rolling breach of the peace. May I suggest to the Minister that, if he wants to train his officials, he could send them to take part in this year's Ba', rather than sending them to play cricket? They would be most welcome—I have no doubt that the fishermen in my constituency who play in the Ba' every year would be most interested and would give them the closest possible attention in the middle of the scrum.

4.7 pm

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): This is an important debate. In case people are wondering, I do not represent a fishing port, but my constituency is dependent on good-quality fishing stocks. We have good fish and chip shops in Chorley and good restaurants that serve quality fish. We also have good supermarkets, as well as Chorley market, where the stalls specialise in wet fish. My constituency therefore has a great history of selling quality fish. We must ensure that there are fishing stocks around the UK and successful fishing ports, so that fishermen can go out and secure the catches that my constituents need.

I have tabled early-day motions 945 and 1108, which express concern about illegal fishing and other fishing practices. The cost of illegal fishing is about £680 million. Spanish fishing vessels buy a flag of convenience from a landlocked country—other countries are involved, but Spain is one of the worst offenders—and use it to get round the rules on trawling, which is not acceptable. The country of origin does not take action against such usage, so the problem must be dealt with quickly, as it is a major burden for our fishermen. They are playing cricket—a great game—but while they play by the rules, other countries, especially Spain, abuse them. We must stop that. We expect the Minister to take action against illegal fishing and abolish flags of convenience.

Another problem is Spanish vessels putting out long lines and capturing sharks off the coast of Ireland, Scotland and Norway. That is a tragedy and is having a great effect on the sharks that used to live there quite happily. Spanish vessels put out a long line and, to get best value from it, the line can be out for weeks. Lines have even been known to be out for months. Not only does that devastate the shark stock in the area, but because the vessels do not come round often enough, half the catch is allowed to rot on the line and is eventually discarded. We must deal with that problem too.

I hope the Minister will take action. We know that the fishing vessels in question are Spanish. We know that marine experts in the United Kingdom are concerned, as are their Norwegian and Irish counterparts. We have heard a great deal today and we expect a great deal. Progress can be achieved. I know the Minister takes on board his responsibilities. When we go forward, I want to know that we will have a strong voice, a positive voice and a supportive voice for the fishing industry around the UK. We need to take action against other nations that are operating illegally.

I want the Minister to ensure that the good people of Chorley can expect Chorley market to keep selling a variety of quality fish that has been landed legally by fishermen around the UK, and to ensure that we have long-term fish stocks. That is what it is about—ensuring that we have a fishing industry for the long term. Let us not let other people plunder our stocks. Let us nurture them, and let us look after the fishing industry that has served us well for hundreds of years. Let us not lose that, and let us ensure that quality fish continues to come to Chorley.

4.12 pm

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): I welcome the full-day fishing debate and congratulate the Minister on having secured it with the Whips. It has given us the opportunity to listen to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) in full flight, and to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael), whose contributions to such debates are usually truncated, but on this occasion he managed to give us the full range of his extensive knowledge of the industry.

The debate also allowed us to listen for the first time to my hon. Friend the Member for Na h-Eileanan an Iar (Mr. MacNeil)—[Interruption.] That is the Western Isles, for the benefit of the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle). Na h-Eileanan an Iar is the parliamentary constituency. It is said that in the run-up to election night, I practised for some time in the expectation that we would win the constituency. Expecting to be challenged on its pronunciation, I am assured by my Gaelic friends that I managed to carry it off with reasonable aplomb, as though I had been doing it all my days.

We welcome my hon. Friend to the proceedings. He is, as far as I know, the only working fisherman in the House. He is also the only working crofter in the House. Some people in the Western Isles would say he was the only worker in the House. It is useful to have in our debates someone who has done the job, done the business—done the fishing that we debate and care about. All of us who represent fishing constituencies care about the industry. There is no prouder boast in politics than to say that one is a fishing MP. It is an industry to which we owe our dedication, not least because of the fatalities and casualties—the real price of fish, as the Minister rightly reminded us as the start of the debate.

I shall make five points of detail before drawing a few broad conclusions to reinforce some of the arguments that other hon. Members have made so expertly in the debate. First, as I have said to the Minister, I am concerned about the aggregation of white fish licences in the pelagic sector. The hon. Member for Chorley has discussed flagged boats, although I am not certain whether flags of convenience are the same in the fishing industry as they are in the merchant marine.

The pelagic fleet in England is very small and consists of only two boats, both of which are flagged and both of which are Dutch owned. Given that we are generally hostile to flagged boats, it is amazing that such interests always seem to come out on the right side of any decisions. I have never understood why that outfit has such lobbying power—perhaps it advances its arguments expertly or perhaps DEFRA officials listen especially acutely—but it has come out on the right side of a change in the pelagic sector.

I accept that there are other winners in the sector, but there are also potential losers. I know that the Minister will treat with great seriousness any change in regulation that might discriminate—no doubt unintentionally—against one fisherman as opposed to another, because the public purse has paid a heavy penalty for perceived discrimination in regulation. I hope that the Minister will examine the matter to see whether a measure can be found to ensure that all boats in the pelagic sector are given equal opportunities in the changes on aggregation.

Secondly, as the Minister has said, at a time of scarce fishing opportunities it is important to maximise any opportunities, so I am therefore puzzled by the western mackerel quota. After a few years of precautionary reductions, advice from the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea suggested that there was scope for a 15 per cent. increase in catch, but the Commission advises a 5 per cent. increase. Will the Minister elaborate on why that apparent opportunity has not been seized in a difficult year?

Thirdly, there is the question of who holds quota in the industry. It is self-evident that at a time of economic pressure on the industry, we must ensure that all available returns from fishing are kept within the fishing sector and, so far as it is possible, that no finance leaks elsewhere. Because of the downturn in the white fish sector, decommissioning and the huge pressure experienced by my constituents and many others around the coastline of Scotland and elsewhere, the banks inherited a substantial part of the quota. Of course, the banks did not fish themselves and rented out the quota to working fisherman, which represents a further leakage of returns from the industry.

Earlier this year, I joined a delegation from the producer organisations to visit the Royal Bank of Scotland, an organisation that has done incredibly well since I ceased to be its economist a number of years ago—I am sure that I helped to build the foundations for its future success. In conversation with the Royal Bank of Scotland, I argued that it is not stable in the medium term for financial sector institutions to own quota and make revenue from renting it to the industry.

I note with pleasure that the Royal Bank of Scotland recently sold its quota to fish-selling offices in Scotland. Personally, I would have preferred the quota to go the producer organisations, but none the less the quota is back within the fisheries sector. Some quota is still held outwith the fisheries sector, and people who are no longer working fisherman also hold a lot of it. Does the Minister have a view on whether it would be better consolidated with people who are pursuing a licence to fish, which would prevent the leakage of revenue out of the sector? Many other financial institutions still hold quota, and I also wonder whether the Minister has a view on that.

My fourth point has already been well made by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael), so I will not go through it again. However, I emphasise the importance of not cutting days at sea—an effort limitation—as a result of quota arrangements with Norway, because such a cut would be extremely prejudicial in the medium term. The Minister did not mention that point in his initial remarks, so perhaps he will let hon. Members know his attitude to potential restrictions on days at sea as a result of the negotiations.

Finally, I turn to fuel costs. At the Fisheries Council earlier this year, before the UK took over the presidency, the vast majority of fishing countries expressed concern about fuel costs, and the Commission was asked to investigate the possibility of fuel price protection for the fishing fleet. Other fishing fleets have some degree of protection; France has been mentioned. After his latest oil tax hike, the Chancellor of the Exchequer expects to have £12 billion in revenue from the North sea. Next year, he may even surpass in cash terms the all-time record for that set by Lord Howe in 1984. I was with a delegation that went to see the Chancellor earlier this year, when we talked about this and other matters. In such circumstances, one might think that the fishing communities—the people who sail round the oil rigs and platforms producing this enormous wealth and largesse for the Chancellor—would be tiny beneficiaries of the enormous funds from the black black oil that are filling Brown's black hole. At the very least, the Minister should give a guarantee that our fishermen will not be at a competitive disadvantage in relation to other European fleets as regards fuel costs.

I move on to some general observations. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby returned to one of his favourite themes in trying to explain the importance of the priority of fishing in negotiations. He does that extremely well. Over the years of the common fisheries policy, some negotiating countries have attached an enormous priority to fishing. One thinks of Spain and, more recently, of the Dutch. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the famous memo written in 1971 by a Scottish Office civil servant, which says:

"In light of Britain's wider European interests they"— the Scottish fishermen—

"are expendable."

That memo was released under the 30-year rule. It was written in the course of negotiations that took this country into the then Common Market. The fisheries policy emerged from those negotiations at the very last minute. It should be said in defence of that nameless civil servant that he was not saying that the interests of Scottish fishermen should be expendable, but commenting bitterly on the attitude of the Foreign Office in the negotiations. Neither the Scottish Office nor the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, as it was then, could make any impact on the Foreign Office, which was obsessed by getting the agreement signed.

Mr. Hoyle: Obviously some of us are not old enough to remember that. Can the hon. Gentleman remind us who was in power at the time?

Mr. Salmond: Of course. The Conservative party was in power and the late Sir Edward Heath was Prime Minister. It should be said in his defence, as he is no longer able to defend himself, that he vigorously denied in this Chamber that fishing was given a low priority. Nevertheless, the facts are clear.

Mr. Weir: My hon. Friend observes that when the Conservatives took us into the European Union fishing was considered expendable. When he hears that the new leader of the Conservative party reportedly said that there are other things in Europe more important than fishing, does he fear that he may be thinking along the same lines?

Mr. Salmond: In the immortal words of the new leader of the Conservative party, "I agree". After listening to today's exchanges, I say that we should bring back Punch and Judy, which was infinitely preferable to the love-in between the Prime Minister and the new Leader of the Opposition. I am told that it is the new politics, but I predict that after three weeks there will be a public demand for the return of Punch and Judy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Angus (Mr. Weir) is absolutely right. The Conservatives have been, as it were, caught amidships by the transition of their fisheries policy. I see no anxiety on the face of the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson). He has obviously received some instruction since his earlier contribution. Of course, we all offer him our best wishes for retaining his post over these next few desperate hours. No hon. Member has travelled further in the interests of the fishing industry than he has over the past few years. Norway should be his next port of call, so that he can see the practices and procedures there.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby made the important point that priority was all, in regard to how countries deal with their fishing industries. I am not making a personal criticism of this Minister or his predecessor, both of whom, on account of their longevity in post and knowledge of the industry, have been substantially preferable to many of the Ministers who came and went before them. I have always found the present Minister most amenable and co-operative when listening to the concerns of hon. Members. However, it is a reality that fishing will never be an overwhelming priority for this country in the way that it is for other fishing countries within the CFP.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman says that fishing will not be an overwhelming priority for Britain, but the fact is that Britain has one of the largest fisheries—if not the largest—in the European Union. Fishing forms a much more significant part of our economy than it does in other countries of the European Union.

Mr. Salmond: As one would expect. None the less, the priority that it is given here is dwarfed by that given to Spanish fishing interests and those of other nations.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Na h-Eileanan an Iar said earlier, fishing is about 20 times more important to Scotland's economy than it is to that of the UK as a whole, bearing in mind their relative sizes, and sometimes it acquires 20 times the importance within the body politic in Scotland when the subject is debated. I think I am right in saying that the first defeat of the Scottish Executive in the Scottish Parliament was sustained on the fishing issue. It is difficult to imagine fishing severely denting, if not breaking, the Government in this House. None the less, it was the issue that mobilised people to defeat the Government in that first term of the Scottish Parliament. That shows the relative scale of the priorities involved.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby is the chair of the all-party fisheries group and has long experience of the industry. I am hoping to take part in enough of these fisheries debates to rival his record, but I think that he has made more contributions to them than the rest of us combined. He was absolutely right to make that point about priorities.

I want to talk about the rebate that was agreed at Fontainebleau. There have been stages in the history of the fishing industry at which it has been quite clear that certain countries—Spain, for example, but others as well—were building up their fishing fleets. I must caution the Minister not to give us the impression that the Irish decommissioning scheme will result in the Irish capacity following the pattern of the capacity in the white fish fleet in the United Kingdom. When he publishes the figures, they will show that exactly the opposite is the case. Ireland was another country that managed to exercise a substantial ability to modernise its fleet. In this country, however, our white fish and inshrops fleets have gone from being the most modern in Europe 25 years ago to being among the more elderly fleets over the piece, certainly in those sectors of the fishery.

One of the reasons for certain countries building up their fleets was their ability to access European funding. However, when we, as fishing MPs, argued for parity and comparability, we were told that under the Fontainebleau agreement, such funding would not be cost-effective because 87p in every pound would come off the UK rebate. Fishing was not the only industry that came up against a Treasury blockage as a result of the Fontainebleau agreement; the rebate has been a two-edged sword for many industries in this country. Perhaps now that the agreement is under negotiation, DEFRA will find a way of unlocking the funding that has long been available to other countries.

The Minister might say that this is not the time to build up capacity in the fleet. It might be the time, however, to make available grants for extremely fuel-efficient engines. That would be both environmentally friendly and extremely cost-effective at a time of high fuel prices. Other mechanisms apart from grants and help to build up capacity can therefore be used, and I hope that the Minister will explore them.

Lastly, one of the nubs of the debate has been whether it is tactically inept, as the Minister claimed, or strategically necessary, as my hon. Friend the Member for Na h-Eileanan an Iar explained and argued, to revisit the cod recovery plan. I take the Minister's point that he is in the middle of the current negotiations. Many of us would make the point to him, however, that if we are signed up to the 30 per cent. increase in cod, year on year, and if, as much of the scientific evidence accumulating tends to indicate, that will be extraordinarily difficult to achieve—if it is correct that conditions in the central North sea are by and large no longer amenable to cod as a stock—no amount of instruction from the European Commission will persuade cod to return in large numbers to that ground. That might or might not be the case, but there is a disconnection between the weight of building scientific evidence on this matter, the ICES and the cod recovery plan, which has apparently been set in total isolation, without reference to that body of evidence.

If we cannot meet that 30 per cent. target year on year, every single year, regardless of the state of other stocks, we will find ourselves negotiating from an extremely difficult position. Whether the haddock biomass is 300,000 or 500,000 tonnes, it will not matter in the sense that the quota suggested for haddock will be lower, not as a result of the haddock biomass but because of its attachment to cod in a mixed fishery. Many of us therefore think that revisiting the cod recovery plan—in public not in private, with the weight of accumulated scientific evidence taken into consideration—should be a strategic objective, to consider whether the variety of stocks can be detached from one another. Otherwise, I fear that Ministers will face an uphill battle for the foreseeable future when success is presented as turning a 20 per cent. cut into a 10 per cent. cut as opposed to allowing fishermen to exercise the full fishing opportunities that should be available to them.

If the Conservative party has been caught amidships in the transition of its fisheries policy, that is a great pity. No one, if they were starting from now, would have devised the common fisheries policy that we have at present. It is self-evident that any fishing country will have to embark on national and international agreements. It is also self-evident, however, that those that do so—the Faroes, Iceland and Norway—are a great deal more successful than those that are locked into the common fisheries policy. Whether or not the Conservative party is departing from national control, neither I, nor the hon. Member for Great Grimsby, nor the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland is doing so. Those of us who care about fishing have a substantial argument in that regard, and we shall continue to pursue it.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): It is an immense pleasure to speak once again in the annual fisheries debate, particularly as there are so many familiar faces. The debate has the feel of a reprise, with all the charm of familiarity if not the excitement of novelty.

I begin where the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond), who always speaks with great authority on these matters, ended—to say boldly that the common fisheries policy has been a disaster. We would be less than honest if we did not start from that point. It has been a disaster in terms of economics and ecology.

The economics are clear. The common fisheries policy is estimated to cost about 1 billion ecu a year, if we take into account Community and member state funding, to support production of something like 7 billion ecu a year. That does not make economic sense.

As for the effect of the common fisheries policy on our own industry, the story is a sad one. It is extraordinary that an island nation, a country with a seafaring history, can no longer harvest cod from the North sea. In the year of my birth, 1958—I know that it is hard to believe that I have reached the age of 47; Members must be asking "How can this callow youth possibly be 47?"—no one would have imagined that we would be in such a position.

Whatever statistics we consult, and according to almost any criterion, the CFP's performance has been disastrous for the British fishing industry. I plucked some figures from the Library. Not 47 but just 20 years ago, there were 22,224 fishermen in the United Kingdom. In 2004–05, there were 11,559. During those 20 years, the number has halved. As for the size of the fishing fleet, in 1985 there were 7,920 vessels; now there are a little over 6,500. Let us now consider employment in the fishing sector as a whole. A fall of 49.8 per cent., almost 50 per cent., has been disastrous for many east coast fishing ports, a number of which are no longer fishing ports. In many of those proud towns the deep sea fishing industry has all but collapsed, and on the Lincolnshire coast the fishing industry is in a sorry state compared with the position of earlier generations. It really is not good enough for the Minister to do what he will undoubtedly do when he sums up the debate and adopt the position adopted by his predecessors—one of simply managing the decline.

Mr. Bradshaw: If the hon. Gentleman had been courteous enough to be present at the beginning of the debate and had heard the opening speeches, he would have learned that the value of landings and the total value of our fishing industry have risen in the last two years.

Mr. Hayes: I was present for the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson), and I shall refer to it shortly. The Minister was clearly not as observant as he thought. Surely, though, he is not suggesting that the fishing industry is in better shape than it was 20 years ago. Surely he is not making that case.

Mr. Bradshaw: No; I am making a case for better-informed speeches and more courtesy in the House.

Mr. Hayes: It is hardly an example of discourtesy to point out that the fishing industry has declined—in my judgment, tragically and profoundly—over the past 20 years. As I said earlier in an intervention, I do not entirely blame the Minister or his predecessors. I repeat that, too often, they have gone naked into the conference chamber because they have not had the support of the Government as a whole for the prioritisation of the fishing industry. I do not think that the Minister should be so defensive. He is saddled with a job in which he cannot achieve the objectives that he may well wish to achieve because of the prevailing policy, the CFP, and the stance of his party. As his hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) observed, the fishing industry has never been a priority for the leading members of their party.

The industry's decline has left it, in certain respects, beyond the point of regeneration. Some parts of it have declined to a point at which they will never be able to regain the momentum and scale that they once enjoyed. That would be bad enough but, as I have said, we have also seen an ecological disaster. The latest information that we have, which has been mentioned already, is that cod stocks in the North sea, the Irish sea and west of Scotland are set to remain well below minimum recommended levels, and the advice is therefore zero catch. We are told that whiting stocks in the Irish sea are also thought to be in poor condition, and the advice is that there should be the lowest possible catch until the stocks have a chance to recover. It is true that haddock stocks are in rather better shape, as the Minister knows, but there is the difficulty of mixed fisheries, to which the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan referred.

No one would deny that the ecology of the North sea and the other seas around our coast have been severely damaged by the CFP, which for the great bulk of its life allowed industrial fishing, a subject that has been raised relentlessly in the House—it is raised every year when we have this debate. I am pleased that the end of industrial fishing seems to be in sight—it has finished temporarily and, we hope, for good—but it may be too late. Some species may have gone beyond the point of recovery. The effects of industrial fishing may have been so profound as permanently to change the ecology of the seas that have been fished so ruthlessly.

I know that there are other factors. Climate change, warmer waters and the movement of fish stocks have to be taken into consideration, but it is undeniable that the scandal of industrial fishing, which was allowed to continue within the framework of the CFP, has done untold damage and that the Minister and previous Ministers have been warned about that by hon. Members on both sides of the House, year on year.

The criticism above all others that I have of the CFP is that it has been crude in the way it has balanced fish stocks and fish take. The principal instruments of control have been restrictions on effort and discards. My hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire, to whose remarks I was listening attentively, suggested that there were better ways of dealing with the important balance between what we take from the sea and the maintenance of adequate and healthy stocks. He talked about the technical advances that have taken place and that can be applied, and about the need for effective science. We have heard again from the Minister that there is co-operation between the industry and the scientists and that needs to be built on. I would point to the virtues of closed areas, long recommended by some hon. Members. They were examined as long ago as 1998 when I was on the Select Committee on Agriculture, and advocated by me when I was shadow Fisheries Minister, prior to my hon. Friend's tenure. However, they were never pursued with the vigour that they should have been under the CFP. There are many ways in which the balance between fish take and fish stocks can be achieved. We have not got that formula right.

It appears that the best way of achieving that is by having more local control of fishing. I do not think that this has to be a dogmatic issue. We do not have to be myopic in our view of Europe to take that line. I think that most good Europeans now take the view that we need to deconstruct the CFP and examine other ways of dealing with the issue. On the grounds of practical considerations and evidence, we now need to think afresh and more laterally. We need to look at the experiences of countries that have had successful and thriving fishing industries, including the Faroe Islands, Iceland and Norway, and to learn from what they have got right. Our industry, restricted as it has been by the CFP, has, sadly, got it wrong. That is not the fault of the fishing industry or fishermen. It has happened because of what they have been obliged to do, often against their instinct and knowledge. There is nothing that fishermen like less than discarding healthy fish. It is against all that is in their bones and breeding. A more lateral and imaginative approach, which my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire articulated so well, is therefore desirable.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend. Whatever the Minister might think, I was an extremely good shadow Fisheries Minister, but my hon. Friend is better. He is a better shadow Minister than me on this brief. As has already been said, he has toured the country

Mr. Bradshaw: The world.

Mr. Hayes: Indeed, the Minister is right. My hon. Friend's travels have not been limited to the United Kingdom. He has toured the world in his efforts to learn about fishing, listen to those in the industry and help to articulate their concerns and hopes. He has devised a strong Conservative policy based on that knowledge. I therefore pay tribute to his work, which was reflected in his powerful contribution to today's debate.

I do not wish to detain hon. Members longer than necessary. The arguments have been well rehearsed and made. We could discuss the issues that my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire and others raised about, for example, investment in the industry. The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan was right to compare the modernity of the Spanish fleet with that of ours. However, those points have already been made.

We look to a new sort of politics and a new era. The political climate is changing. We may be on the cusp of something exciting with the advent of my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) as leader of the Conservative party. In that spirit, we need to be bolder about our vision for the future of fishing and how we can deconstruct the CFP. We need to be more creative and imaginative about reversing the decline over which successive Ministers have presided. I hope that the Minister will accept that suggestion, which is made with the best possible will, and take it seriously as he goes to the Council. I hope that he tells the representatives of the other countries there that enough is enough. We cannot gain by pretending that the current system will work. We must be honest enough to accept that we must start again and return fishing to local and national control.

4.47 pm

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): I am pleased to make a short contribution to this important debate. My constituency has a long history of fishing through the fishing port of Arbroath and the small communities of Auchmithie, Lunan, Usan, Ferryden up to Montrose and across the border into Aberdeenshire. The history of Angus's association with fishing is reflected in the fact that we have two of the oldest lifeboat stations in the country. As the Minister rightly said at the beginning of the debate, fishing is dangerous and many people have lost their lives in the fishing industry.

In Angus, the traditional industry concentrated on white fish, especially haddock, but was also involved with fishing for crabs and in fixed salmon netting.

especially at the mouth of the River Southesk. Much of that industry has now disappeared. A fishing industry remains, especially in the port of Arbroath, with a smaller industry in Montrose, but the rest of it has largely vanished over the years.

However, my area continues to have a strong fish processing industry, which is building up after many years in the doldrums. My hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) visited my constituency shortly after the general election to open an extension to the fish factory of R. R. Spink and Sons, one of the manufacturers of the world-famous Arbroath smokie. For many years, the smokie was effectively not made because there was not enough haddock to do so. That has changed in recent years and the industry is expanding and finding new markets. If hon. Members go to Sainsbury's in Victoria, they will find some R. R. Spink products on its shelves. I thoroughly recommend that they do that and enjoy an Arbroath smokie for their tea.

The hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Goodwill) said that the Czech Republic, Poland and other eastern European nations have no interest in fisheries. Interestingly, in recent years many Czechs, Poles, Slovaks and other eastern Europeans have come to work in fish processing factories in Arbroath, Aberdeen and many other areas. They are making a significant and very welcome contribution to Scotland's fish processing industry. So although the Governments of the Czech Republic, Poland and Slovakia may not have a particular interest in the continuing strength and health of Scotland's fishing and fish processing industries, many of their citizens do.

There are several issues that I should like to draw to the Minister's attention. In an earlier intervention, I raised with him the question—it has been mentioned by several Members—of the scientific evidence issued this year by the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea. As I pointed out, we were told that cod was in danger—no great surprise there—but that haddock stocks were healthy, as our fishermen have been arguing for many years. ICES had previously said for many years that haddock was in as much danger as cod, but our fishermen challenged that advice; they said that it was not true and that there were plenty of haddock in the sea.

When ICES scientists finally accepted that point of view and said for the first time that haddock were plentiful, that was a cause for some joy among Scotland's fishing communities, for whom haddock, not cod, is their main catch. They were very pleased that the scientists seem finally to have seen the light. Imagine their horror, therefore, when the ICES recommendations for quotas for the coming year were released a week later. It recommended a 40 per cent. cut in the haddock quota, which would be absolutely disastrous for the Scottish fishing fleet. I accept that during subsequent negotiations the recommendation was reduced to 13 per cent., but such a cut will still cause a great deal of difficulty for our fishing fleet.

The point is that there is growing cynicism among fishing communities. They feel that a game is being played with this scientific evidence. Scientists know perfectly well that whatever they recommend will be negotiated down by the Fisheries Council. They are deliberately recommending cuts that they know will never happen, and which are much greater than are needed. However, that causes huge anxiety in fishing communities and it is perhaps time for some transparency in this regard. This time of year is a rollercoaster ride for fishing communities. In the run-up to each Christmas—as ICES releases a report and we negotiate with Norway before the Fisheries Council meeting—a cloud of black depression descends on those communities. They do not know what position they will be in by the new year, or whether they will even have an industry by then. The recommendation for a reduction in days at sea will also create many problems for our fishing fleet, which is already working to very tight margins.

The situation is not helped by the fact that there is much misunderstanding of the nature of such scientific evidence. Greenpeace, an organisation that I normally have a great deal of time for, issued a report on fishing and, as a result of it, some Members—led, I believe, by the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker)—tabled an early-day motion calling for fish to be removed from the House of Commons menu. Among the species specifically mentioned was haddock, but as I have pointed out, haddock is plentiful. Such misinformation—the assumption that all species are in danger—is causing a lot of the difficulties. We have to accept that in certain areas there is a problem with some species, particularly cod. As has been pointed out, there is a lot of evidence showing that climate change, rather than overfishing, is responsible, and that the fish have moved to the colder waters of the north. In fact, the Icelanders and the Faroese do not seem to be having the same problem with cod.

Kelvin Hopkins: Is it not pathetic that a Europhile party should suggest that we try to reduce demand for fish by taking it off the menu in the House of Commons, when it will not challenge the problem of the common fisheries policy because it might reflect on their Euro-enthusiasm?

Mr. Weir: That is a fair point. The CFP is part of the problem, but I repeat that not all fish species are in difficulties. We should think about how to deal with that issue. Members will by now be aware that I shop in the Sainsbury's in Victoria—

Mr. Breed: The hon. Gentleman is after some free samples.

Mr. Weir: Well, I am ever hopeful, but I have had none so far.

I am great fan of fish. I love haddock and, indeed, most Scots will eat haddock rather than cod. But if one goes to Sainsbury's and opens the freezer—sadly, one cannot get fresh fish there, but perhaps the manager is listening—it contains plenty of frozen fish, but very little frozen haddock. There is a lot of frozen cod, in all shapes and forms, from nice pieces to fish fingers containing a little cod. However, we must also look at eating habits. If some species are in danger, we should point out that others are not. I appreciate that much of the cod in the freezer may not be sourced from UK waters, but that is still an interesting point.

I mentioned that fishing was once a strong industry in my constituency. I grew up in Arbroath and I remember a teeming port and fish market. It is all gone now. At the last count, only six or so boats operated out of Arbroath. However, as the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Wright) mentioned earlier—he is no longer in his place—many fishermen have diversified into other areas. In my area, the council has turned part of the port into a marina for yachting, and it is very successful. Many of the smaller fishermen have diversified into pleasure trips or chartering out their boats. However, they have run into another problem. Under the EU rebated fuels directive, there is an issue of how often the boat is used for commercial and other purposes. I took that matter up with the Inland Revenue and the particular problem that my constituents had was solved, but if we are to encourage fishermen to diversify such matters have to be sorted out, so that they do not jump out of the frying pan into the fire.

As the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) mentioned, fishermen are having great difficulty with the cost of fuel. They are working on tight margins and the ever-increasing cost of fuel impinges on those margins. For once, it is not the fuel duty that is the problem because they can use rebated fuel—red diesel. The problem is the cost of the actual fuel. To be fair, most of the recent rise in fuel prices has not been in fuel duty, but the fuel itself, and that has caused great problems. There is a large fish processing industry in my constituency, but the markets are mostly in the large urban areas. The cost of fuel works through the chain. The fishermen have to get their fish to market—very quickly in the case of fresh fish—to ensure that it is still saleable. In areas such as Na h-Eileanan an Iar, the lobsters and crabs that are caught have to reach the market very quickly and the cost of fuel is a huge burden on the industry. It is the same for those who make smokies and other prepared fish in my constituency. They have to get them to Sainsbury's in Victoria, and that adds to the cost. The cost of fuel has a serious impact on fishing and fish-related industries, especially those in rural areas, which is where most of them are situated.

The Minister was criticised for his cricket analogies by my hon. Friend the Member for Na h-Eileanan an Iar (Mr. MacNeil) and the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland. I do not share that complaint. Cricket is a growing sport in my constituency. A couple of years ago, Arbroath junior cricket club beat clubs from all over England to win the junior championship.

Mr. Salmond: My hon. Friend will note that Scotland's recent triumph in the International Cricket Council trophy means not only entry to the cricket world cup but that we are now 12th in the world.

Mr. Weir rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Fascinated as I am with cricket, the House will know that I would not necessarily argue that it should be in order in this debate. No doubt Members who want to pursue that interest will find that they can sublimate it through the all-party cricket group.

Mr. Weir: With that advertisement, I shall move back to fishing, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Fishing is important to my constituents, as it is to the whole of north-east Scotland. We are concerned about the proposals for a reduction in quotas and days at sea. I wish the Minister well in his negotiations in the Fisheries Council and hope that he returns with a good deal, otherwise our fishing communities will yet again face serious problems in the new year.

The hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes), who I was shocked to discover is even younger than me, mentioned the position of the CFP. The change in Conservative policy is interesting. The hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) did not deny the remarks attributed to his new leader, who, on the same day as he ditched Conservative policy on the Scottish regiments, also apparently ditched his party's long-standing policy on fishing. That is a shame, as the CFP is at the root of many of the problems. We and many Labour Members are opposed to it, and even the Liberals have concerns about it—I shall put it no higher than that. The CFP has been a disaster for Scottish fishing. It was brought in under a Conservative Government and Scottish fishing has suffered ever since.

5.2 pm

Mr. Douglas Carswell (Harwich) (Con): This is the first time that I have had the privilege and honour to take part in a fisheries debate. I shall use this opportunity briefly to place on record my view that it is time for the United Kingdom to withdraw from the European Union's common fisheries policy.

It is time for an independent British fishing policy made to suit the local interests of our country. I agree with much that has been said in the Chamber this afternoon. Much has been said with more eloquence than I could put it about the failures of the CFP. Members have told us that after decades of the CFP there are fewer fish and fewer fishermen, and that fishing fleets have dwindled. Other Members spoke about the high cost of the CFP to the taxpayer. By almost any measure the policy has been a failure.

In my constituency, there was a thriving fishing industry before the Europeanisation of our fishing policy. Before I was born, many people earned a good living from the sea, but that has almost all gone. The fish, the fishing fleets, the livelihoods have all disappeared. If I am honest, I must say that that happened under Governments of both parties. Something is fundamentally wrong with the way we manage fisheries in this country.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): In response to some of the sedentary comments made by Scottish National party Members, does my hon. Friend agree that any political party that has supported membership of the European Union or its forerunner the European Economic Community must take its share of the blame? That includes almost all the political parties represented in the House.

Mr. Carswell: I agree. I am here not to score points or to make cheap partisan political points, but to talk about what we can do to ensure that we have a proper fishing policy in the interests of the people who live on this island.

As was said very eloquently earlier, fish do not stop at arbitrary boundaries. Fish do not recognise arbitrary divisions on a map. That is certainly true, but by

[Mr. Carswell]

Europeanising member states' fishing policies and by pushing power away from member states and putting it into the hands of unelected, unaccountable quangos in Brussels, the democratic dynamic and the democratic scrutiny of policy have been removed. That is the fundamental reason why the common fisheries policy has failed. We can talk about the detail, the quotas and the changes that can be made; we can tinker and try to improve things, but without that democratic scrutiny, the CFP will always get it wrong.

It is said that that which no one owns, no one will care for, and the member states have lost ownership of their fisheries policy, so the people who are left caring for it are not accountable to the people whose livelihoods depend on the sea—fishermen. We need to push power away from the unelected quangos in Brussels and move it down not simply to the member state but beyond. Again, there is agreement about that. It is no coincidence that countries with successful, thriving fishing industries—Iceland and Norway—have retained their capacity to make their policy independently. They have much to teach us.

Policy should not be simply shifted down to member states as an end in itself, but as a means to the greater end of localising control. In Essex or Scotland, people could have local control over fishing policy in their areas, but the first step, the prerequisite, is to push control down to the nation state.

Mr. Salmond: Scotland is not a county; it is a country. Scotland already has control over its internal fisheries policy. What it does not have is the right to representation in international negotiations. Even if a Cabinet Minister is the Scottish Fisheries Minister, he will still be outranked by the Minister who is sitting by the Dispatch Box.

Mr. Carswell: I am well aware that Scotland is a country, not a county, so I thank the hon. Gentleman for that helpful intervention.

Our aim should be to localise control over fishing policy. I hope that, one day, I will take part in a debate much like this when a majority of hon. Members will agree that it is indeed time to leave the CFP and that we will vote to make that happen. I hope that we do so before it is too late and before we have finally ruined our fish stocks.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): First, I apologise for arriving late for the debate, but I was unavoidably detained. I did not wish any discourtesy to my hon. Friend the Minister or to the other hon. Members who have spoken. I want to say a few words about the common fisheries policy.

Luton, North is not a port—not too many trawlers ply the North sea from my constituency—but I work on the basis that an injury to one is an injury to all. Damage to colleagues who represent our fishing industry and those who work in it is damage to us as well, and we want to act in solidarity with them. The CFP has undoubtedly damaged the interests not only of the UK, but of all. Establishing a policy that leads to the depletion of fish stocks everywhere can benefit no one in the long run. With perhaps the largest fishing grounds in the EU, the UK has a role in preserving fish stocks and ensuring that they are maintained at proper levels for the benefit of not only the UK but everyone else in the EU and, indeed, elsewhere.

As fish stocks are depleted in EU fisheries, we go further afield and deplete fish stocks off the coast of Africa and elsewhere. That can benefit no one in the long run, so we must work collectively to ensure that fish stocks are preserved. However, that does not mean that opening fisheries to everyone would be the way forward. We should allow individual member states and countries to defend their fisheries so that they can ensure that their fishermen and economies benefit from them. Such an approach would benefit the world's fisheries in the long run.

We have undoubtedly lost jobs, fishing fleets and fish as a result of the common fisheries policy. Joining it was a mistake, so negotiating an opt-out, as we did with the single currency, would have been enormously beneficial to not only Britain and our economy, but the European Union in general.

I agreed strongly with much of what the hon. Member for Harwich (Mr. Carswell) said. Norway has large fisheries that go right up to the far north in the Barents sea and elsewhere. Norway has looked after its fish stocks. Although fish are capable of swimming from one area to another—they do not observe national boundaries—if I were a cod or a herring, I would probably choose to stay in Norwegian waters rather than British waters because I would stand a chance of living longer before being eaten or made into fishmeal. Nevertheless, the Norwegians have defended their fisheries better than we have.

I often say to the minority of Norwegians who want to join the European Union, "Given that you have enormous fish stocks that are being well husbanded and oil as well, why do you want to join because there is no doubt that the European Union would want your oil and fish, and it would not last very long if you did join?" People might challenge my view, but I have not received a good answer to that question during my many discussions with Norwegian colleagues—I am vice-chair of the all-party group on Norway. Perhaps the rest of the North sea benefits from Norway because as fish swim over boundaries, some of the fish that we catch today might have swum out of Norwegian waters, where the fish are well looked after.

Mr. Paterson: It might help the hon. Gentleman's argument if I say that 80 per cent. of Norwegian fish are caught in cross-border areas that are covered by the straddling stocks agreement. That shows that bilateral agreements between sovereign countries to manage stocks work extremely well.

Kelvin Hopkins: The hon. Gentleman's point suggests that there are ways of doing things that are more sensible than the common fisheries policy.

Only this week I was talking to friends from the Norwegian Government and the Norwegian embassy. They have had problems due to Spanish fishermen invading Norwegian waters. They have had to nudge the Spanish fishermen out of the waters to ensure that their fish stocks are not taken. Those fishermen know that there are good fish stocks in the area and that if they can trespass a little, they can get bigger catches.

The common fisheries policy is not sensible for anyone. We should not have joined it and it is most damaging to us. In the long run, I hope that we can withdraw from it and adopt a more sensible approach. I strongly believe that if individual member states were responsible for looking after their own fisheries and fish stocks, it would benefit not only those member states, but all the European Union and, indeed, all people who depend on having good fisheries. There will always be ups and downs if we carry on in such a way. I am pleased that there have been improvements in fish catches recently, as my hon. Friend the Minister said, but that is an increase from the low base that has arisen due to the common fisheries policy. Despite the increase, I suspect that we catch nowhere near the number of fish that we caught when stocks were plentiful.

I am not trying to put forward a nationalist or chauvinist view, but a sensible view. If we were responsible for our own fish stocks, it would benefit everyone in the European Union, including ourselves, our fishermen and our people who, like me, enjoy eating fish from time to time—regularly, in fact. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will bear in mind the general view among hon. Members that the common fisheries policy was a mistake and that we should move towards a world in which we are responsible for our own stocks. A more sensible approach would benefit not only Britain, but the European Union as a whole.

5.15 pm

Mr. Bradshaw: It may help if I remind hon. Members who were not in the Chamber at the beginning of the debate of one or two facts. Those in the Public Gallery and elsewhere who have listened to us might have the impression—the wrong impression, as most hon. Members with a great depth of knowledge of the industry know—that the industry as a whole is on its last legs and everything is a disaster. It is not. As I said, and as one or two hon. Members acknowledged, the nephrops sector, the processing sector, the shellfish sector and the pelagic sector are doing well. There are, of course, difficulties in some of those sectors where stocks have come under pressure, and I shall come on to that.

I start by addressing the comments of the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond), partly in recognition of the special and disproportionate importance of the fishing industry to Scotland. He and other hon. Members asked whether the role of the UK presidency will have a restraining effect on my ability, or that of the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight) and our officials, to negotiate in Brussels.

I think that the cricketing metaphors began before you were in the Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker. They related to how Ministers and officials negotiate in Brussels when they have the presidency. I can reassure the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael), who I gather is no cricket fan, that neither am I. However, I do play tennis and occasionally croquet. Perhaps that is why the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan described me as vigorous and ruthless, qualities that one may well associate with tennis on the one hand and croquet on the other.

Let me reassure the House that the fact that the UK holds the presidency does not prevent us from making strong arguments on the UK's behalf and in the UK's interest. I was grateful for the remarks of those hon. Members who follow such matters closely when they acknowledged that we have got a couple of pretty good deals for the UK in the past two years. As I said to the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes), that is part of the reason why, despite problems in some sectors, the economics of the fishing industry have improved slightly.

The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan and others raised the subject of grants and high fuel prices. As long as Labour are in power, the UK will not have short-term fixes for the problems of the fishing industry. We believe that the measures taken in France and Spain are illegal and we expect the Commission to take action against them. I can probably be more unpresidential about that in a month's time.

It will not be in the long-term interests of our fishing industry or the Irish fishing industry—I have spoken to the Irish Minister about this and he shares my concern—to allow some countries to develop what is undoubtedly an unlevel playing field. If we did not have a common fisheries policy, we would need to have lots of bilateral negotiations. One of the advantages of it is that we have a mechanism to enforce a level playing field. If the CFP is to retain its credibility, it is essential that that level playing field is enforced.

We are prepared to consider the suggestion by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan about modernising and helping the industry to develop engines that are more fuel efficient. There is no doubt that the likely long-term level of fuel price will have an impact on the industry. I am interested in long-term solutions, not short-term solutions that put off implementing more difficult solutions further down the road. I am sure that that is what France and Spain are harbouring up for themselves with the measures that they have taken.

I listened carefully to what the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan and other Members have said about the review of the cod recovery plan. I do not want to add anything to what I said at the beginning of the debate on that issue. At this stage in the presidency, a couple of weeks before negotiation, I would not want to announce that that is a policy that I would favour, but it is something that I am prepared to think about. If we fail to reach any agreement in December, which is always a possibility—the meeting is held in December in order to try to focus minds and to help to reach an agreement—there is always the possibility of a fall-back position, not only for us but for other member states and the Commission.

I hope that no one will think that there will be any simple and easy solutions to the stock of cod in the North sea. My hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Wright) raised an important point—it has been raised with me by several other hon. Members—in asking whether climatic change may be having an impact. I sense that there is a temptation on the part of one or two Members who have taken part in the debate to believe that climate is playing a major role so that we can make the decision to abandon cod. I am not in the position yet where I am prepared to contemplate what some people have called a "sod the cod" policy—I do not know whether that is unparliamentary language,

[Mr. Bradshaw]

Mr. Deputy Speaker. That would be a disaster for biodiversity in the sea. Some point to what has happened across the Atlantic off the grand banks of Newfoundland, where cod has pretty much disappeared and has been replaced by a valuable prawn fishery. The long-term impact of the big change in the ecosystem is unknown to anyone. All of us who care about sustainability and the marine ecosystem should be concerned to ensure, if it is at all possible, that we maintain that system as far as we can and protect it from harmful human activity.

Mr. Salmond: Ecosystems change. Fishing activity changes as do fishing patterns. I made the point recently during a meeting that we used to have a strong shrimp fishery in the Fladden. It is now a massive prawn fishery. That change has taken place only during the past 10 or 15 years. Not all changes are bad. Can the Minister give us a time scale on his welcome agreement to consider the idea of a grant for fuel-efficient engines, which would be a significant response to the enormous pressure of high fuel costs on the fleet? Is there a time scale, and how will he make the information available to right hon. and hon. Members?

Mr. Bradshaw: I was going to refer later to the issue of the future European fisheries fund, which was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool. However, as the hon. Gentleman has mentioned it, I will deal with it now. The time scale is not in our hands, as we depend on an agreement for a replacement to the financial instrument for fisheries guidance—FIFG—scheme, which runs out next year.

The House should be aware that something that concerns me about enlargement—largely, enlargement has been in the UK's strategic interest—and should concern others who care deeply about sustainable fisheries is that the process has shifted the balance of view within the EU away from the conservationist approach. Substantial pressure is being exerted by the southern European countries, in alliance with the eastern European countries, to reopen some of the issues that we managed to close in the 2002 reform, a reform which I think was welcomed by right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House. It phased out, for example, the iniquitous awarding of grants by some countries to build new boats, to which several hon. Members have referred.

It would be a retrograde step if we were to renege on those earlier commitments made as a result of the 2002 reform. One of the possible compromise areas is that we may be able to reach agreement with enough countries to maintain the ban on the use of grants to build new boats, while considering initiatives to improve fuel efficiency and to help the environment. That will not be in our hands. We had hoped to get an agreement on the new European fisheries fund during our presidency because we were worried that any agreement would be a step backwards from the 2002 reform, which we are not prepared to contemplate. We would rather wait until we are liberated from the presidency so that we can advance that argument more clearly.

Mr. Hayes: Before the Minister moves on from white fish—he may be about to—to what does he attribute the decline of cod? Is it the record of industrial fishing and the effect that that has had on the ecosystem, is it environmental change and the changed water temperature, or is it the result of inadequate conservation measures? Have these factors affected cod stocks? Once the Minister has given us the reason, perhaps we shall be able to come up with a proper solution.

Mr. Bradshaw: One of the challenges for Governments around the world who wish to establish good and sustainable fishing policy is that there is uncertainty about the science. The overwhelming bulk of science, with the exception of a small number of mavericks, accepts that the singie biggest impact on cod is over-fishing. There is no doubt about that. A role may be played by climate, and the hon. Gentleman is right that there has been a northward shift in species—it is not just cod that we are talking about—as we are now catching more exotic species off the south-west coast. However, just because climate is impacting on a species, it does not necessarily mean that one can fish it harder and solve the problem. That is not the case—proper controls are needed on over-fishing, otherwise stock will be written off.

Mr. Salmond: If over-fishing is the explanation, how, in a mixed cod and haddock fishery in the same area of the sea, can there be a record low for cod and a record biomass high for haddock? Would over-fishing not affect both species, rather than just one?

Mr. Bradshaw: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that it is not a record high any more. That was the case a year or two ago, and it was dependent on a single year class. Recruitment to such a class can make a huge difference to the biomass. I do not want to go into further technical detail, as I do not wish to detain the House much longer, and I wish to respond to many points made by hon. Members.

Mr. MacNeil: Has the Minister not made the case for environmental effects by highlighting the appearance of species in the south that are not usually seen there? Does that not underline the argument that the cod are migrating north?

Mr. Bradshaw: I was not arguing that there was a lack of evidence that the cod were migrating north. Fisheries scientists would agree that an overwhelming body of evidence suggests that over-fishing has had the biggest single impact on fish stocks. We need to inject some reality into our debate. Hon. Members who have participated today tend to represent fishing communities, but there are other interests that wish to protect the marine environment. While it is important that they talk to their fishermen, they should also talk to environmental organisations and the scientists who wrote the Royal Commission report, which is an important international report on the state of our seas in this country and elsewhere. They will find that there is general global consensus, with the exception, as I said, of one or two mavericks, that the single biggest impact on fish stocks is over-fishing by human beings.

Mr. Hayes: I am grateful for the Minister's measured response to my initial intervention, which led to further interventions. If over-fishing, or what I described more generously as inadequate conservation measures, is responsible, can we conclude that the approach of the CFP, which has largely been about effort management and discard has been ineffective for conservation? Should we not have looked long ago at the proposals advocated by my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson), including technical changes, closed areas and a different approach to spawning grounds, as they would have been more effective? According to the Minister, what he calls over-fishing is the problem, but is that not the responsibility of the CFP?

Mr. Bradshaw: I shall come on to that later. The hon. Gentleman is wrong to suggest that the existing system is based on effort control. In fact, that is the system advocated by the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson). There is some effort control in the current system, but it is mainly based on quotas. There is a debate about whether that is the best system, and we will discuss that later.

The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan asked a number of specific questions. I shall write to him about the aggregation of licences, as I am afraid that I have not been able to obtain the information that he requested. However, to repeat my earlier assurance, this is an issue on which there has been consultation, and the industry has been involved. He asked about the proposed increase in the mackerel TAC, and wondered why there was a difference between the scientific advice and the increases of 15 per cent. and 5 per cent. That TAC was the result of the EU-Norway agreement, so it is now fixed. Some TACs—I shall come on to haddock in a minute—are officially agreed in December, but are effectively dependent on the EU-Norway agreement. That TAC was the result of the negotiating of Norway, which did not want an increase in the TAC at all.

On the question whether quota should be released by banks, we are, as the hon. Gentleman knows, undertaking a major review of our quota management system and we are involving the industry in that. I should be pleased if the hon. Gentleman wishes to bring a delegation of industry representatives to talk to me or my officials to feed in their views as to how that should be taken forward. That will be an important element in putting our fishing industry on a sustainable footing in the long term.

As we have said on numerous occasions, we will resist the proposal for a cut in days for the white fish fleet. However, as I said earlier, other countries have not taken the same amount of pain as we have on cod recovery. They have not even provided the Commission with proper data. There may be scope for further tightening of the cod recovery regime in respect of such countries. Any impact that that may have on the UK fleet will, I hope, be more than offset by the very large TAC increase that we expect to get for prawns. I shall come to the details of that shortly. I know it is of great interest to the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members.

I mentioned the issue of fuel costs.

Mr. Carmichael: The Minister will recall that in my contribution I mentioned the 12 days at sea that were obtainable as a result of the administrative penalties elective measures. Can he confirm that he will fight to retain those days, which are extremely important?

Mr. Bradshaw: I will check up on that and write to the hon. Gentleman. That relative increase was also connected with the reduction in the effort on cod that we had already made. We persuaded the Commission and that has not changed, so I do not anticipate any problem but I will check with officials after the debate and write back to the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland also raised the subject of the search and rescue helicopter. I addressed that at the beginning of the debate. The Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset, had discussions with his ministerial colleagues in the Department for Transport about that today. I am sure he will be happy to update the hon. Gentleman at an early opportunity.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland mentioned frontloading, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). Frontloading is a horrible piece of jargon that means trying to do as much work as possible before the December Council so that one does not end up dealing with a lot of detail at the last minute through days and nights and inevitably making mistakes.

Mr. MacNeil: I thank the Minister for his time. If any concerns emerge over the next few days about the change of the helicopters at Stornoway and in Orkney and Shetland, may I count on the Minister to be diligent within the Government in representing the concerns, particularly those of fishermen?

Mr. Bradshaw: It may be more useful for the hon. Gentleman to go through the Scottish Executive, but if he wants to make representations to me about the matter, of course I will pass them on to ministerial colleagues.

I accept the criticism made by my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby and the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland that there has not been as much frontloading this autumn as we had hoped, but there has been some and it has made a difference. For example, we have managed to secure agreement on technical measures in the Baltic, which will be significant for the long-term sustainability of the fisheries there. We have also had useful policy discussions on principles in advance of the December Council. The timetable for the science reporting, the Commission's proposals being made, and Governments, industry and other bodies being able to make representations about those has improved somewhat.

As was pointed out, we are not in a position this year where we do not have an EU/Norway agreement. We have one, and it is a very good agreement. I congratulate my officials, as I should have done earlier, on their hard work. Still acting as UK fisheries officials under the presidency, they have also had to deal with difficult technical negotiations in Brussels involving all the other 24 member states. Some hon. Members have covered fisheries issues for a long time in the House. It would be a brave hon. Member who described himself as an expert in the UK fishing industry, but to become an expert in a few months on the fishing industries of 24 other countries is quite some feat, and my officials have done an excellent job.

Sir Robert Smith: The Minister has pointed out that the negotiations are detailed and technical. Does he therefore feel that there is scope to involve fishermen's representatives on the EU side in those negotiations? The Norwegians directly involve their fishermen in their negotiating team, and bringing the expertise of those who must cope with whatever is agreed with Norway into the negotiations might help to bring fishermen onside and engage them in the process.

Mr. Bradshaw: There is always scope to consider whether we can do a better job involving the industry and other interested parties early in the process, which is one of the rationales behind our putting the matter on the agenda, getting it debated and obtaining a commitment from Commissioner Borg to publish in April an action plan on the review of the fisheries year.

The hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) has mentioned including representatives of the fishing industry in the negotiating team, but I am not a great fan of sub-contracting such negotiations to anybody. In September, we failed to reach an agreement on conservation in the Mediterranean, and one of the member states with a strong interest had its industry representatives in the salle d'écoute watching proceedings. Such negotiations are supposed to take place between Ministers and behind closed doors, so that horse-trading can go on. Such negotiations can be reduced to Ministers with no officials, which happened in the sugar negotiations in the week before last. It sometimes takes political will and courage to reach an agreement on a difficult subject, and it is not necessarily sensible to conduct negotiations with people who have a strong interest one way or the other looking over one's shoulder or even watching on television.

It is important that we keep in close touch with our industry, and there has been a sea change in DEFRA's approach. The Scottish Executive Environment and Rural Affairs Department has also improved its act in recent years on involving and informing the industry. It works closely with the industry to establish the industry's priorities and to deal with the Commission's proposals as they are made, so that we can get the best possible deal for the UK industry that is also based on sustainability.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland also raised the issue of industrial fisheries. The current recommendation is for a continued closure, which has been welcomed on both sides of the House, with a monitoring catch of around 25,000 tonnes and a review part of the way through next year—25,000 tonnes might sound like a lot, but last year's TAC was 660,000 tonnes. The new quota is a huge improvement, and it has been a long-term aim of successive UK Governments. It is nice that it has been achieved, although I wish that it had happened a little bit sooner.

The hon. Member for Argyll and Bute also raised a couple of constituency cases and said that he would write to me about them, and I look forward to those letters.

The hon. Member for Na h-Eileanan an Iar—

Mr. MacNeil: Good try.

Mr. Bradshaw: Perhaps he will give me a pronunciation lesson.

Mr. MacNeil: Na h-Eileanan an Iar.

Mr. Bradshaw: That was too fast. If this will not offend his constituents too much, I will call his constituency the Western isles.

Mr. MacNeil: I thank the Minister for attempting the pronunciation.

Mr. Bradshaw: The hon. Gentleman is very gracious.

Like a number of other hon. Members, the hon. Gentleman raised the importance of nephrops and prawns. Twenty years ago, few people would have said that the UK nephrops industry would easily be the most valuable part of our fishing industry in 2005. The health of the nephrops stock, which is being exploited sustainably, is one reason why the fishing industry is doing well. Thanks to some chivvying by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan, other SNP Members and others, we have established fisheries science partnerships to evaluate the evidence, which the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan always said was there, on an increase in the TAC. My officials have been very successful in doing that this year. The Commission proposes a 39 per cent. increase in the TAC in the west of Scotland and a 31 per cent. increase in the North sea. I am sure that that will be welcomed by fishermen and their parliamentary representatives in all constituencies with an interest in the matter. It will also be of great interest to Northern Ireland Members, who are no longer present, because some Northern Irish fishermen fish in the west of Scotland.

We are also arguing for an increase in the TAC in the Irish sea. As there has not been a similar fisheries science partnership there, the Commission does not propose any increase; indeed, it proposes a decrease. We will argue against that. It does not make sense to argue that the stock in the west of Scotland is doing well enough to allow a 39 per cent. increase but say that there should be no increase at all in the Irish sea. We will also argue for an increase in the plaice TAC in the Irish sea. One of the reasons why the Commission is recommending a reduction, despite the fact that that stock is in extremely good shape at the moment, is that it argues that there is a relationship with cod. We do not accept that. We will argue for a 20 per cent. increase, which will be of great benefit to the industry, not least in places such as Fleetwood, where people feel that they have had a very raw deal in recent years.

The hon. Member for Angus (Mr. Weir) made some sensible remarks about scientific evidence. I have already described some of the ways in which we have been working with the industry. In recent years, we have spent about £5 million on fisheries science partnerships. That has not only helped to improve the quality of the science but enabled us to negotiate better deals for sectors of the industry. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that certification is important. He is right to point out the error of whoever suggested that haddock should be taken off the House of Commons menu. Anyone who knows anything about fisheries could have told the person who made that decision that haddock is in good shape. Indeed, we should be encouraging people to eat a lot more of it. I sometimes wish that my kith and kin in the south of England had the same taste for haddock as people in the north and in Scotland. It would help cod if we southerners were automatically served haddock with our chips instead of cod—although most of the cod that we eat comes from sustainable fisheries in other parts of the world.

My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby, as well as talking about front-loading and other issues that I have already covered, asked about the grant for safety in his part of the world. Following the meeting that we had, I made it clear to the regional development agency that there were no reasons why that money could not be granted. It is now up to the RDA to decide whether it thinks that it is value for money. As far as we are concerned, it is free to make the grant. The subject was also mentioned by the hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Goodwill).

The hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) was one of the few Members to talk about the importance of enforcement. I welcome that. If I can put it in terms that Members who represent fishing communities will understand, if we are to negotiate good deals in Brussels and elsewhere, we must be able to convince the Commission that our system is solid and sound. It helps us to get good deals if we can produce evidence that we are enforcing the rules.

That leads me to a point that the hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby made when he talked about a case in his constituency. I hope that he would not expect me to comment on any individual case, but I stress to him and to other hon. Members that the illegal catching of black fish is theft, pure and simple. It is theft of a natural resource and theft from other fishermen. If we do not get a handle on it, we will lose out in negotiating good deals for the hon. Gentleman's constituents and those of other Members. Such catching will also lead to a depletion of stocks, and we all know what that means. It is bad for the fishing industry as a whole, bad for the environment, and bad for the communities that the hon. Gentleman represents. I hope that all hon. Members would stand up for good enforcement and support the very important work done by our enforcement officers, many of whom are former fishermen, in difficult and sometimes very hostile circumstances.

Mr. Carmichael: May I reinforce the point to the Minister that we should make more of the fact that we do enforce the law rigorously, and that the penalties imposed by our courts are among the highest in the European Union? Will he make that point to our European partners?

Mr. Bradshaw: Yes. I do not have them on me, but I would commend to hon. Members the tables showing the relative enforcement and fine levels. The figures are not quite as black and white as the hon. Gentleman suggests; we are about middling in how well we are doing. We are doing a lot better than we did in the past, however. The hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby said that he doubted whether French fishermen who had committed a similar offence to those committed in his constituency would be similarly fined. I am sure that he is aware, however, that France has recently been fined €20 million for not enforcing fisheries policy correctly, and that the threat of a €56 million fine every six months hangs over that country—this involves the national Government—if it does not get its act together. So the idea that we are the only country that punishes people or follows the rules is not strictly true.

Mr. Carmichael: May I take the Minister back to the Altaire case, which we spoke about earlier? Not only was a substantial fine imposed—just short of £100,000, I think—but about £1 million was recovered under the confiscation procedures set out in the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002. That involved a civil recovery. Will the Minister ensure that such money is taken into account when these so-called league tables are being drawn up? It, too, constitutes a penalty.

Mr. Bradshaw: I will certainly draw that to the attention of the officials in my Department who are responsible for drawing up the league tables.

I associate myself absolutely with the comments made by the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall. The improvements in enforcement that we have made over the past few years have resulted in better compliance, and I hope that Members on both sides of the House will agree that that can only be good for the long-term sustainability of the fishing industry.

The hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby also said that some parts of the industry, such as the shellfish sector, are doing very well. I have also hinted at that, as have other hon. Members. The hon. Gentleman extended a kind invitation to me to visit his constituency. I have actually been there—I am sorry, it was before his time—but I shall certainly bear his invitation in mind. I happen to love lobster, and I only regret that the best lobster that his fishermen catch go straight to Spain. I believe that we as a nation could do better in adding value to our fisheries' product. Near to my constituency in south Devon, the best crab in the world and very good lobster are caught—I had better not say that it is the best, but I am sure that it is as good as those caught in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. It is a terrible shame that 90 per cent. of them are exported straight away, alive, in saline tanks to France and Spain. I believe that we could add some value to those products in this country, as well as encouraging our own consumers to buy and eat more of them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool made an excellent contribution. It is great to have a Member for Hartlepool who is obviously interested in the fishing industry on behalf of his constituents. I hope that he will not be embarrassed by my saying that he asked a number of perceptive and intelligent questions. Widening the scope of fisheries grants is already one of our objectives, and will be as we consider the reform of the European fisheries fund, to which I referred earlier. He also asked about the action plan on the simplification of fisheries rules. As I said in my opening speech, we expect Commissioner Borg to say something about that at the December Council, and the matter can then be taken forward. We have taken that issue very seriously, and it is an area in which we have worked closely and productively with the fishing industry.

[Mr. Bradshaw]

My hon. Friend the Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith) reminded the House of the tragic events in her constituency involving the drowning of a number of Chinese cocklers. I commend her for her excellent hard work on drawing the issue to the attention of my ministerial colleagues and me at the time, and on her persistence in trying to ensure that decisions will be taken and measures put in place to prevent similar accidents from happening in the future. As I made clear to her when she last came to see me, I have said for some time that the Government would support the local sea fisheries committee if it wanted to bring forward a regulating order. I also acknowledge, as she did in her remarks, that the Government's proposed marine Bill will provide a good opportunity to modernise fisheries legislation, including giving powers to manage local fisheries in the way that she describes. I hope that she and other hon. Members who are interested in the marine environment will take an active role in the development of that Bill.

Mr. Paterson: I echo the Minister's comments about the hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith), who, after that terrible incident, did a tremendous job in bringing the problems to the attention of the House and the Minister. She also played an active part in the gangmasters legislation. Conservative Members would certainly support a licensing regime in Morecambe bay and measures to help the sea fisheries committee.

Mr. Bradshaw: That is very helpful.

On the question that my hon. Friend the Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale asked about abandoned vehicles, I am afraid that I do not have a definitive answer yet, but I have sought one. My officials' advice was that we thought that local authorities were responsible, but that there may be an issue as to whether that applies if vehicles are in the middle of the bay.

Geraldine Smith: The answer that was given to my parliamentary question was that local authorities were normally responsible, but that because such vehicles were in the middle of the bay, they were not responsible.

Mr. Bradshaw: Perhaps that is another issue that we can deal with in the marine Bill, if we need to wait that long.

Mr. Carmichael: Wishing to be helpful, it sounds to me as if that responsibility ought to be the Crown Estate Commissioners', and if the sea bed is being littered with such wrecks, I hope that the Minister will take them to task in the strongest possible terms.

Geraldine Smith: I haven't tried them.

Mr. Bradshaw: My hon. Friend says from a sedentary position that she has not tried them. The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland has given her a constructive idea, which I am sure that she will follow up, and perhaps I can help her on that, too.

The hon. Member for North Shropshire made a number of suggestions based on the experience that he has gleaned on his extensive travels. I hope that his travel has been carbon-offset—there has certainly been a great deal of it. Now that climate change is to be a major priority for the Conservative party, too, I am sure that its travel will be carbon-offset. I am not sure that I would necessarily reach all of his conclusions, however.

It is important that we learn from good practice in other countries, but it is not always easy to make direct comparisons between countries such as New Zealand or Iceland, which basically lie surrounded by large expanses of ocean, and the United Kingdom, which is close to the rest of the continent and has fisheries that we have traditionally shared with other countries, long before the common fisheries policy and the European Union were invented. We have had wars with some of those countries over fisheries, which hon. Members often forget. If there are no rules or means for negotiation and agreement in relation to the exploitation of such a valuable resource, and no institution to apply those rules when some countries do not obey them, to which I referred in relation to the huge fines being levied on France, all sorts of new challenges are faced.

I am still not convinced by the attraction of the hon. Member for North Shropshire to the Faroese system, which relies solely on effort control. I do not want to bore the House again, but were we to introduce effort control in the North sea now to protect cod, no fishing would go on, because the effort would have to be set so low, because cod stocks are so low, that fishermen would not be able to catch any of the other species. In the highly complex, mixed fishery of the United Kingdom, we need to be cannier about our system. As I said, a review is going on, and a mixture of effort control and quota management, perhaps with individual tradeable quotas, might be the answer, although we have not made a firm and fast decision on that yet. We need to be a little more imaginative and canny, as we have a more complex fisheries reality than some of the countries to which he referred.

Mr. Salmond: I know that the Prime Minister's review, for instance, mentioned the background to individual transferable quotas approvingly, but before proceeding along those lines will the Minister consider the concentration of the industry that has resulted in just about every fishery where the system has been introduced? Will he reflect on whether it is compatible with the family-based companies that exist in many areas on the coastline?

Mr. Bradshaw: That is an important point, and we will certainly include it in our discussions with the industry. The hon. Gentleman may wish to talk to officials about it, or bring others to discuss it with them. That need not happen, however. Iceland, for example, has introduced measures to protect small boats. In Iceland there has been consolidation between the big boats and the small boats; it is the boats in between that have tended to go. However, there are mechanisms to prevent the consolidation to which the hon. Gentleman has referred, and to protect fishing in vulnerable communities. We have said repeatedly that those are two of our objectives. We do not want a system that resulted in a few big boats in small fishing ports that then died out.

I take issue, slightly, with the way in which the hon. Gentleman reported what was going on in the Faroes. I am advised by officials that the official view of the Faroese Government is that the cod stock is not in very good shape at present. It is as low as it was before its collapse in 1990, and is considered to be "at risk of reduced reproduction". The official view of the Faroese Government is that effort has remained too high, and will have to be reduced.

I do not think that there are simple solutions to fisheries management. I think that there will always be difficulties and challenges, because there are difficulties and challenges in all systems. One aspect of the debate that I welcome is the fact that, by and large, it has been so informed, and that views have been expressed that can be fed into the Government's review of quota management. I hope that Members on both sides of the House will continue to show an interest.

I now come to the thorny issue of the common fisheries policy, which was raised by members of all parties, including mine. Unlike the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan, I had hoped that a new Leader of the official Opposition committed to fighting the Government on the centre ground and to jettisoning eccentric policies based on dogma—the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron)—would have taken the opportunity to send his fisheries spokesman to the House to announce a rethink. The hon. Member for North Shropshire did not quite do that. Like some of his hon. Friends, he repeated his party's official commitment to trying to withdraw the UK unilaterally from the CFP, a policy described by the right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) as "unwise and undeliverable". When the former Conservative party chairman Chris Patten was asked about it, his response was

"Is this the real world?"

However, I thought that the hon. Gentleman repeated his party's commitment in slightly less arduous and categorical terms than usual at the end of his speech. I hope that there is still room for movement.

I have studied the quotation from The Times to which the hon. Gentleman referred, and other comments that the new leader of his party has made about the issue. They are slightly different from a commitment to trying to negotiate unilateral withdrawal from the CFP. The hon. Member for Witney told Anatole Kaletsky that his party wanted to "reverse EU control of fisheries policy."

I suggest that there is a significant difference between the two policies. It could be argued that regional advisory councils represent a partial reversal of control. I hope that that becomes more of a reversal.

Kelvin Hopkins: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Bradshaw: In a second.

The hon. Member for Witney said that he did not believe that the CFP had worked well. I do not think that any Member believes that it has worked well, but we do believe that it is reformable and should be reformed. As the environment editor of The Daily Telegraph wrote recently in an excellent book on fisheries, if the CFP did not exist something rather like it would have to be invented. The hon. Gentleman went on to say

"We can do more to conserve fish stocks through local management and bilateral agreements."

Kelvin Hopkins: In a sense, my hon. Friend has half-answered the question that I was going to put. He elides the two issues—the irrationality of the common fisheries policy, which is undoubted, as it is not a sensible policy, and the difficulty of withdrawing from it. That may be a politically serious problem but one cannot argue that the CFP was and is still a sensible policy.

Mr. Bradshaw: I just said that I did not think that anyone in the House would describe the CFP as having always been successful. It has got better. The reforms of 2002 have been a significant improvement. As I said, in the past two years, they have led to growth in the fishing industry in this country, to increased incomes, and to better landings for most species, but there is always room for improvement.

I do not think that the official Opposition's policy is sensible. I hope, and expect, if the hon. Member for Witney is serious, that they will review it. A policy that is futile is never a sensible policy. As my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) acknowledged, it would not be possible to withdraw from the common fisheries policy without withdrawing from the European Union. We would have to persuade every other member of the EU to support us—the decision would require unanimity. Repeatedly, when we have asked the Opposition to name a single country—not all of them, but a single one—that would support the UK's withdrawal from the CFP, they have not been able to do so. That indicates the futility of their policy. It is never sensible for a party that has ambitions to govern, as the official Opposition now apparently do, to hang on to futile and ridiculous policie

Mr. MacNeil: Is not Norway a great example of how to deal with the common fisheries policy? I am dismayed to hear the Minister say that the CFP is not ideal but we are stuck, that is it and we are just going to accept it.

Mr. Bradshaw: I did not say that. I said that it is important that we reform the common fisheries policy. It is being reformed and it can be reformed further. I also quoted a gentleman who is not naturally a Labour supporter, who writes for The Daily Telegraph and who wrote an important book on fisheries a year or so ago. He went through all those arguments, listened carefully to the views of the official Opposition and concluded that, if the CFP did not exist, we would have to invent something like it and that, if we want to manage our fisheries sustainably off the north-western coast of Europe, with many nations with differing fishing interests in a complex mixed fishery, we have to have some institution where those deals can be made and enforced.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman generously, I think, given the position of his Government, has said that the common fisheries policy has not been a success and is in need of reform. How would he measure success? What criteria would he use to judge whether it had become successful? When does he expect it to become successful? Is success the regeneration of the British fishing industry, not to the degree that we have seen in the past couple of years, but to a significant degree? Is success a proper balance in the ecology of the North sea and the other seas around us? What is his measure of success and when does he expect to bring us the good news in a fisheries debate that it is a success?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am reluctant to give the hon. Gentleman a history lesson on the common fisheries policy but, briefly, the biggest mistake that it made was to coincide with the so-called "gadoid outburst". The hon. Gentleman nods, so he knows what I am talking about. That led to a massive expansion of the fishing fleet not just in this country but in all the EU countries, often, as hon. Members have pointed out, funded by the taxpayer. That was a huge strategic error. We have been paying the price for that ever since.

The reform that we agreed in 2002 was significant. It did not go as far as we would have liked. The UK constantly pushes for more reforms, but the ultimate test of whether the CFP is a success is to get our fisheries on to a sustainable level for the long term. That is the objective of this Government, and I do not think that having a futile debate about the legality of withdrawal from the CFP is the way to do it.

Sir Robert Smith: The Minister when he opened the debate recognised that there would be far more efficient management of this complex fishery if only those countries that had a direct interest in fishing in the North sea were involved in the final negotiations. However we reach it, that has to be the goal—that we manage the fishery in the North sea with those countries that have an interest in the North sea and not with countries that no longer have an interest.

Mr. Bradshaw: That is exactly why the UK has supported the regional advisory councils. We want their role to grow. By the end of our presidency, we will have successfully established two or three. However, the hon. Gentleman should not get the impression that landlocked countries such as Hungary play a major role in the Fisheries Council. The other member states would not take it well if Hungary or another landlocked country without any obvious interest in fisheries scuppered a deal. They tend to go with the presidency compromise.

Mr. Salmond: We must have international agreements on fisheries and therefore there will be a common fisheries policy—that does not follow. However, does the Under-Secretary agree that the most telling aspect of our debate was the uncharacteristic silence at key moments of the speech of the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson)? He is in a difficult position because he has to interpret the mind of the new leader and perhaps he does not know it yet. None the less, the silence spoke volumes.

Mr. Bradshaw: In this case, I welcome the silence because I interpret it as a sign that there may be change afoot.

Let me briefly respond to the points of my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) about illegal fishing on the high seas. That is an important issue and the Government take it seriously. He may already know that Britain chairs—indeed, I chair it—the High Seas Task Force, which comprises six nations: New Zealand, Canada, Australia, Namibia, Chile and Britain. It has the specific job of examining the problem. We will publish our report in March with a concrete action plan for further measures, including flagged vessels and problems such as bottom trawling.

Next year will be an important year at the United Nations for international fisheries, because it will review its fisheries agreement. The UK should play a leading role in trying to wake up the world to the seriousness of what is happening on our oceans.

Earlier, I mentioned the impact of human beings on the oceans. There is no doubt about that impact if we examine the international position. Overall, stock levels are about a 10th of what they were 100 or more years ago, because humans are getting much better at catching fish. They are much more efficient, build bigger boats and catch more fish. On the high seas, there is weak governance and little control, little reporting and little, if any, enforcement. We all need to address that.

Sustainable fisheries and the protection of our marine environment go hand in hand. I hope that most hon. Members agree that we have had a useful and constructive debate. If I failed to respond to any specific points, I will write to hon. Members.

Mr. Hoyle: I am sorry that the Under-Secretary believes that it is a bit of a trial to give way now when he has given way throughout his speech to hon. Members of all parties. I asked him about shark fishing and the problem off Ireland and Scotland. Will he look into that in future?

Mr. Bradshaw: I shall happily do that. I looked a little pained when I gave way because my tone of voice made it obvious that I was about to finish, yet my hon. Friend still intervened.

Mr. Hoyle: Some of us had to wait longer than others.

Mr. Bradshaw: I welcome his intervention. That is it. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

PETITIONS

Mohan Singh

6.8 pm

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I wish to present a petition on behalf of 10,000 of my constituents in support of action by the British Government and the Indian Government on the murder of a British citizen, Mohan Singh, one of my constituents who recently went to India, where he sought to oversee a house building project. While eating in a café in the Punjab, he was stabbed to death by several people and we still do not know the identity of his murderer. I shall travel to India next week to try to help with the investigation.

The petition states:

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the British Government to work with the Indian Government to help bring the perpetrators of Mohan Singh's death to justice and to ensure that the necessary measures are in place for British citizens to travel safely to India.

The Petitioners further request that the House of Commons urge the Foreign Secretary to take steps and work with his counterpart in India to help with investigations and bring the perpetrators to justice.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Visitors' Visas (Right to Appeal)

6.9 pm

Keith Vaz: I wish to present a petition signed by 2,500 people nationally about the proposals, which have now been shelved—permanently, we hope—for abolishing the right of appeal in visitors' visas cases. Following assurances by the Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality that the appeal rights will remain, the petition is, to some extent, redundant. However, it has been signed by 2,500 people who were concerned by the proposals.

The petition declares:

That the right of oral appeal and current definition of family members for visitors' visas and the right of appeal for overseas students are very important to Institutions of Higher Education as well as to ethnic minorities throughout the United Kingdom.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government not to abolish the above mentioned rights and definitions.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Council Tax

6.11 pm

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): This is a petition of the residents of the villages of Farnham Common, Farnham Royal and Hedgerley, in the Beaconsfield constituency, in respect of the council tax protest campaign.

The petition states:

The residents declare

That the year-on-year inflation-busting increases in council tax are causing hardship to many and take no account of ability to pay; and that the proposed property revaluation and rebanding exercise will make an already flawed system even worse.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons vote to replace council tax with a fair and equitable tax that, without recourse to any supplementary benefit, takes into account ability to pay from disposable income. Such tax to be based on a system that is free from any geographical or politically motivated discrimination, and that clearly identifies the fiscal and managerial responsibilities of all involved parties.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Supermarket Regulator

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watts.]

6.11 pm

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to discuss the need to introduce a supermarket regulator. I am delighted to see my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North (Malcolm Wicks) on the Front Bench tonight.

British food retailing has world-class status, and in the past decade it has become innovative, dynamic and diverse. However, supermarkets have been allowed to expand to such an extent that they are now damaging competition and consumer choice. The campaign to highlight this trend has been ongoing for some time, as we have witnessed the devastating effects of the parallel and aggressive expansion of the four supermarket chains: Tesco, Asda, Sainsbury's and Morrisons. Of these four, one towers above the others.

When Tesco moved into the convenience store sector, record closure rates were reported for independent local shops. Last year, 2,000 small convenience stores closed because it was impossible for them to compete.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend recall that about two years into our first period in government, the Competition Commission looked at the implications of the concentration in the grocery and supermarket sector to which he refers and produced a rather benign and bland report? Was he surprised at those conclusions and does he think that very different ones would be reached now?

Keith Vaz: I was indeed surprised at those conclusions and, as I will discuss later, I am glad that the Office of Fair Trading has decided to look again at this issue following the representations made by so many interested parties. That is the right way to move.

The future competitiveness of the UK grocery market is becoming completely distorted, and I want to argue tonight for the introduction of an independent regulator that can fill the gap that clearly exists. None of the current watchdogs or interest groups seems to have sufficient power or teeth to regulate the market, and it is clear that something needs to be done.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this important debate and I agree that it is very important that we have a regulator. We asked the big four supermarkets to sign up to a voluntary buyer's charter to help farmers, but they refused to do even that: no wonder we need this debate.

Keith Vaz: My hon. Friend is right. I find it extraordinary that the supermarkets have not signed up to the buyer's charter, because it would be sensible and fair. My hon. Friend is not alone, because the Forum of Private Business, which represents 25,000 independent retailers in the UK, claims that 20,000 independent stores have disappeared from the UK high street since 1997 – a rate of 50 a week. The chief executive of the FPB, Nick Goulding, has said:

"The supermarkets' – and in particular Tesco's – dominance of retail trade is a catastrophe for the high street right here, right now in virtually every town in Britain"

We have to ask whether we want to see the UK retail landscape completely redrawn and the high streets dominated by supermarket Metro convenience stores. No more butcher, baker and candlestick maker, just Metros, Metros and more Metros. The character and integrity of our town and city centres are being disfigured for ever.

Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the problems with the growth of the Tesco Express and Metro convenience stores, which drive out small convenience shops, is that the consultants' reports that the planning committees see before they make their decisions bear no resemblance to reality? The reports make wild assumptions about the low level of spend, but as soon as the Tesco store opens, there is a high level of expenditure and that drives out and closes the small convenience stores. Does my hon. Friend agree that something needs to be done to tighten up those consultants' reports, perhaps through audits after planning decisions?

Keith Vaz: My hon. Friend is right. He highlights an important area that also affected the establishment of the Tesco store in my constituency in Hamilton. Promises were made and experts produced before the planning permission was granted, but as soon as it was granted they all disappeared. Local residents are left to face the inconvenience.

The Office of Fair Trading has been wavering on the dominance of supermarkets in the grocery sector. The OFT's goal is to make markets work well for consumers. Markets work well when there is vigorous competition between fair-dealing businesses. When markets work well, enterprise flourishes. In regard to supermarkets, that is clearly not the case. It has been difficult to make the OFT look into the matter and provide an adequate response and analysis of the situation. Indeed, the OFT has often been dubbed "Only Fair to Tesco".

In August, the OFT came to the conclusion that there was no need for supermarkets to be subject to a full review by the Competition Commission, which conducts in-depth inquiries into mergers, markets and the regulation of the major industries. The evidence presented by, among others, the Association of Convenience Stores was not considered to be compelling enough to warrant a further investigation. It is commonly agreed that there were large holes in the OFT's explanation for why it had decided not to refer the grocery market to competition regulators. However, on 28 October, there was a welcome U-turn. After heavy criticism, the OFT reconsidered its decision and said that it would consider investigating the four giants of the grocery market.

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall) (LD): I welcome this debate and the hon. Gentleman's suggestion of a regulator. In 1998, I published a report on the supermarkets and quoted from the BBC's "The Food Programme":

"Three growers voiced their anxiety about what they regard as supermarket dictatorship. One thought that supermarket strength is so great, it's time for the appointment of a regulator."

That programme was on BBC Radio 4 on 8 March 1998. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that matters have got considerably worse in the past eight years?

Keith Vaz: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right: things have got considerably worse. Evidence has been produced, which is why there is a need for action.

As well as the organisations referred to in the hon. Gentleman's report and the ACS, several other interest groups have growing concerns about supermarket expansion. The ACS is backed by consumer and campaign groups from the women's institute to Friends of the Earth, and even the New Economics Foundation. On 2 August 2005, the ACS launched its formal appeal to the competition appeals tribunal, arguing that the OFT did not give proper consideration to the evidence presented to it, especially on below-cost selling and the effects of buyer power on the grocery market. At the end of this week, the ACS will respond to the OFT with further detailed evidence covering all grounds—enough in my view and that of others to warrant a thorough investigation into the grocery market.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this important debate. I am a modest and humble member of the all-party group on small shops. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the group is conducting an inquiry entitled, "Britain's high street 2015"? The year 2015 is the 200th anniversary of the battle of Waterloo, and Napoleon said that England was a nation of small shopkeepers. Does the hon. Gentleman share my concern that there will be tens of thousands fewer shopkeepers in 2015 as a result of the behaviour of the supermarkets?

Keith Vaz: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. I do not often visit his constituency, but sometimes I pass through Kettering on my way to Leicester when the M1 is blocked, and over the 18 years since I became a Member I have seen the changes there. Unless we take appropriate action the situation will get much worse.

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing such an important debate. He is presenting the case very well, and I support what he has said. To add weight to his argument, not only small shops suffer from the buying power of supermarkets; suppliers often suffer, too. Dairy farmers receive a farm-gate price for milk that is below the cost of production, yet supermarkets benefit from a huge mark-up when the milk is on their shelves. Suppliers as well as shops are suffering.

Keith Vaz: The hon. Gentleman is right of course. A little later I shall discuss the position of suppliers and how supermarkets, due to their power, have been able to exert unnecessary pressure on them.

The ACS response, due this week, is expected to present a number of conclusions and suggestions for remedies for the imbalance in the market. They include easier confidential complaint mechanisms for businesses; a ban on price flexing; transparency of buying prices; a market share cap; implementation of local competition policies; and initiating an independent proactive retail ombudsman to investigate supermarket dealings with suppliers.

Under UK law, the function of the competition appeals tribunal—CAT—is to hear and decide appeals and other applications or claims involving competition or economic regulatory issues. The CAT is a specialist judicial body, with cross-disciplinary expertise in law, economics, business and accountancy. It is currently investigating the Association of Convenience Stores v. Office of Fair Trading, case number 1052/6/1/05. At a case management conference on 1 November 2005, and in the light of the OFT's indication that it wanted to withdraw its decision of 3 August, the OFT decision was formally quashed by the tribunal and referred back to the OFT, with a direction to reconsider the matter and make a new decision.

I turn to the issue of Tesco, which is by far the largest player in the market. Tesco controls more than 30 per cent. of the overall British grocery market, worth £80 billion. One in every eight pounds spent in retail is spent in Tesco. By 2010, the firm's share of the grocery market is predicted to be 45 per cent. Tesco has the largest market share in 67 of the 120 postal districts in the country, while Asda controls 23, Sainsbury's 14 and Morrisons 13. In 14 districts, Tesco has more than 40 per cent. of the market. In five towns, it has more than 45 per cent. of the market. That is a rather substantial domination, and we have not seen the end of it.

It would be wise to examine Tesco's expansion plans in yet more detail, as Tesco has accumulated enough land to develop up to 180 new stores and it plans to expand abroad. Tesco will open 150 stores abroad in the second half of this year. Its overseas operation, from Japan to the Czech Republic, now accounts for 20 per cent. of its turnover.

Of course it is important to note Tesco's contribution to the development of popular retailing in the United Kingdom in the past decade. Sir Terry Leahy, the chief executive of Tesco—a world-class entrepreneur—has led the retailer's extraordinary success. Sir Terry's management method and clarity of thought has created a modern-day company that leads the UK market and ranks No. 3 in the world.

Shopping at Tesco—I declare an interest in that I shop at Tesco—and other supermarkets is a wonderful experience. We all love the convenience of having a wide selection of choice under one roof, but there is a line to be drawn between innovation and dominance and between competition and monopoly. Sir Terry's visit to Bangalore in a bid to launch Tesco into the Indian market is worth noting. I admire his enterprise in seeking to sell basmati rice to the Indian population. I suppose that that is the retail equivalent of selling sand to Saudi Arabia.

It has been suggested that Tesco's expansion abroad is a masterstroke to draw attention from the controversy of the domestic market, so that it can continue to expand. The corporate affairs director of Tesco, Lucy Neville-Rolfe, told MPs last month that her company had grown

"because we have helped really transform the lives of ordinary people. We have helped to bring prices down; we have helped to improve quality and range; it is great service."

Not everyone agrees that that is for the good.

Many manufacturers and distributors have told me that it is complicated and very costly to sell their products on the shelves at Tesco. Rather hefty charges are levied to sell any product that is not its own brand. Other distributors are left with no choice but to pay those fees if they want to sell their products.

Some have argued that the payment of up-front fees amounts to corporate backhanders. If the distributors do not pay for their goods to be sold, they are not sold. If Tesco does not buy them, the distributors are out of business. Having taken on the goods and paid the listing fee and the commissions that Tesco and others demand, the suppliers then have to pay Tesco to promote their own goods. Given the lack of transparency, it is very difficult to issue formal complaints and suppliers are left absolutely powerless.

David Taylor: My hon. Friend rightly pays tribute to the quality, range and price successes that Tesco has enjoyed. He noted that Tesco is the third largest retailer in the world, but does any other retailer in that top 10 have such a dominant position in its home market?

Keith Vaz: That is an easy question: the answer is no, not as far as I am aware. It is a unique form of domination. As hon. Members have noted this evening, the relationship between the dominant supermarket, Tesco, and the suppliers is a source of concern. In today's Financial Times, it is reported that supermarkets rely on their suppliers for free finance to fuel their growth. An investigation into the accounts of supermarkets in today's paper shows that the amount owed to Tesco's creditors has risen by £2.2 billion in the past five years, compared with a £700 million increase in stocks, giving Tesco £1.15 billion to help to fund its business. There are no written contracts between supermarkets and suppliers, which means that supermarkets have the power to refuse stock at their convenience. Those in the bakery industry have suffered especially greatly.

Mr. Breed: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that dominance is unfortunately not illegal? Abuse of dominance is illegal, but it is difficult to prove that there has been abuse under the present system.

Keith Vaz: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. Suppliers are terrified about making a complaint. Ministers say to me, "Where is the evidence? Bring it on." However, suppliers do not want to complain because if they do so, they will not be able to sell their goods in the shops, which will create problems for their businesses.

Mr. Hoyle: The dominance of supermarkets keeps the farming industry on edge all the time, so its survival is touch and go. It is the same story for the beef and dairy industries. They are teetering on the edge because they cannot get sustained long-term agreements.

Keith Vaz: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. This is not just a question of the nervousness of the industry and its inability to plan, because as suppliers try to meet the margins that Tesco and others demand of them, they will cut costs, pay lower wages and standards will decline, which is unacceptable.

Mr. Michael Foster: I am sure that the Minister fully appreciates that my hon. Friend is being generous with his time. Dairy farmers face a problem because as they try to compete and produce at a cost that is effective for them, the size of their herds is growing at a phenomenal rate. A former chairman of the National Farmers Union from my constituency tells me that a dairy herd of 1,000 cattle is not unheard of. A herd of such a size means that huge environmental problems must be dealt with, including just disposing of the huge quantity of manure that the cattle create.

Keith Vaz: My hon. Friend is right that the knock-on effect on the farming and dairy industries is profound, which is why it is important that the matter is reviewed.

Small shops are the very life blood of our community. They provide opportunities, jobs and vital services to local people. Small businesses are finding it difficult to compete on price to offer the variety of goods that citizens want. I quote Mrs. D. Raj, who owns a business in Rushey Mead in Leicester, which is in my constituency. She said:

"While supermarkets may be creating jobs on the one hand, they cause businesses to lose their livelihoods so that they can make profits. We have to make sure that Leicester offers variety" of choice to consumers.

Consumers are spending on average 25 per cent. more on identical goods in supermarkets than they would on the street market. The street market is a popular option among my constituents because they enjoy the personal service. The street market allows one to get to know people, enjoy that personal relationship and get to know the traders. One can also get products in the packaging and size that one wants, whereas everything in supermarkets is pre-packaged. Pre-packaging limits choice and is wasteful.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) raised the problem of out-of-town shopping centres. I shall cite one example tonight. Tesco and its development at the Hamilton district shopping centre in my constituency. My predecessor as Member of Parliament for Leicester, East, Mr. Peter Bruinvels, and I were united by our concern about the way in which the Hamilton estate was developing. Tesco wanted to build a superstore. As soon as it received planning permission, it dug in its heels and delayed other shops from being established. It wanted to dominate; it did not want a partnership. A review of the planning laws, which my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) mentioned, would prevent people and businesses from operating in such a way and disrupting the process for others.

David Taylor: Until this evening, I thought that my hon. Friend had nothing in common with his predecessor. However, in relation to town-fringe stores, is not it the case, as my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) said, that the picture painted in the planning application especially in economic terms is often seriously adrift a year down the line? The jobs that the supermarket said it would create may well be in place, but jobs will be lost, not just in the small shops that might otherwise have sold the goods concerned, but in other shops in the town centre, because people are less likely to go there to buy their newspaper, have their shoes repaired and so on. Let us have a post-planning permission audit in economic terms as well.

Keith Vaz: My hon. Friend is right. That would be most helpful and welcome, and perhaps one of the things that the independent regulator could do.

What would the independent regulator do? He or she would be able to take independent confidential evidence, which Ministers cannot do because every day they have to deal with both sides of industry. It is important that we have a figure and a body that is seen to act with integrity when dealing with such situations. The supermarket regulator could consider loyalty payments, slotting fees, which are charged to buy shelf space, fees charged for artwork and the repackaging of products, and the way in which supermarkets like to manage the public statements of their suppliers.

A supermarket regulator could consider the concept of "reasonableness" in the contract terms that are agreed if any are between the suppliers and the supermarkets. The renegotiation of those contracts should be determined absolutely by price and quality of service. The president of the National Farmers Union Scotland, John Kinnaird, said:

"The public silence amongst supermarket's suppliers speaks volumes. It is of absolutely no surprise that the OFT has received virtually no evidence of breaches of the Supermarkets Code of Practice. Many of the companies that we contacted required repeated assurances from us that any comments they made would never be attributed to them. That kind of fear within the food supply chain is totally unacceptable. An independent regulator is required to police the trading environment. It needs power to act".

This morning I met the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Sutcliffe), who is responsible for consumer affairs. He would have responded to the debate but, as the House knows, he is in Brussels because we hold the presidency of the EU and he has business there. My hon. Friend said to me on a personal basis, not a ministerial basis, that he supported establishing an independent regulator, but that it is not the Government's policy to do so. He also said that he saw what was happening from his experience in Bradford and that his Department had been dealing with the issue for 25 years. That honesty and openness is refreshing among Ministers. I believe that, after 25 years, it is time to act. I had a good meeting with my hon. Friend, and he was prepared to listen. That is half the battle.

With a turnover of £37 billion, Tesco ranks about 53rd in the World Bank's listing of 184 national economies, putting it ahead of Bolivia, Belarus and Bulgaria combined. In the very near future, we will discuss scrapping our Sunday trading laws, which Tesco and others already breach. When people go to the Tesco Express near me on a Sunday night, it is not just to buy petrol and to pick up a bag of sweets, as in the old days, but, in many cases, to do their weekly shopping because the main supermarkets closed at 5 o'clock. Opening hours become yet another obstacle for smaller independent retailers and another aspect of competition difficulty.

Having one or a few dominant players in a market goes against all theories of healthy competition and will, in the end, affect consumers and the supply of goods. I believe I speak on behalf of many when I argue that the British people want a diverse market, with a variety of choice—something that will not happen if we only have one option, which is Tesco.

I hope that the Government heed the call from hon. Members on both sides of the House for the appointment of a supermarket regulator. It is vital that something is done before it is too late.

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): May I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) on securing parliamentary time—probably more than he anticipated—for this important debate. I am glad to have an opportunity to discuss the issues that he raised. As he acknowledged, the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Sutcliffe), who has ministerial responsibility for these matters, has duties in Brussels, so I have been asked to respond to the debate. My hon. Friend apologises for the fact that he cannot be here, but he discussed these matters with my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East this morning, and I am sure that he will look at the record very carefully to see what the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members have said.

The UK competition framework established the Office of Fair Trading and the Competition Commission as independent statutory bodies. The Government wished to remove politics from competition decisions, allowing expert independent competition bodies to make decisions on mergers and markets. Hon. Members on both sides of the House will recognise the benefits of that revised structure. The supermarket code of practice is part of the statutory undertakings given to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry under section 88(2) of the Fair Trading Act 1973 after a Competition Commission report on the matter was published in October 2000. The monitoring and enforcement of the code is the responsibility of the OFT. In addition to the code of practice, supermarkets are subject to other regulations monitored and enforced by, among others, the Health and Safety Executive, the Food Standards Agency, Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs and local authorities. Any anti-competitive practices fall under the remit of the OFT.

David Taylor: The Minister referred to the range of powers given to the Competition Commission. What social and environmental considerations can the commission take into account when deciding whether or not certain market practices are in the interests of the British consumer?

Malcolm Wicks: I hope to say a more about the Competition Commission a little later. If my hon. Friend does not think that I have addressed those issues, I am sure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will write to him.

We need to see this debate partly in the context of the Government's determination to achieve better regulation in Britain. There is always a tension between understandable demands from hon. Members for more regulation and a more generic concern that British business should not be over-regulated. Given that supermarkets are already subject to independent regulators in a number of areas, and given the importance, which I have just highlighted, of not over-regulating any sector of the economy, the Government do not think that there is any case for the creation of a supermarket ombudsman or regulator. I accept, however, that discussion will continue. I have been warned not to make a quip, but as Minister for Energy I deal with Ofgem, so it would be fun to establish "Off-trolley". Perhaps that will have to wait for another occasion, as I am arguing that the Government do not think that there is any case for an off-the-trolley regulator.

We do not accept that a new supermarket regulator would add any value without duplicating regulatory processes and imposing increased burdens, not only on supermarkets but on the companies that supply them. It would wrong to regulate in that way, and the Government would set a dangerous precedent if we created a regulator to oversee contracts between businesses. Unless unfair, anti-competitive or illegal practices are taking place there is no place for interference from regulatory bodies. British businesses would lose any competitive advantage over their competitors and the country as a whole would be poorer for it. I will deal later with the current state of play.

Mr. Breed: I recognise that better regulation is the way forward. Does the Minister accept that the OFT regulations do not take a wide enough purview of all the issues that have been raised this evening and of the fact that competition must act in the best interests of present and future consumers?

Malcolm Wicks: I am sure that OFT officials will read the record of the debate very carefully.

The major concern with the current code is that suppliers will not make complaints to the OFT for fear that such action would limit their ability to secure contracts with other supermarkets. I have listened carefully to that concern. Farmers and suppliers have indicated that they would be more likely to make formal complaints to the OFT if the OFT could guarantee anonymity for complainants. However, any complaint system will require the supermarkets to be made aware of the details of the complaint. An ombudsman or independent regulator would normally need to share complaints with operators, so that the circumstances and legitimacy of the allegations could be verified and the complaint addressed. Clearly, there are some difficulties here.

The code has a disputes process which incorporates the recognised ombudsman model. Introducing anonymity to the complaints process under the code would run counter to one of the code's main objectives—to put relations between supermarkets and their suppliers on a clearer and more predictable basis. In pursuit of that objective, the OFT has encouraged supermarkets to put more of their dealings with suppliers in writing. Of course, suppliers have a right under the code to seek terms of business offered by supermarkets to suppliers in writing. That should help suppliers to be more assertive in their dealings with supermarkets. We welcome the OFT's commitment to continue to monitor the operation of the code proactively. That is to be achieved through a number of measures, including encouraging greater use of written terms between suppliers and supermarkets.

Keith Vaz: That is an example showing how debates such as this can get the Government to make a statement on these matters. Does the Minister agree that the OFT has been weak in dealing with that aspect? We welcome the change of heart. Will he address suppliers' fear of coming out with the information and the evidence? There is anecdotal evidence, but nobody wants to come up front because of the fear that they will lose business.

Malcolm Wicks: That has been a powerful theme of my hon. Friend's remarks. Notwithstanding what I have said about that and about the difficulty of considering complaints in a transparent way and the consequent need to know more about the complaint and the complainant, I know that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will reflect on what my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East has said.

The Office of Fair Trading is committed to checking the supermarkets regularly for compliance and, most importantly, checking how suppliers who raise code issues are treated by the supermarkets afterwards. By monitoring in that way, the OFT can ensure that they are not be subject to any discrimination or sanctions. We are aware of the concerns of some sectors of the supermarket supply chain. The Government agree that supermarkets should deal fairly with suppliers, and we want to see good working relations between them.

My ministerial colleagues and I remain keen to encourage dialogue between supermarkets and suppliers to ensure fair and effective resolutions to disputes. Suppliers are encouraged to approach the OFT at any time to discuss any concerns that they may have in confidence. We may need to publicise that possibility more. The OFT will investigate any complaints that it receives and take appropriate action where necessary. The OFT has not yet received any substantiated claims of breaches. It cannot be expected to take action based on unsubstantiated claims, as such action would seriously undermine the credibility of the code.

I appreciate that another matter of concern to my hon. Friend are the moves by some of the supermarket chains, in particular Tesco and Sainsbury, into the convenience store sector. According to figures from the Institute for Grocery Distribution, published in May this year, Tesco and Sainsbury currently have a small share—11 per cent.—of convenience retailing. We can debate how small or large a share that is. The merger control regime takes into account whether there is a substantial lessening of competition in any merger situation, in which case the OFT has the power to refer the case to the Competition Commission for further analysis. That was not found to be the situation regarding the Tesco-Adminstore or Sainsbury's-Bells acquisitions.

There has been some consolidation in the convenience store sector, but a number of successful independent groups have managed to take on and compete with the multiples. Institute for Grocery Distribution figures predict that symbol groups such as Spar, Costcutter and Londis will increase sales from £8.7 billion in 2006 to £11.6 billion in 2010 and that the number of convenience stores will increase from 12,693 to 13,865. Following an appeal by the Association of Convenience Stores to the competition appeals tribunal—my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East mentioned the tribunal—the OFT is reviewing afresh its decision not to refer the grocery market to the Competition Commission. The CAT has asked for that to be done as quickly as possible, and in the circumstances the OFT should be left to complete its work unimpeded.

My Department has received a large amount of correspondence in relation to the so-called "Tescopoly" campaign instigated by Friends of the Earth. I do not want to do any more than note the points made in that campaign, because of the work that the OFT is now undertaking on the grocery market. I expect the OFT to come up with a view on the state of competition in that market and on whether the market is working well for consumers in the context of its new decision whether to make a market investigation reference.

Mr. Michael Foster: Will the Minister have a word with his colleagues in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to see whether they will introduce a post-planning permission audit of decisions on Tesco Express versus convenience stores? That would allow us to learn from real data, which would help to inform us on future decisions.

Malcolm Wicks: I will bring that point to the attention of colleagues in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. I will also mention the specific story of what allegedly happened in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East.

Keith Vaz: Petrol is a subject that is closer to the Minister's heart—he is the Minister for Energy. Has he seen for himself in Croydon the growth of mini-supermarkets situated next to petrol stations? It is no longer the case that people go into petrol stations and buy a few goods. If the Minister passes a Tesco Express attached to an Esso filling station when he returns to his constituency on Friday, he will see people come out with bags and bags of shopping, which even happens after 5 o'clock on a Sunday.

Malcolm Wicks: I have seen that, and I pass through my constituency every night.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): The Minister is lucky.

Malcolm Wicks: I am lucky. I was reflecting on my luck when I was given the opportunity, in addition to my energy responsibilities, to address the House on this important subject. I shall have another word with my ministerial colleague about my good fortune.

Big is not necessarily bad. OFT data indicate that in the five years to 2005, product lines in groceries increased by nearly 40 per cent. on average. According to the Office for National Statistics, retail food prices fell between December 1999 and May 2005 by 4.1 per cent. in real terms, which is surely good for consumers and the economy. Furthermore, the four biggest supermarket chains—Tesco, Sainsbury, Asda and Morrison—employ more than 675,000 people. Additionally, the Co-op's stores make it a significant player.

We need to get the balance right. Many of my constituents are concerned that Morrison's in Upper Norwood has decided to close down. In all honesty, they do not flood to my advice surgery to say, "What a wonderful opportunity for the small entrepreneur"; they say, "Who else will take over this superstore"? Our constituents like visiting supermarkets, just as they value flourishing and entrepreneurial small shops.

There must be no whiff of hypocrisy in this debate. My hon. Friend was honest enough to come out as a Tesco shopper, which he described as an enjoyable experience. I am bound to say that when I am on my own at a checkout and there is suddenly a rush of goods to put in bags, I find it more of a terrifying than an enjoyable experience. Let us not get into a situation where we use the superstores as well as the small shops—as do our constituents, many of whom are employed by them—yet at the theoretical level see them as the devil incarnate.

Keith Vaz rose—

Malcolm Wicks: My hon. Friend is not hypocritical, but for some reason he wants to intervene on the theme of hypocrisy.

Keith Vaz: I just want to set the record straight. I think that it is a wonderful experience being able to walk down Uppingham road, where my constituency office and home are, and meet people who have been trading there for years and years. This is about the integrity and character of our town centres. We do not want them disfigured with huge glass monoliths with the word "Express" written all over them. We want to ensure that the towns and cities of Britain have shops to give people choice. It is a wonderful experience going into supermarkets; it is an equally wonderful experience being able to go to the high street shops. My fear is that there will be no high street shops left.

Malcolm Wicks: Of course, I understand that. We all want that balance in our lives. However, I remember the debate about small post offices, which still rages. I heard a story from an hon. Gentleman who campaigned for a post office to be kept open and was told by the postmaster that some 6,000 people had signed the petition to keep it open. When he asked how many regular customers he had, the answer was 200. We must practise what we preach. There are many excellent small stores selling a range of goods—for example, cheese shops, many of which, unlike the one in the John Cleese sketch, have cheese. We need to get the balance right between the small shops and a sensible approach to the Tesco's, Sainsbury's and Co-op's of this world.

It is not for Government Ministers to decide if action is necessary, given that a well-established, independent and rigorous competition framework is in place to consider the questions raised by my hon. Friends.

David Taylor: The Minister invited me to intervene on him should he not address a concern that I raised. It is all very well having an independent competition regulatory framework, but if it is not working—if it does not have teeth or feels disinclined to act—we need something of the type that my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) suggests.

Malcolm Wicks: I understand that. Obviously colleagues will monitor carefully how the competition authorities consider the question that is before them. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will reflect on what my hon. Friends have said.

I am sure that all Members look forward to hearing the results from the competition authorities and that there will be further deliberations in this House and elsewhere on this very important subject, which my hon. Friend introduced so well.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Seven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

TREASURY

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was asked—

Youth Unemployment

1. Mrs. Siân C. James (Swansea, East) (Lab): What recent assessment he has made of the economic effects of reducing long-term youth unemployment. [35531]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): It is because of measures we have taken and the new deal that youth unemployment has fallen 90 per cent. since 1997, with large falls in almost every constituency. At a cost of £140 million, we will now pioneer new learning agreements for teenagers, with a grant for training in return for undertaking courses. At the same time, we will offer activity agreements to move teenagers from unemployment back into the world of training and then into work.

Mrs. James: I thank my right hon. Friend for his answer. In my constituency we have seen those successes. Some 1,300 young people and 1,080 lone parents have found work as a result of those schemes, benefiting the local economy. Will he ensure that schemes such as the new deal continue to support our local economy and stop young people being put on the unemployment scrapheap?

Mr. Brown: In the mid-1980s, there were nearly 400,000 young people out of work for more than a year. Today, the figure is less than 6,000 throughout the whole country. It is because of the new deal that we have achieved that, and that is why we will not abolish the new deal as the Opposition would do: we will strengthen the new deal with our measures.

David Simpson (Upper Bann) (DUP): What progress is the Chancellor making on funding for the young enterprise programmes across the UK, as the budgets have been cut dramatically?

Mr. Brown: I take a big interest in the enterprise insight programmes. They have been held in England and there are additional programmes in Scotland and Wales, and of course there is a special programme in Northern Ireland, which has been very successful. I am happy to meet the hon. Gentleman to talk about the enterprise programme in Northern Ireland. During enterprise week, only a few weeks ago, hundreds of thousands of young people were involved in the activities and there were 2,000 special events, which ranged from master classes in enterprise to competitions, including one for the young entrepreneur of the year. It is that interest in enterprise and starting businesses among young people that we want to encourage, especially in areas that have seen slow growth in small businesses in previous decades, such as the area that the hon. Gentleman represents. We are determined to do more and I am happy to talk to him about the issue.

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Central Ayrshire) (Lab): While I praise my right hon. Friend for the massive drop in youth unemployment in my constituency, I am concerned that statistics are not available for the new constituencies north of the border, as he will know. Can he correct that situation so that we can see just how good the figures are for the new constituencies?

Mr. Brown: I am happy to take up that issue with the Scottish Administration, if necessary, so that we can have the full statistics on the decline in youth unemployment, long-term youth unemployment and unemployment generally that has taken place under our Government. I can give him a rough estimate: the decline in youth unemployment in his constituency is of the order of 90 per cent. since 1997.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): Would the Chancellor agree that the surest way to reduce youth unemployment would be to follow the Irish example and reduce corporation tax, instead of imposing ever more costs, bureaucracy, red tape and taxation on our businesses and stifling their opportunities for growth?

Mr. Brown: I thought that with the new Conservative party we would have heard some concern about the unemployed—[Interruption.] We have cut corporation tax by 3p, from 33p to 30p. We have cut small business tax from 23p to 19p. We have cut capital gains tax from 40p to 10p for long-term assets. If the hon. Gentleman is telling me that the solution to long-term youth unemployment is to abolish the new deal, he is living in the world of the 1980s, not 2005.

Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the proposals that he announced on Monday to make banks give up unclaimed money for the benefit of youth and community programmes will also help long-term youth unemployment?

Mr. Brown: I thought that we might have had a strong welcome for our proposals on the new deal and to put more money into youth and community services through the use of unclaimed assets. The banks and the Government have signed an agreement about what will happen once the figure for unclaimed assets has been agreed. The money will go to financial education, but mainly to youth and community services. That gives us a chance to do something in an area in which we have failed to invest for decades—the provision of facilities in all our constituencies, be it internet cafes, youth facilities generally or sports facilities. It is important that we do something so that the good, decent majority of young people have facilities to enjoy. I hope that we will receive all-party support for the development of youth facilities through the use of unclaimed assets.

Job Creation

2. Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): How many new jobs have been created since 1997; and what assessment he has made of the effect of these new jobs on the economy. [35532]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): As a result of the new deal and other measures, 2.3 million jobs have been created since 1997. British unemployment is half that of Germany and France and below that of America. I can also inform the House that, from April, the new deal will pioneer new compulsory interviews and intensive work preparation courses for those unemployed six months or over so that we can get more people back into work.

Mr. Devine: Is my right hon. Friend aware that unemployment in my constituency last week was 2 per cent.? When the Conservative party was in power, it was 26 per cent. We were told that if it was not hurting, it was not working. I worked in primary care psychiatry and watched patients being prescribed anti-depressants and valium. If they could have been prescribed a job, they would not have been near the health centre. Does he agree that there is no such thing as compassionate conservatism?

Mr. Brown: If Conservative Front Benchers had come in on the first question, we might have seen whether their attitude to the new deal had improved since the previous Administration. However, they have appointed a former party leader to run their commission on social action and he is already committed to the abolition of the new deal for young people and the unemployed. My hon. Friend makes a very important point. Conservative Members may have some reason to be grateful to the Government, as unemployment in most of their constituencies has halved as well. We will continue to create more jobs. There are 600,000 vacancies in the economy—and this economy has created 300,000 jobs in the past year. We should be congratulated by the Opposition on our policies, not criticised or condemned.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): If the Chancellor were to read out the names of the constituencies where unemployment was now higher than it was nine months ago, how many would he name?

Mr. Brown: I do not have a list of 650 constituencies. We have created 330,000 new jobs during the past year. Those, including the Leader of the Opposition, who prophesised that this year we would be unable to create the jobs that we have managed to create will find that we have created 6,000 jobs per week, and that 3,500 new small businesses have been created a week. [Interruption.] I am sorry that Conservative Members cannot congratulate us or feel happy that the economy is creating 330,000 jobs. We are not seeing much evidence of a new Conservative party today.

Andrew Gwynne (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): As well as the 2.3 million new jobs in the UK, unemployment in my constituency has fallen by 51 per cent. since 1997. Does my right hon. Friend agree that our resources are best used to continue supporting people in finding work, rather than on the waste of the cost of unemployment that we had when 3 million were unemployed under the Tories?

Mr. Brown: People will see that when we mention unemployment and the creation of jobs, Conservative Members in this new anti-Punch and Judy show that they are trying to operate are laughing. The fact is that we have created 2.3 million jobs since we came to power in 1997, and 330,000 jobs have been created in the past year. Some 6,000 jobs have been created on average every week. This has affected almost every constituency in the country. I believe that we are showing that with low inflation, we can create high employment in a modern economy and that we do not have to pursue the polices of the 1980s where, to get inflation down, unemployment was at 3 million. That is the difference between a Labour philosophy and a Conservative philosophy.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): While the Chancellor's figures are encouraging, and I congratulate him, does he accept that the situation facing manufacturing industry is very grim? Many tens of thousands of jobs have been lost in manufacturing, which is the only source of non-inflationary sustainable growth. Is there nothing that he can do to give further encouragement and support by creating the right environment for a growth in manufacturing jobs, which is essential to this country?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who has taken a long-term interest in manufacturing industry. I think that he would agree that the first foundation for industrial strength is low inflation and economic stability. That has been achieved over recent years. What is happening in every advanced industrial country is that the number of manufacturing jobs is declining. America and Japan have each lost 3 million manufacturing jobs. America has lost 1 million manufacturing jobs in the past two years. That trend is happening right across the world—[Interruption.] I am sorry; again, the Conservatives must face up to facts. If America and Japan each lose 3 million manufacturing jobs, all advanced industrial economies are affected. What we are trying to do—I think that the hon. Gentleman will be interested in this—is to provide greater support for research and development in manufacturing, greater support for the development of new skills, new investment allowances for small businesses and support through the Small Business Service and the regional development agencies. We are trying to help our modern, high skill and high-value-added manufacturing become more competitive across the world. We will continue with that policy, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will support it even if those on the Conservative Front Bench do not find it at all interesting.

Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that our economic success is a result of his commitment to the TANSTAAFL principle—"there ain't no such thing as a free lunch"—and that economic growth comes from investment in jobs, skills, education and communities, not inflation-busting tax cuts?

Mr. Brown: Our policy is to invest in both jobs and skills in the economy. At some point, the Conservatives must face up to this issue. If we want employment and modern skills, we must invest in the new deal and education. Their policy to cut £12 billion from public expenditure would damage jobs, skills and education.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): What proportion of the new jobs since 1997 are public service jobs? Why will the Chancellor not give the House the current estimate of the public service pension liability that arises from those new jobs and must then be paid for by the private sector?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman knows that two thirds of the new jobs are in the private sector and that almost 1 million jobs have been created in small businesses alone. If he wants to cut public sector jobs, perhaps he should look at his election address, in which he said:

"I want more money to go to the front line for more nurses, doctors and clinical staff."

He than said:

"I want more police."

That is not someone trying to cut the public sector; it is someone trying to increase it.

Angela Eagle (Wallasey) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend recognise how successful the policy of getting down unemployment has been so far, especially in my constituency? Will he give the House some indication of how he intends to take that success further, particularly with skills, so that we can ensure that the jobs that are created in the future for my constituents will be ones that can support families, that are well paid and that are not bumping along the bottom of the labour market?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Perhaps there could be all-party support for the extension of the national employer training programme, which was announced on Monday, to all areas of the country, where employers will get help so that they can train their workers and get time off, with some support for the wage costs in doing so. That new partnership between the Government, employers and employees involves some public money—£47 million to help small firms to give time off to their workers. We are prepared to make that public investment. The question is whether the Conservative party is prepared to support the public investment that is necessary for the skills and training that we need in the economy.

Tax Credits

3. Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): What estimate he has made of the number of people entitled to claim tax credit who do not do so. [35533]

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): Analysis of the number of those entitled but not claiming tax credits is ongoing and will be completed by the end of 2005–06. Initial estimates are that 80 per cent. of those entitled to the child tax credit in the first year claimed it. That compares with a take-up of 57 per cent. for family credit and 62 per cent. for working families tax credit.

Mr. Hollobone: I thank the Minister for her answer. Although it is encouraging that the percentage take-up is improving, does she share my concern that up to a fifth of potential claimants—some of them the most vulnerable members of our society—are not getting to the tax credits to which they are entitled?

Dawn Primarolo: I assure the hon. Gentleman that take-up of tax credit appears to be across the board, particularly focusing on those in the greatest need; for instance, 1.4 million receive an average entitlement of £5,795 a year. In his constituency, about 8,800 families are benefiting from tax credit. Even with take-up of child tax credit as high as it appears to be, it is important that we focus on ensuring that we continue to advertise it and to encourage people who are entitled to apply for it. I hope that he will campaign for that and support tax credit, to ensure that it is welcomed and supported.

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend will be aware that at the Treasury Committee meeting yesterday we asked her officials for a paper on the implications of the latest changes in tax credits. Although the disregard on earnings from £2,500 to £25,000 is a huge step forward, will she inform us whether it will be revenue neutral, and before her next appearance before the Committee will she work with her officials to ensure that innovative ways are found to increase that 80 per cent. take-up?

Dawn Primarolo: My right hon. Friend refers to specific issues and discussions about the package of measures announced on Monday for reform of tax credits, ensuring flexibility but also greater certainty for claimants. He will know that the package as a whole was scored in a particular way in the pre-Budget report statement. I will ensure—I think that my officials gave this undertaking to the Treasury Committee—that a detailed answer specifically on costs is not only made available to the Committee but that it is put in the Library so that all Members can see how the entire package fits together in terms of the total costing.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): When did Ministers first become aware of organised attempts to defraud the tax credit system? How many Department for Work and Pensions staff have been affected by that to date, and can she tell us how much that organised fraud of the tax credit system has cost the taxpayer?

Dawn Primarolo: The hon. Gentleman will be aware, because I have answered him both in parliamentary questions and in letters, that the potential committing of fraud against the tax credit system is taken seriously by officials. He will also be aware that at the end of the first year, 2003–04, specific figures, which are being prepared, will indicate the success of the policy in deterring fraud. Because of the announcement, he will be aware that there are specific investigations into fraud against the tax credit system involving the DWP. A criminal investigation is going on, so it would not be appropriate for me to comment further, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that I shall keep him and the House fully informed of developments.

Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend tell the House what her estimate is of the number of children who would fall back into poverty if the tax credit system was abolished?

Dawn Primarolo: The combination of measures through the tax credit system has contributed to about 1.4 million children being lifted out of poverty. That is crucial and a central part of the Government's measures to eradicate child poverty, especially the record level created under the previous Conservative Government. Without the presence of tax credits, should the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) feel tempted to abolish them, as the Conservatives say they will do, we would see a massive rise in child poverty.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): Let me try to help the Paymaster General with the question that the Chairman of the Treasury Select Committee asked. At the same time as the announcement on Monday that the disregard of increased pay would be raised so that people earning more than £90,000 could continue to receive their tax credits in full for up to 12 months, the pre-Budget report showed that the Government intend to spend £200 million less on tax credit in 2007–08. If people whose income increases will be better off, and the Government plan to spend less on the total package, who will be worse off?

Dawn Primarolo: I will send the hon. Gentleman another copy of the statement that was released as part of the pre-Budget report that was announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on Monday. Let me help him by reminding him that there were a series of reforms that were in favour of claimants because they made the system more flexible. One part of that was the increase to the disregard. There were reforms to speed up the reporting of changes in circumstances to ensure that it would be less likely that overpayment would occur. There was a reform to change the period for verification—the renewal period—from six months to five months. Those are but three of the measures. Taken together, they give claimants greater flexibility while reducing the risk of overpayments. That is how the entire package hangs together and how the costings are developed. If the hon. Gentleman wants to read the statement again so that he understands it, I will be happy to clarify any further confusion that he has.

Inflation

4. Mr. Geoffrey Robinson (Coventry, North-West) (Lab): If he will make a statement on his policy on inflation. [35534]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): Inflation, which averaged 8 per cent. for the years 1970 to 1997, has been at or around 2 per cent. in recent years. It is forecast to be 2 per cent. this year and next year. It is because of low inflation that interest rates in Britain have averaged 5.5 per cent. since 1997—half the level of the previous 18 years.

Mr. Robinson: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development has called the British economy under his stewardship a paragon of stability? Is he further aware that central to that success has been the control of inflation, and that that control of inflation, in turn, has led to the lowest mortgage rate since the late 1950s, which has meant that in my constituency—and, indeed, throughout the country—the average mortgage holder has saved £4,000? Will he tell the House what the effect would be of returning to the Conservative party's policy of 10 per cent. inflation?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The number of home owners has increased by 1 million since 1997. That has been possible because interest rates have been half what they were under the previous Government and mortgage rates have also been half what they were in the 18 years of the previous Government—[Interruption.] I would have thought that there would have been all-party support for the stability that has been achieved. In fact, the shadow Chancellor has been making speeches in support of our macro-economic policy, but unfortunately he has made them not in the House, but outside the House, where he hopes that his party will not hear what he says.

The OECD commented on our economy by saying:

"The United Kingdom is a leader in the quality of its monetary and fiscal policy frameworks among OECD countries".

It also said:

"The stability and resilience of the economy has been impressive and labour and product markets are among the most flexible in the OECD".

We will continue to maintain stability and increase the flexibility and resilience of the economy. Again, I would have hoped that we would have all-party support for that.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): But does the Chancellor have any meaningful inflation policy having handed over control of interest rates to the Bank of England, whose Governor's recent public statements have been markedly more pessimistic that his? Is it not clear that the lack of co-ordination between fiscal and monetary policy severely undermined the authority of the Chancellor's pre-Budget report? Does he recall that a distinguished predecessor of his used to criticise punk monetarism, yet he has now become an exponent of punk Keynesianism, boosting expenditure before the election and restraining it—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are running out of time.

Mr. Brown: There are some members of the Conservative party who remain to be convinced about making the Bank of England independent. I should tell the House that the hon. Gentleman has been consistent in his opposition to Bank of England independence. He said that it would make the efficient macro-economic management of our affairs more difficult and then predicted that it would lead to higher levels of unemployment. Unemployment has gone down by half a million since we came to power and there are 2.3 million more jobs. He should be admitting that he was wrong on the matter and that it was right to make the Bank of England independent.

Mr. Pat McFadden (Wolverhampton, South-East) (Lab): The Chancellor said that low and stable inflation rates have helped 1 million more people to become home owners since 1997—a far cry from memories of 15 per cent. interest rates when the Opposition were in power. However, does he agree that many more people in Britain have the dream and ambition of owning their own home? Will he tell the House how many more people will be helped to do so through the housing measures announced this week in the pre-Budget report?

Mr. Brown: Our aim is that the figure of 1 million extra since 1997 should rise to 2 million by 2010. It is because of the combination of measures that we have introduced to improve the planning system, the use of land, the development of existing land and the improvement of infrastructure, as well as the Government's low interest rate policy that we can aspire to low mortgages and the building of additional houses over the next few years. Opposition Members must face up to the fact that this is a low inflation, low interest rate environment, and that has only happened because there is a Labour Government, not a Conservative Government.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): In his statement on Monday, the Chancellor argued that because the main cause of recent inflation was high oil prices, petrol duties would be frozen and taxes increased on the North sea. If oil prices fall to the level before the recent shock, is it therefore Government policy that petrol duties will be increased and the increase in taxation on the North sea reversed?

Mr. Brown: The policy on fuel prices is as I have set out previously. As for the North sea, I want to give stability to oil companies during this Parliament.

Michael Gove (Surrey Heath) (Con): By increasing taxes?

Mr. Brown: Opposition Members clearly do not want the revenue of £2 billion a year from the increase in North sea oil taxes, so they had better tell us which services they will cut to make possible the loss of that revenue.

Millennium Development Goals

5. Barbara Follett (Stevenage) (Lab): What action his Department is taking towards delivery of the millennium development goals. [35535]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): I can report a major advance that will support progress towards reaching our millennium development goals. Since Britain pioneered the international finance facility for immunisation, I can announce not only the engagement of France, Italy, Spain and Sweden in this project but that Norway has joined the project this week. I believe that other countries are ready to follow and that this initiative alone could save up to 5 million lives between now and 2015. It is one of the most important factors that make possible the achievement of the millennium development goals on infant and maternal mortality.

Barbara Follett: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply and for everything that he and his Department are doing to try to meet the millennium development goals. However, does he agree that as 140 million children in the developing world, 65 million of them girls, are unable to access education, we have an enormous amount to do if we are to achieve goal 3 and eliminate gender disparity in primary and secondary education by 2015?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who takes a huge interest in these matters, particularly Africa, where many children are denied the prospect of education. There are 110 million children around the world who will not go to school today. Two thirds of them are girls, who suffer both from discrimination against girls and the lack of resources for education. The world could come together over the next few years with the fast-track action plan for education to speed up the offer of primary places, in particular, to girls as well as boys. The cost of that investment would be about $10 billion a year, which is a small price to pay for probably the most cost-effective investment that the world could ever make. Again, I hope that there will be all-party support for that initiative.

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): I want to take the opportunity to state that Her Majesty's Opposition support the Chancellor's broad objectives in this sphere. [Interruption.] It could indeed be described as an end to Punch and Judy politics. However, we urge him to provide a full report on further progress on the international finance facility along the lines that he set out, particularly efforts to try to achieve US involvement in this important sphere of work. We recognise that aid alone can never be sufficient. In pursuit of economic development, free trade, especially in agricultural commodities, is of key importance. Will the Chancellor ensure that effective action to reform the EU common agricultural policy, rather than mere words, becomes official Government policy?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support for our initiative on debt relief and aid and on the international finance facility. We are moving forward with our proposal for the pilot project on immunisation, which will put $4 billion of extra money into vaccinating and immunising children in particular in Africa and Asia. We have won the support of a large number of European countries, and we believe we will have support from Latin America, Africa and Asia over the next few months, so that it will genuinely be a worldwide initiative with dozens of countries supporting the principles underlying the international finance facility. I hope that from the all-party support in the House we can build out to a consensus right round the world.

On trade, the hon. Gentleman knows I agree with the proposition that there needs to be progress. As he probably saw on Saturday at the G7 Finance Ministers meeting, Brazil made a new offer to open up trade in areas where it has been under criticism, and India indicated that it would make a further offer if there were similar and equivalent offers from Europe and America. It is now up to the trade negotiators to look at those new proposals and see whether we can unblock the trade talks. Of course, at the heart of it, as I said on Saturday, is the vexed issue of agricultural protectionism, where I hope we all agree that both Europe and America must make progress and make new offers.

HIV/AIDS

6. Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): If he will increase the UK's financial contribution to tackling HIV/AIDS overseas. [35536]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): Our aim is that by 2010 every HIV/AIDS sufferer will receive treatment. Advance market commitments for vaccines to prevent diseases that primarily affect poor countries were discussed at the G7 meeting of Finance Ministers at the weekend. We agreed a pilot scheme to be developed, which will support research and development and the delivery of vaccines that in the long term may help us in the search for a preventive vaccine for HIV/AIDS. I hope that there will again be all-party support for those initiatives.

Julie Morgan: I congratulate my right hon. Friend and the Government on all the efforts that they have made in this matter. What can my right hon. Friend do to ensure that the aid that is given for HIV/AIDS is spent as intended? On a recent visit to Kenya, I was told by the Ministry for Health, health professionals and non-governmental organisations that the rules of the International Monetary Fund made it extremely difficult for them to increase their public spending on nurses, doctors and other health officials. What can my right hon. Friend do to influence the situation and create the right balance between economic stability and public spending on health in countries such as Kenya?

Mr. Brown: As my hon. Friend may know, the British Government and other European countries in particular are signing agreements with a number of countries, to give long-term support to those Governments so that they can make allocations to health and education, not just on an annual basis, but on a sustainable basis. We believe that that is the best way of ensuring that money goes to health and education, rather than going to corrupt projects or being wasted. As regards the short term, I will take up my hon. Friend's question about Kenya with my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for overseas development and write to her on the matter.

Mr. Jeremy Hunt (South-West Surrey) (Con): Does the Chancellor agree that the 2010 access to AIDS treatment target will not have any credibility unless intermediate targets and milestones are set by which we can measure whether progress is being made towards the achievement of such an important target?

Mr. Brown: I accept that when a long-term target is set, the real questions are whether there will be the money to deliver that target, and whether there will be proper development of policy to achieve it, so I agree with the hon. Gentleman that we must put in place both the necessary resources and the policy measures to achieve the target. There have been great advances in antiretroviral drugs and treatments, and great advances also in charitable and other medical projects that are helping AIDS sufferers in various parts of Africa—I visited some of those projects in the course of a visit to Africa—but in the end it will require an agreement about the funding that we can provide, as well as the policy measures to implement it. I am glad that there is all-party agreement on that.

Economic Regeneration Funding

7. Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell) (LD): What progress has been made on Government proposals to repatriate economic regeneration funding from the EU. [35537]

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ivan Lewis): The Government's approach to the reform of structural and cohesion funds for the period 2007–13 has called for greater focus on new member states, more freedom and flexibility for structural fund spending within member states, and a greater focus on the Lisbon agenda for productivity and growth. That approach is set out in the negotiating box tabled by the Foreign Secretary on Monday 5 December, which reflected the views of all member states.

Matthew Taylor: Before the general election, the Chancellor pursued a policy of getting billions back from the European Union to the UK by repatriating regeneration funds. Since the general election, it seems that the Prime Minister has been pursuing a policy of giving away billions of pounds to the EU by giving up part of our rebate. What is the Treasury view on this apparent U-turn in policy?

Mr. Lewis: We do not accept that that analysis is accurate. The negotiations are ongoing, and we cannot make commitments on specific regions. Under the UK proposals, which were tabled this week, receipts would be the same as those under the previous proposals from Luxembourg. It is important to recognise that three quarters of regional funding is already provided domestically. This year, the South West of England Regional Development Agency has a budget of £153 million to invest in the economic development and regeneration of Cornwall and the wider south-west region.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): When my hon. Friend considers the future of structural funding, will he take into account the decision by my Conservative-controlled local authority to turn down £1 million of economic development funding because it does not want to match fund, which will affect the most vulnerable and deprived in my community? Is that not an early example of the hypocrisy and double standards of the Conservative party?

Mr. Lewis: Of course, I agree with my hon. Friend. However the Conservative party tries to rebrand itself, it will always stand for the same ideology and philosophy, which does not involve using resources to help some of our more disadvantaged communities. Any decisions that we make in the future will take account of that local authority's failure to provide the right local leadership.

Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): In the proposals set out on Monday, the Government are offering more flexibility on the timing of expenditure and the required level of match funding in return for a 10 per cent. cut in the structural funds compared with the Luxembourg proposals Will the Minister confirm that that new flexibility will be available to convergence fund regions in the UK such as west Wales and the valleys as well as to the EU 10?

Mr. Lewis: As I have said, the most important difference that we make involves the money that we spend in the United Kingdom on regional policy. We will take account of the concern expressed by the hon. Gentleman.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): The Minister knows that because of the extraordinary success of this Government's economic policy, Wales in particular has strode ahead economically, so much so that we may no longer qualify for funds that are available to regions because of poverty. Will he guarantee that whatever happens in the EU negotiations over the next two weeks, he will continue to work with colleagues in the Welsh Assembly to make sure that the economy in the south Wales valleys continues to be regenerated?

Mr. Lewis: I agree with my hon. Friend. A combination of macro-economic stability and labour market intervention through the new deal to create new jobs has been at the centre of the Government's policies on social justice and economic growth. Those policies will continue, and we will continue to work with elected representatives in Wales to ensure that the prosperity that is developing continues to grow into the future.

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk) (Con): In his Mansion house speech, the Chancellor talked about the necessity of EU economic reform, and the Prime Minister has subsequently discussed budgetary reform. Could the Government ever have imagined that issues such as economic regeneration funding would inflame the new member countries and have the French running rings around us over the common agricultural policy? Given that our EU presidency has been marked by isolation, incompetence and lack of preparation, will the Minister take this opportunity to apologise for both the lack of reform and our national humiliation?

Mr. Lewis: That contribution demonstrates why the Conservative party will never be fit to be in government. We are in the middle of the most sensitive negotiations and hold the EU presidency, and Her Majesty's Opposition are seeking to undermine the Government in those negotiations. The only change on abatement occurred because we believe that we should pay our fair share of the costs of enlargement. Does the Conservative party believe that we should pay our fair share of the costs of enlargement?

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): Of course the Minister is right that the first duty of any Government in negotiations is to protect Britain's position but, as he also said, there is a cost to enlargement. The Conservatives supported enlargement, as did the whole European Union. It would be completely unfair to hamper the new member states because they do not have the funds fully to integrate into the European Union. I wish my hon. Friend well in the negotiations and ask him to remember that the future of Europe depends on our ability to treat all nations equally, which means giving the necessary funds to new member states.

Mr. Lewis: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend, who has a lot of expertise in this area. The changes that we have made to the negotiating position so far are about ensuring that this country pays its fair share of the costs of enlargement. I assume that the Conservatives would believe that to be the correct policy. We will be willing to make other significant changes in terms of the rebate only if the French radically change their position on the common agricultural policy. That has remained this country's position throughout the negotiations.

UK Economy

8. Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): What assessment he has made of the principal factors affecting the estimated level of growth in the UK economy. [35538]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Des Browne): The pre-Budget report 2005 set out a comprehensive account of recent economic developments and the Government's assessment of growth prospects for the UK economy. Over the past year, the effects of global and domestic inflationary pressures have tested the UK economy. However, sound macro-economic fundamentals continue to support growth and stability, helping our economy to remain far more resilient to challenges and shocks than it has in the past.

Mr. Boswell: In the new spirit of consensus, and because I suspect that the Chief Secretary would agree that economic growth is the bedrock not only of individual prosperity but of any social advance, does he share my concern about the very sharp decline in the rate of economic growth in recent months?

Mr. Browne: I do agree. However, the bedrock of economic growth is stability. Through the macro-economic framework, we have provided the stability to engender the growth that is necessary to create the wealth of which the hon. Gentleman speaks. We have a record of economic growth that would have been the envy of any previous Government. We have grown consistently.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): May I suggest to my right hon. Friend that one way to develop growth is by improving skills and research and development? What is he doing about that, particularly in relation to the west midlands, which traditionally has had a manufacturing base?

Mr. Browne: I thank my hon. Friend, who has been a consistent champion of those issues on behalf of his constituents and the west midlands. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said earlier, the whole developed world faces the challenge of retaining manufacturing jobs. We need to decide what is the Government's role and what their response should be to those who are challenged in such circumstances. We have set out to respond in a way that allows people to develop the skills that are necessary to face the challenges of the 21st century. Earlier this week, in his pre-Budget report, my right hon. Friend explained how we will further invest in innovation, research and development and the creative industries to develop those opportunities and skills.

Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): In last year's autumn statement, the Chancellor said that in the previous Budget

> "I forecast growth . . . of between 3 and 3¼ per cent . . . Even after the doubling of oil prices". —[Official Report, 2 December 2004; Vol. 428, c. 784.]

We all know that oil prices have doubled and his forecast is halved. Does the Minister agree that the Chancellor's judgment in this matter is flawed, as it is in other matters?

Mr. Browne: The hon. Gentleman's basic facts are wrong. Oil prices were $40 at the beginning of the year and rose to $70. A combination of factors have generated a set of circumstances that have challenged this country's growth, but the resilience of our stable economy has allowed us to continue to grow. Because of that, and because of the stability that is in the economy, we can look forward to increasing growth as forecast in the pre-Budget report.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that skills are especially important in areas such as Northamptonshire where growth has been high and the labour market is tight? What is he doing to encourage staying-on rates at school to provide support for families so that people do not leave school without skills and we can thus improve the skills base of our work force?

Mr. Browne: My hon. Friend makes an important point. We introduced the education maintenance allowance to develop the skills that tight labour markets such as that in her constituency need. I do not have the exact figures for education maintenance allowance in her constituency, but I am sure that, as an assiduous Member of Parliament, she knows them already.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): When was the Chief Secretary first told that the Chancellor's hopelessly optimistic pre-election growth forecast was likely to be wrong?

Mr. Browne: The hon. Gentleman knows that those matters change over the course of the year. I cannot specifically remember when I was told and I am sure that that is not the point of his question. However, he knows that the Office for National Statistics, which tries to calculate growth and other matters that affect the economy, often has to revise its figures retrospectively. I am confident that, even for this year, it will have to revise its figures.

Mr. Osborne: The Government fought an election promising a strong economy this year. We simply want to know when the Chancellor and the Chief Secretary knew that they could not keep that promise.

Let us consider another promise that the Chancellor made. He is keen to point out how young he is feeling these days, but when he was young and doing my job, he said:

> "Raising the trend growth rate of the economy will be an objective of the next Labour Government".

Will the Chief Secretary confirm that page 186 of the pre-Budget report contains an admission that the trend growth rate—the long-term growth rate—of the economy will be lower than it was in 1997?

Mr. Browne: The average growth rate—[Interruption.] The average trend growth rate for the economy is 2.7 per cent. and has risen from an average 2.2 per cent. when we came to power. We have achieved that. The hon. Gentleman had five opportunities in the first six questions to ask the Chancellor his questions. Why does he have to ask them through me? [Interruption.]

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that in the 1970s and a lot of the 1980s, we would have thanked our lucky stars in the coalfield areas for growth of 1.75 per cent.? The only thing growing then were the lines of coke in front of boy George and the rest of them.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This seems to be a trend with the hon. Gentleman. He must withdraw that remark.

Mr. Skinner: It was in the News of the World.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must withdraw the remark.

Mr. Skinner: No, I will not withdraw it. It is true.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman does not withdraw the remark, he must leave the Chamber—I order the hon. Gentleman to leave the Chamber. I am forced now to name the hon. Gentleman. I name Dennis Skinner. He is withdrawing—he has taken my advice.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): You named him.

Mr. Speaker: I know what I have done. The hon. Gentleman has moved and that is the main thing.

British Film Industry

9. Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): What representations he has received in response to his proposals for tax incentives to support the British film industry. [35539]

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): The Treasury consulted extensively with the industry on the proposed new film tax between July and October this year. The consultation informed the announcements on film tax in the pre-Budget report. They included allowing films costing up to £20 million a guaranteed minimum benefit worth 20 per cent. of qualifying production costs and a benefit worth 16 per cent. for films costing more than £20 million. The incentives will be even more valuable for profitable films. That can help achieve our goals for greater sustainability for the British film industry. The industry has warmly welcomed the announcements.

Mr. Whittingdale: When I tabled this question, I intended to be critical of the Chancellor, but, in keeping with our new spirit, I warmly welcome the measures that were announced in the pre-Budget report. However, the Minister will be aware that the uncertainty that has surrounded the fiscal arrangements for the industry has already led to some major film productions being made abroad. Will she confirm that the new measures will not be subject to change, so that the industry can now plan ahead with total certainty?

Dawn Primarolo: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's conversion to supporting the Government. In fairness to him, he has taken an interest in assisting the development of the British film industry for a considerable time. I can confirm that the measures will produce a stable regime for the industry, and that they will be effectively targeted to ensure that we support the producers. If the hon. Gentleman has time to look again at the pre-Budget report, he will also see the announcements regarding the transition from the present regime to the new one. Consultations with the industry are still going on, which is important, but there is general agreement that the measures will offer a stable regime to help the development of the industry.

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware that a good reason to change the tax regime for the film industry was to clamp down on tax avoidance. Following the pre-Budget report, she will know how much we all enjoy blocking gaping tax loopholes, whether they relate to film, fine wines or property speculation. How confident is she that the new film industry regime will be generous enough to help UK film producers while being robust enough to prevent yet another spawning of the so-called tax avoidance industry?

Dawn Primarolo: I can inform my hon. Friend, who also follows these matters with interest, that the incentives will now be more effectively targeted, and therefore less vulnerable to manipulation and avoidance than the current reliefs. It is, however, almost impossible to anticipate the creativity of the avoidance industry. The film industry has welcomed the proposals, saying that they are the best news in five years. They will ensure the security of the regime. I would say to my hon. Friend, however, as I have said to the industry, that if there are any signs of avoidance, we will clamp down on them immediately.

Work Force Skills

11. Sarah McCarthy-Fry (Portsmouth, North) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the impact of the level of skills in the work force on the level of employment. [35542]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): A highly skilled work force is one of the important drivers of economic growth, and people without skills are much less likely to be in employment. The Leitch review of skills, which was published in the interim report on Monday, set out the evidence on the links between work force skills and employment.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is never to late to learn new skills, and that, as well as training our young people, we should also provide retraining opportunities for older people, so that they, too, can take advantage of the employment opportunities in the high-skills sectors?

John Healey: I do indeed. When one in six adults do not have the literacy levels of our 11-year-olds, when 5 million people in the work force today have no qualifications, and when 70 per cent. of our work force of 2020 have already left school, the imperative for greater investment in training, particularly for adults, becomes very clear. We must better direct that training to produce the skills that people need and that employers need, and to help people to become more productive at work.

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): Does the Minister believe that it is the level of skills in the British economy that has caused the continuous rise in unemployment over the past eight or nine months?

John Healey: No. All the evidence suggests that an increase in the level of skills increases people's employment opportunities. Any Government who were not prepared to invest in the skills of the work force would simply be failing in their duty to equip our companies and our people for the future. Any Government who were prepared to allow spending to grow at a slower rate than the growth in the economy would have to make huge cuts in public spending, and would not be able to support the skills that our economy needed.

Mr. Siôn Simon (Birmingham, Erdington) (Lab): The Leitch review showed that the total proportion of the work force with skills had risen to 86 per cent. Presumably that has something to do with the fact that the number of jobs in the economy has risen by 330,000 to a record level—and that, presumably, has something to do with the fact that the level of growth remains positive, as it did not under the Tories. As the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) has made it clear that he does not understand what is going on, can we ensure that I do? Is it possible for the Government to build on all those developments by scrapping the new deal?

John Healey: The new deal has helped more than 1 million people into work, but we must make it a new deal for jobs and skills. The employment prospects of people who can now expect to change jobs seven times during their working lives mean that they will have to train and retrain. Unless we have a skills programme to help our people through the changes that our economy faces increasingly in a global context, we shall fail the future of the country and, more important, the people of the country.

Musicians (National Insurance)

12. Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): If he will make a statement on the recent change in the application of the rules on national insurance contributions to freelance musicians and singers.

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): There have been no recent changes in the application of the rules on national insurance contributions to freelance musicians and singers.

Sammy Wilson: Is the Minister aware that as a result of the change in the rules on class 1 national insurance contributions from freelance musicians, orchestras throughout the United Kingdom will face a bill of £33 million, because the change is backdated to 2001? That will bankrupt many regional orchestras, such as the Ulster orchestra. Given that the development was completely unexpected and orchestras could not budget for it, will the Paymaster General consider either a total or a partial exemption from the backdated liability?

Dawn Primarolo: I repeat that there have been no recent changes in the application of the rules on national insurance contributions to freelance musicians and singers. The last set of changes occurred in 1998. I do know that, as a result of a compliance check, it has been revealed that some employers have not been paying their class 1 national insurance contributions in respect of some musicians and singers. Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs is holding discussions with the Association of British Orchestras, the Musicians Union, the Arts Council and the Department for Culture, Media and Sport to find out exactly how much may be in question, and how to resolve the issue so that our orchestras can continue to provide a fine service for our community.

Business of the House

11.32 am

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): May I ask the Leader of the House to give us the business for next week?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 12 DECEMBER—Second Reading of the Armed Forces Bill.

TUESDAY 13 DECEMBER—There has been a change from what was originally announced. Second Reading of the Criminal Defence Service Bill [Lords], followed by proceedings on the Consolidated Fund Bill, followed by a motion to approve a money resolution on the Climate Change and Sustainable Energy Bill.

WEDNESDAY 14 DECEMBER—A debate on European Affairs on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

THURSDAY 15 DECEMBER—Remaining stages of the National Insurance Contributions Bill.

FRIDAY 16 DECEMBER—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the following week is as follows:

MONDAY 19 DECEMBER—A debate on police restructuring on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

TUESDAY 20 DECEMBER—Motion on the Christmas recess Adjournment.

Chris Grayling: I welcome the Leader of the House back to his place. What with all the reshuffle speculation on both sides of the House this week, I wondered whether he would be here after weekend reports suggesting that he might move to the twilight zone of the Government Chief Whip's Office. Does he agree that, as there is clearly not to be a Government reshuffle this week, it is time to change the session of questions to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster? It is now five weeks since the resignation of the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions and the reshuffle of the former Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, but there has still been no appointment. Many people will see that as a major downgrading of the importance of the Cabinet Office, but if it is what the Prime Minister does intend, let it at least be reflected in the business of the House.

I am glad that there is to be a debate on the police. The more mischievous of those who were here for last week's business questions unfairly suggested that the purpose of the Leader of the House's important ministerial visit overseas was to avoid the flak that his hapless deputy took over the question of a police debate. Members on both sides of the House will be grateful that the right hon. Gentleman has changed his mind and put the police debate into the business statement, but will he also agree to hold the debate on a substantive motion? He spoke about an Adjournment motion, but the House should have the opportunity formally to express a view about this important issue.

Now that the Leader of the House has accepted the mood of the House over policing, will he do the same with respect to another extremely important issue—energy supply—and fulfil the Government's promise to hold a debate on that important issue in their own time? The right hon. Gentleman and I have already exchanged views on energy issues this winter, but the last few weeks have seen the resurgence of debate over the future of nuclear power. Is it not high time that the House had the chance to debate that extremely important policy area?

Is it not also high time that the Government provided the House with fresh information about the Hong Kong trade talks? Time and again this autumn, I have reminded the right hon. Gentleman about the strong views held on both sides of the House on trade justice issues. Why have we not had a statement ahead of those talks? Why are we not being told by the Ministers who will represent us in those talks what their plans are, what is happening and whether there is any hope for a promising outcome?

Finally, I congratulate the Leader of the House on the interview that he gave to epolitix.com back in September. When asked about his political ambitions, he said:

"The Conservatives need to be revived . . . it is good for our democracy that we have a strong opposition".

I hope that he shares my pleasure that his political ambitions are now being fulfilled.

Mr. Hoon: Of course, I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman is still in his place and still continuing his shadow role. I just hope that he has not been spending too many of the last 24 hours with his telephone.

On the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, that is a matter for the Prime Minister, who will resolve it in good time. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman, having whinged about not having a debate on police restructuring, is whingeing again now that we are having one. Clearly, whingeing is the current stance on the Conservative Front Bench, but I suppose that I should not be particularly surprised about that. I am sure that, in due course, we will have time to debate energy supplies and, indeed, trade justice issues. As the hon. Gentleman rightly says, important negotiations on trade justice issues are about to commence.

I stand entirely by what I said in the interview to which the hon. Gentleman referred: I want to see the Conservative party continue as a strong Opposition for a very long time.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Earlier this week, the Government announced that they were consulting widely outside the House on the Pensions Commission report. On our return after the Christmas recess, may we have an Adjournment debate on the subject so that Members can also offer their views to the Government?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for raising an issue that is regarded as important throughout the House and, indeed, throughout the country. I certainly anticipate that we will have opportunities to debate that important issue and I shall certainly try to find time to debate it as soon as possible.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I welcome the debate on police restructuring, but can we have an urgent debate on the Metropolitan police's use of section 132 of the Serious Organised Crime and Police

[Mr. David Heath]

Act 2005? It was sold to us on the basis that it was intended to prevent terrorist acts against the House, but it has now been used to convict a young lady, Maya Evans, for reading out by the cenotaph a list of British soldiers killed in action in Iraq.

May we have an urgent debate on the landmark judgment by the House of Lords today that evidence obtained from torture anywhere in the world is not admissible in legal proceedings of any sort in this country? I note that the noble Lord Brown of Eaton-Under-Heywood said:

"Torture is an unqualified evil. It can never be justified. Rather it must always be punished. So much is not in doubt."

I hope that the House agrees with those sentiments.

That leads me to ask for an urgent debate on what is euphemistically called "extraordinary rendition". The Prime Minister, in an extraordinary response to my right hon. Friend the Member for Ross, Skye and Lochaber (Mr. Kennedy), said:

"In respect of airports, I do not know what the right hon. Gentleman is referring to."—[Official Report, 7 December 2005; Vol. 440, c. 863.]

I do not know whether he was surprised or being disingenuous, but the facts have been widely published and come from authoritative sources. May we have a debate in which we can ask how long we have acquiesced in the United States' policy, for what reason there have been so many of these flights and why the Foreign Secretary has been busy writing to the US Administration asking what all this is about, given that it is clear that the Prime Minister has known all along?

Mr. Hoon: First, all hon. Members would expect to see the law of the land upheld. I am sure that that is true of the Liberal Democrats, although sometimes—if I may speak frankly to the House—the hon. Gentleman chooses which laws he believes should be upheld. In this case, legislation that is widely supported in this House requires that an application be made before a demonstration can be organised. That legislation has worked remarkably well. Since it came into force on 1 August, there have been some 63 applications for demonstrations; those have been granted and demonstrations have taken place perfectly properly. In the particular case to which the hon. Gentleman refers—in rather hysterical terms, as ever—such an application was not made. There was no good reason for not making an application, other than simply to challenge the law. There is a strong tradition in western democracy of people seeking to challenge laws with which they disagree, but of course, those people recognise that the consequence of doing so is that they then face criminal penalties. That is precisely what happened in this case.

The Government will have to study this morning's decision by the Law Lords extremely carefully. We do not in any way condone the use of torture, and a complex decision of this kind obviously needs careful analysis. But again, I hope that all hon. Members will support the Government and me in saying that we as a country must use effective measures to deal with the threat of international terrorism. I hope that that applies even to the Liberal Democrats.

The hon. Gentleman will know full well that there is no exact definition of rendition. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has written to the US Secretary of State on the question and has received a full and detailed response. I hope that both my right hon. Friend's statement—and, indeed, that of the US Secretary of State—is a very full explanation of the position.

Barbara Keeley (Worsley) (Lab): There is great concern about attacks on firefighters; indeed, there have been 185 incidents against fire crews in Greater Manchester so far this year, and it is unfortunate that a high proportion of those have been in Salford. Following this, the Greater Manchester fire and rescue service, the Chief Fire Officers Association and the Manchester Evening News have got together and are campaigning with Greater Manchester MPs to bring our legislation into line with that in Scotland. In the light of that, does my right hon. Friend agree that we should have a debate on the safety of fire crews, and will the Government consider supporting the private Member's Bill introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams)?

Mr. Hoon: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend for raising this important subject, which has been raised, for example, by the Trades Union Congress on behalf of a wide range of public servants. The shocking fact has been highlighted that public servants doing their very best to help protect members of the public are being subject to attack in the course of carrying out their duties. This problem is not isolated to firefighters—it is faced by a number of other dedicated and distinguished public servants. I find that deeply shocking and my hon. Friend is right to raise this issue. The Government obviously must have careful regard to it and take action, if we can, to demonstrate ways in which to prevent these appalling acts of violence against dedicated public servants. My hon. Friend, other Members and I will want to pay tribute to the work that firefighters in particular do on behalf of all our communities.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): I should like to support the earlier comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling). The Leader of the House and I have been present for business questions in recent times, so he and I both know that the mood of the House was very much for a debate on police restructuring on a substantive motion, thereby allowing the House to express an opinion. Given that he has returned from his overseas visit in a more refreshed mode and has granted that debate, perhaps he might find time to go on another trip, so that he can return next week and tell us that we can have a debate on a substantive motion, allowing the House to express an opinion on a matter that the Home Secretary has said is more important than any other on his current agenda.

Mr. Hoon: I am always extremely grateful for protestations of concern about my health and welfare, especially from Opposition Members. I shall be representing the UK next week at the European Parliament in Strasbourg, and I hope that that will have a suitably refreshing effect. It is sad that, for five years, it did not have that effect on the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), but as we approach the Christmas season I hope that all hon. Members will be refreshed at the prospect of a break.

Mr. Ian Austin (Dudley, North) (Lab): May I ask whether it might be possible to have a debate about the way that local authorities close primary schools? In my constituency, Dudley's Conservative-controlled council plans to close two very good schools, Highfields primary and Sycamore Green. The consultation process has been very unsatisfactory, to say the least. The council has failed to consider any alternatives, such as Sure Start schemes, children's centres or other community facilities, and it has not even replied to letters and petitions submitted by parents and governors who, together with councillors Ridney, Finch, Davies, Aston, Mottram and Johnson, have fought such a great campaign.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend raises an important issue. Clearly, it is extremely worrying for parents of children at primary schools if they do not have the opportunity to participate in proper consultation about closure proposals. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the matter in the way that he has.

Grant Shapps (Welwyn Hatfield) (Con): Earlier this year, the Prime Minister told Parliament that special advisers should be made to attend Select Committees on exactly the same basis as civil servants, yet last month he blocked his own special adviser, Lord Birt, from attending the Select Committee on Public Administration. May we have an urgent debate on the matter? To many of us, that seems like a case of the Prime Minister saying one thing in public and doing something completely different in private, when it comes to his own business.

Mr. Hoon: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman was not present two weeks ago when this matter was raised, as he would have heard my comprehensive answer. Perhaps he could spend his time over the Christmas recess profitably by studying the Osmotherly rules, which set out very precisely the circumstances in which Ministers may give permission for civil servants, special advisers and others to represent them before Select Committees. Those rules have been in place for a long time, and the point is that they have not changed.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): There is often a degree of scepticism about the value of business questions and early-day motions. My early-day motion 1123 states:

[That this House believes that the proposal to offer tax relief on the purchase of homes under the Self-Invested Personal Pension Scheme rules commencing in April 2006 provides insufficient public benefit, will encourage the purchase of second homes, and will put Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs in a difficult policing position in regard to the pensionholder's use of a property; notes that the investment industry's estimates of the volume of this business far exceeds the Government's and that there may be a higher loss of taxation than expected; and calls upon the Government to apply the tax relief solely to homes made available for social housing, and to ensure that such homes are offered free of rent to the social housing provider managing the property.]

The motion deals with self-invested personal pensions, an issue that I have raised several times. I am pleased that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has seen fit to withdraw the second home option from that particular tax incentive.

Will my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House say whether there has been any indication from the Treasury team that the second recommendation in that motion will be taken up? It proposes that such incentives might be allowable if the home concerned were made available for social letting at an affordable rent. Such housing is in very short supply in parts of my constituency.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is a near neighbour of mine in the east midlands, and I have never doubted his influence, or his ability to change Government policy. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor takes very seriously the expressions of opinion in early-day motions. Clearly, he has responded with alacrity to my hon. Friend's proposal, but whether he will do so in relation to the second limb of the motion remains to be seen.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): It is several weeks since the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland was able to sneak into a Belfast hotel and announce to journalists plans for the review of public administration in Northern Ireland. Those plans affect education, health and planning, and completely turn local government on its head. The right hon. Gentleman has yet to come to this House to be answerable to hon. Members for his actions. Will the Leader of the House arrange for Government time to be made available for the Secretary of State to do just that?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman and I disagree on only one aspect of this matter. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland spends every day looking for ways to improve public administration and the standard of life for people in what is an important part of the UK, and continues to do so. Obviously, it is important that he discusses and debates those matters with those hon. Members who represent Northern Ireland, and I am sure that he will give the hon. Gentleman every opportunity to raise these matters with him.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Now that regional government is dead and buried, can my hon. Friend arrange for a Grand Committee to be set up to represent the regions? It is embarrassing that we should have bureaucrats and quangos who are accountable to nobody. Why not make them accountable to a Grand Committee representing regions such as the north-west, which is bigger than Scotland and has more representation in Parliament? We should have a say on how the money is spent or wasted.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend makes an interesting suggestion and I assure him that the Government will consider it carefully. However, he makes an unfortunate observation about the role of civil servants in the regions. They are of course accountable to this Parliament through the Minister who is responsible for their activities, and that has not changed. One of the benefits of having civil servants operating in the regional centres is that they are closer to the people whom they affect by their decisions. That is something that I would have thought that my hon. Friend would welcome.

Stephen Hammond (Wimbledon) (Con): Earlier this year the South-West London health authority concluded its consultation, "Better Healthcare Closer to Home". It concluded that Merton and Sutton needed six local care centres and one acute hospital. However, there was some disagreement about that and the hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Siobhain McDonagh) objected and referred the consultation to the Secretary of State for Health. She did so in late June. The subsequent delay is harming my constituents' prospects of getting better health care at the Nelson hospital. Will the Leader of the House ask the Secretary of State to make a statement on the delay, give reasons for it and give a date when we might receive the result of her deliberations and the rationale behind them?

Mr. Hoon: I am obviously not familiar with the particular circumstances that the hon. Gentleman sets out, but I assure him that I will bring the matter to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health and invite her to write to him directly.

Geraldine Smith (Morecambe and Lunesdale) (Lab): My right hon. Friend and other hon. Members may not be aware of recent changes to the accommodation provided for the Members' post office. The sorting room, rest area, stationery lockers and storage facilities have all been removed and the sorting of Members' mail has to be carried out in a tiny room. Could my right hon. Friend investigate that matter for me and report back to the House? It is not clear who made the decision to change the accommodation facilities.

Mr. Hoon: Again, that is a matter of which I was not aware before today's proceedings, but I will certainly look into it and get back to my hon. Friend in due course.

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): The Leader of the House may be aware of the inquest into the deaths of 91 victims of the Asian tsunami. However, the inquest is not considering the support given by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to the UK victims. One statement by the Permanent Secretary has caused great offence and upset. He claimed that the support given "exceeded our expectations". As one who was caught up in the tsunami, I can say that what support was given was at best ineffectual and at worst inept. May we have a debate on that topic?

Mr. Hoon: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will understand why I do not comment on current proceedings before an inquest. However, there has been a thorough and detailed report on the way in which the FCO dealt with the immediate aftermath of the tsunami. It contains some criticisms, which have been acknowledged by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, and it is an indication that we must learn lessons and be in a position to anticipate such terrible tragedies in the future. That acknowledgement by my right hon. Friend indicates that we take seriously our responsibilities and that we will learn lessons from that terrible tragedy.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): May we have a statement or a debate on the establishment of a new railway station outside the Ricoh arena in Coventry? This matter has dragged on for far too long and it needs to be pushed. I am sure that I speak for my two Coventry colleagues.

Mr. Hoon: I have driven by that magnificent new stadium and seen the facilities now available for the people of Coventry, so I recognise why my hon. Friend makes his suggestion. I will draw it to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): Many of my right hon. and hon. Friends have strong views about the Government's proposals for police reform and have pressed the Government for a debate. On reflection, does he agree that it was ungenerous of him to describe such representations on behalf of our constituents as "whingeing"? Will he now answer the question that he has been asked twice by my hon. Friends the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) and for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper)? Why can we not have a debate on a substantive motion, or are the Government no longer interested in the expressed view of Parliament?

Mr. Hoon: The right hon. Member will know, given his careful attention to such matters, that the process is a long one. The early stages include the opportunity for voluntary amalgamations by police forces who judge that to be appropriate, followed—in the event that there is no agreement on a way forward—by a longer period of consultation. In the spirit in which the issue has been raised in recent weeks, it is right that right hon. and hon. Members should have the opportunity to express their views in anticipation of that second stage, but obviously before any specific conclusions are reached, it would not be appropriate to have a debate on a substantive motion.

Mr. Fraser Kemp (Houghton and Washington, East) (Lab): In this new era of bipartisanship, will the Leader of the House join me and the Conservative Opposition in endorsing the views expressed by the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) on 15 November? He outlined the view that Opposition Front Benchers should divest themselves of any outside interests that conflict with their position. Will my right hon. Friend endorse that view, especially bearing in mind the concerns expressed by the Committee on Standards in Public Life?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend makes an interesting suggestion and the issue will certainly be a test of bipartisanship. The hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) has recently talked regularly of observing not only the spirit but the letter of the ministerial code, but does he believe that the spirit of the ministerial code should also apply to Opposition Front Benchers? If he wishes to encourage Ministers to observe the spirit of the code, it should apply equally to Opposition Front Benchers.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): Following the question asked by the hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen), may I press the Leader of the House for a ministerial statement once the coroner's inquest on those who died in the tsunami disaster is over? The report that has been published has shown significant failings in Thailand in particular, in contrast to Sri Lanka and Indonesia, where the FCO behaved well and did a great job. It is important for the victims, and so that the lessons can be learned, that we have a statement—if not a debate—immediately after the coroner's report.

Mr. Hoon: The right hon. Gentleman raises the issue in a fair and proper way. He will know from his own previous ministerial experience that Governments always look carefully at any recommendations made by coroners arising out of the inquests that they conduct. I assure him that if the coroner does make specific recommendations, they will be considered in the same way as the recommendations of the recent report have been considered by the Government.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, South) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend allow an early debate on the importance to our national life of the print media? That would give the House an opportunity to express our concerns about the atrocious mismanagement of the Daily Record and Sunday Mail newspapers by their owners, Trinity Mirror Management, and the plans to downgrade the former from an excellent national newspaper to a regional newspaper by closing its Aberdeen and Dundee editorial offices.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has raised an important issue for his constituents and the country that he serves so well in this Parliament. I am sure that the message will be received by those whom he wants to hear it.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): Surely this House is entitled to at least a statement on the whole issue of rendition flights, so that hon. Members can question Ministers on what they know about such flights. Today we learn that airport staff may be subject to prosecution if they service those flights. Significant legal opinion suggests that they may be aiding and abetting an illegal activity by doing so. Surely, given all the public concern, a Minister must come to the Dispatch Box and explain what he knows about the matter.

Mr. Hoon: As I made clear earlier, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has clearly set out not only the Government's position but that of the EU presidency, following the exchange of correspondence with the United States Secretary of State. There are a number of opportunities to raise those issues, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will take full advantage of them.

Ms Diana R. Johnson (Kingston upon Hull, North) (Lab): I have an important issue to raise with the Leader of the House about housekeeping matters. As a great tea drinker, I wonder whether he can explain why, when carrying out their duties during lengthy Standing Committee sittings, hon. Members are allowed to drink only water, not tea and coffee. Can he explain that to me?

Mr. Hoon: I have noticed in recent weeks that the range of my responsibilities has been expanding to include the post office, the bar downstairs and, now, the question of stimulants in Committees. That may well be a matter that I must draw to the attention of Mr. Speaker's distinguished Chairmen's Panel because I suspect that it is more in its province than mine.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): That last question took the biscuit. [HON. MEMBERS: "Resign!"] I have nothing to resign from.

May I ask the Leader of the House for an early debate on British representation overseas? As he will know, this year and next year, a number of our high commissions, embassies and consulates will close, including those in Lesotho, Madagascar, Swaziland, Tonga, Vanuatu, Kiribati, Bahamas and a number of consulates in the United States and Germany. He must understand that lowering the British flag also lowers our influence and that the vacuum created will be filled by other countries—including, of course, China.

Mr. Hoon: I am aware of some restructuring of the way in which Britain organises its representation overseas. The hon. Gentleman is perhaps only telling the House half the story in the sense that, clearly, that representation is being extended in other parts of the world. At all stages, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, who is responsible for such matters, has sought to maintain the United Kingdom's considerable influence around the world. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me the opportunity to pay tribute to those diplomats and civil servants who serve us so well overseas.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend is aware that the Government of Wales Bill will be presented to the House this afternoon. I welcome the Bill, particularly as the Welsh Assembly will be given increased legislative powers, but it is disappointing that we do not yet have a date for the Second Reading. Can he give an indication of when the debate on Second Reading is likely to take place? Can he confirm whether the Bill's consideration in Committee will take place on the Floor of the House?

Mr. Hoon: I certainly hope that my hon. Friend will not have to wait too long for details of the Second Reading of that particularly important Bill for Wales. We will look at the appropriate rules to see how such major constitutional legislation should be dealt with properly.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): May I support the call by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) for an early debate, or at least a statement, on extraordinary rendition? It is a matter of very great concern if the United States is flying people across the world to be interrogated in private places beyond the reach of the law, whether local or international. That is a sort of mobile Guantanamo bay. It cannot be right. We need to know what is going on, and we need the opportunity to express our views.

Mr. Hoon: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is a distinguished Member. He knows full well that the United States Secretary of State has set out very clearly that what he is claiming is simply not the case: the United States is not involved in transporting people across the world for the purposes of torture. The United States rigorously observes the relevant US law and, indeed, the relevant international treaties.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): In Northern Ireland, we have been informed this morning that the prosecution has decided to adduce no evidence in the case against those responsible for the Stormont spy ring, which brought down the Northern Ireland Administration in 2002. That has caused great anxiety and consternation among the people of Northern Ireland this morning. May we have a statement or an early debate to indicate what are the reasons behind the public interest in refusing to pursue a case where the IRA and Sinn Fein were exposed as having been at the centre of a major spying operation against Government and security forces in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman knows full well that those matters are determined by both an independent police force and, indeed, an independent prosecuting authority, and it simply would not be right for a Minister to comment on those independent decisions.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): Like many colleagues, I have constituents who are in tears of frustration and distress at the workings of the tax credit system—including a woman who broke down when telling my wife that she had to receive bags of groceries because she has been asked to repay an overpayment so quickly. In view of that, would it not have been better for the Paymaster General to have come to the House on Monday to make a statement and listen to those concerns raised by right hon. and hon. Members, instead of placing a written statement in the Library?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman is always fair and reasonable in his observations in the House, but my recollection is that the last Minister at the Dispatch Box was my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General. I am sure that he could have used his ingenuity to raise that issue during an hour of Treasury questions.

Alistair Burt: That was not the point.

Mr. Hoon: Nevertheless, before the hon. Gentleman gets too agitated, I recognise that there have been individual cases where the tax credit system has not worked as well as it should have done. That is one of the reasons why my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General has been looking very carefully at finding ways in which to improve the operation of the scheme. However, I emphasise that the overwhelming majority of people and families in receipt of tax credits have received that money successfully and that that has provided a major improvement in their standard of living and allowed many people to return to work, thus allowing families who would otherwise struggle financially to achieve a proper standard of living.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): You, Mr. Speaker, will have been as shocked as I was when David Sherlock, the chief inspector of the adult learning inspectorate, condemned a £2 billion Government drive to improve basic literacy and numeracy levels as a "depressing failure". Ministers have crowed that their skills for life programme was on target. Now we know that half the people included in the target number were 16 and 17-year-old college students who were already enrolled on basic literacy and numeracy courses. Will the Leader of the House arrange for a Minister to come to the House to explain why the scheme failed and why the Government claimed that it was on target when it was clearly far from that? That is a disgrace, and the Leader of the House should acknowledge it and do something about it.

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman picks on a disputed aspect of reports in relation to adult education. The Government have exceeded the targets that we set in relation to adult basic skills, with more than 1 million adults gaining a first qualification in language, literacy or numeracy. There are inevitably difficulties with all schemes, but I hope that, being fair-minded, he would recognise that, overall, those schemes have been remarkably successful in providing skills, opportunities, training and education to a large number of people who would otherwise not be able to join our work force.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): May I ask the Leader of the House for an urgent statement on the differing availability of life-saving anti-cancer drugs in different parts of the country? My constituent, Mr. Brian Jago, is dying of cancer. His consultants say that Velcade, a new drug, could save his life and that probably nothing else could. If he lived in Cardiff or Edinburgh, we believe that the word of the consultants would be enough for him to be prescribed the drug. As he lives near Southampton, a district prescribing committee's permission is required, and that has not been given. May we have a statement about whose word should run in these matters—that of a prescribing committee, or that of the consultants concerned with the welfare of the patients?

Mr. Hoon: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I do not intend to be drawn into the circumstances of that particular patient—obviously we are all concerned about his position—nor indeed of the particular drug. I accept that consistency across the country is necessary, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has had regard to that in relation to a number of high-profile cases. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that that consistency must be determined by national standards, not least in relation to new drugs, as it is important for those who are likely to use them that the drugs are tested and satisfy stringent standards before being employed. I assure him that the Government are working hard to eliminate the type of discrepancy that he appears to be describing.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): The Leader of the House has described police restructuring as a long process. I have to tell him that it certainly does not look like that to the police forces and police authorities being restructured, because the decisions that they are being invited to take by 23 December do not include the status quo. May I reinforce calls for a debate on a substantive motion on 19 December, where the Government at least attempt to make the case for change in the House and to review the options presented to police authorities and forces up and down the country?

Mr. Hoon: I will not set out again the process points that I raised earlier, but the hon. Gentleman will know that the deadline of 23 December was set so as to allow voluntary amalgamation where police forces thought that it was in their interests to save costs, for example, by amalgamating backroom office functions and ensuring that there was a range of extra equipment across larger police organisations. That is all set out in the inspector's report, which I am sure that he has read in detail, and which is about a recommendation from senior police officers that there is a necessity—an absolute requirement—to improve the equipment and facilities available to our police forces across the country, and that must after all be in the interests of our constituents. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will look at the report and contribute to the debate on 19 December, when I shall take careful note of whether all the colleagues who called for the debate are in the Chamber to participate, as it is important that Members have the opportunity to set out their views. This process is in the interests of our constituents and to their benefit. That is why leading police officers have put it forward.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): Will the Leader of the House urgently find Government time to address the problems of identity fraud that are occurring throughout the country? Last year, it is estimated that 135,000 people had their identity stolen and had to pay up to £8,000 to have it legally returned. Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the matter urgently as it appears to threaten more than 1 million people?

Mr. Hoon: The Government share entirely the hon. Gentleman's concern about identity fraud. It is a problem for both the public sector and, crucially, the private sector, which is one of the reasons why the Government are bringing forward proposals for a system of identity cards. So on the next occasion that we debate the matter in the House, I look forward to the hon. Gentleman's support, otherwise he is simply raising issues with no intention of doing anything about them.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Given that the Leader of the House expects us to be grovellingly grateful that he has finally consented to give us a debate on police restructuring, albeit in the last day or two before the Christmas recess, why is he afraid of having a substantive vote? Is it because he realises that it will expose yet again that a large number, if not a majority, of his Back Benchers are almost certainly against that absurd and dangerous proposal? Will he use his limited ingenuity to find some way even now of giving us a substantive vote on the issue on the Floor of the House, so that the Government can know, in numbers, how wrong they have got it?

Mr. Hoon: I am enormously relieved that the right hon. Gentleman has not succumbed to the charm offensive emanating from the Conservative Front Bench, although I am sure that all Members will join me in rejecting the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) the other day, that the right hon. Gentleman is a Victor Meldrew figure. That was clearly an outrageous assertion that no one could possibly want to agree with, apart perhaps from the hon. Member for Buckingham, who no doubt thought better of it as soon as he had made it.

I have set out the Government's decisions. We are having a debate on the matter before Christmas, which I thought Opposition Members were keen to do, and that will give all Members the opportunity to set out their strong views.

Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): Will the Leader of the House urgently investigate, or allow a debate on, the guidance and procedures for ministerial travel? The reason for that is that I have twice asked the Prime Minister when he last travelled on the London underground; like me, the Leader of the House will be aware that the matter is of great public interest. The 1997 code, item e, "Public Accountability", states:

"Individual Ministers are responsible for justifying their actions and decisions to Parliament"— on the use of transport. It continued:

"They will wish to be satisfied that their arrangements could be defended in public."

It is most interesting that that was written by the Prime Minister, so when will he come to the House to answer my written and oral questions about when he last used the tube? That is a matter of great public interest.

Mr. Hoon: I am sure that it is a matter of great interest to the hon. Gentleman. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister scrupulously observes the terms of the ministerial code and has always done so.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Will the Leader of the House arrange for the Home Secretary to come to the House to make a statement on the Government's policy on illegal drugs and the reclassification of cannabis? Does he agree with the Home Secretary that having 4 oz of cannabis resin or 18 oz of cannabis leaf is an appropriate threshold between personal use and supply?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman is referring to guidance issued for judgments made by individual prosecutors in individual cases as to how particular types of offence should be prosecuted. That is always a matter for the discretion of prosecutors and police officers. As I said in answer to an earlier question, it is not right that Ministers should make observations about that type of individual discretion. It is an essential part of our criminal justice process that such discretion lies in the hands of those who exercise it.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): As my hon. Friend the shadow Leader of the House asked earlier, and as I have repeatedly requested, may we have an urgent debate in Government time on trade justice and freer trade? Given that meeting the millennium development goals on reducing maternal mortality and child mortality will cost $6 billion a year and that the richest nations on earth subsidise their agriculture to the tune of $6 billion a week, does the Leader of the House agree that a debate in the House would allow colleagues to argue passionately—as I certainly would, if I caught your eye, Mr. Speaker—that reforming wholesale the socialist subsidy system in international trade is not only fiscally desirable but morally imperative?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman regularly raises those issues with considerable effect, and in a way with which, generally, Ministers agree. The Government have taken precisely the type of action he describes. We negotiate vigorously in all international organisations to promote freer trade and justice. Indeed, we have to do so partly because of the failure of the previous Conservative Government to engage in that very process.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): The Leader of the House will be aware of the excitement engendered by the prospect of the 2012 Olympics and the stated aim of the British Olympic Association to move the UK from 10th to fourth in the medal table, so will he arrange an early debate on the funding of elite athletes? The BOA was expecting the announcement of an extra £25 million of funding in the Chancellor's pre-Budget report but that announcement was not forthcoming. Any delay will undoubtedly harm our chances at both the 2008 and the 2012 Olympics and the BOA described the decision as "devastating news for British sport".

Mr. Hoon: It is important that we continue to support our elite athletes. The Government have put much financial backing behind them and, as a result, there were significant improvements in our results at the recent Olympics. The matter is obviously something for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport and I will ensure that it is drawn to her attention.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I have a constituent who is seriously ill and has to undergo chemotherapy. She is also a witness in a court case. On three occasions, she has been required to attend court, and her relatives have come down from the north of England, and on three occasions the Prison Service has not delivered the prisoner to court. Will the Leader of the House arrange an urgent debate on Her Majesty's Prison Service?

Mr. Hoon: I will not comment on the specific case, but from my experiences and those of my constituents over the years, I know that there is a problem from time to time in ensuring that not only prisoners, but witnesses and all people involved in court cases, are brought to court on the right date. Nothing is worse, especially for victims, than cases that do not go ahead as scheduled. The Government have devoted an enormous amount of effort and energy to improving the procedures so that we can ensure that the experience suffered by the hon. Gentleman's constituent is not repeated.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Has the Leader of the House had a chance to have a look at the Honours (Prevention of Abuses) Act 1925 and the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act 1889? Will he confirm that both those Acts are still on the statute book and have not been superseded by other legislation? If it were shown that a senior Government Minister in the Lords had fallen foul of those pieces of legislation, would the Leader of the House support calls for his dismissal from public office?

Mr. Hoon: I have not studied either of those pieces of legislation recently. Since I used to be paid for giving legal advice—[Interruption.] Rather better paid than I am today, it is true. I do not know whether those Acts of Parliament are in force in their entirety or in part, but I assure the hon. Gentleman, as I assure the House, that Government Ministers observe all relevant legislation at all times.

Hercules Crash (Board of Inquiry)

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): I am able to inform the House today of the findings of the Royal Air Force board of inquiry into the tragic crash of the RAF Hercules XV179 in Iraq on 30 January 2005. May I say at the beginning that I very much regret that some of the details appeared in two newspapers this morning? Some information was accurate, some was inaccurate and some was speculative. I apologise to you for that, Mr. Speaker. The only consolation is that the families had already been met and briefed before the reports appeared this morning.

I first pay tribute to the 10 service personnel who tragically lost their lives aboard the Hercules while carrying out their duties: Flight Lieutenant David Stead, Flight Lieutenant Paul Pardoel, Flight Lieutenant Andrew Smith, Master Air Engineer Gary Nicholson, Flight Sergeant Mark Gibson, Chief Technician Richard Brown, Sergeant Robert O'Connor, Corporal David Williams, Lance Corporal Steven Jones and Squadron Leader Patrick Marshall. I am immensely proud of our armed forces and the work that they undertake on our behalf, as I am sure the whole House is. This was the biggest single loss of life in a single incident to enemy action in Iraq. Those 10 brave men lost their lives while working in support of the coalition operation in Iraq. We owe them, and all the other personnel who daily confront danger, our respect and gratitude.

We must not forget the families and friends of those men. I am sure that the House will join me in offering our sympathy and deepest condolences. The Ministry of Defence, the Royal Air Force and RAF Lyneham, especially, continue to provide those families and friends with support while they come to terms with the tragedy. I recognise that the board of inquiry report will be painful reading for them, but I hope that they will take some comfort in finding answers to the many questions that arise after such an incident. I felt it important that the families were given time to prepare for the inevitable media interest, so they were briefed by an RAF team yesterday on the conclusions of the board of inquiry. Notwithstanding the prerogative of the House to be informed about such an event, I hope that everyone understands and supports the steps that were taken to inform the families first. They will be able to rely on the support of their friends and colleagues in the Army and the RAF, both formally and informally, for as long as they need it. I also pay tribute to RAF Lyneham. Its close community was hit very hard indeed by the tragedy, yet it managed to maintain its magnificent support for our deployed forces, both at the time of the crash and subsequently.

Turning now to the report itself, I remind hon. Members that the purpose of a board of inquiry is to establish the circumstances of a crash and to learn lessons. It does not seek to apportion blame. The board of inquiry was convened the day after the event, on 31 January, and has considered a mass of evidence. The board established that, on 30 January 2005, an RAF Hercules C-130K took off from Baghdad at 13:24 Greenwich mean time en route to Balad, which is to the north of Baghdad, on a routine operational passenger and freight flight. Six minutes later, at 13:30 GMT, a radio message was received from the crew stating that the aircraft was on fire. At 13:55, the Hercules was confirmed as missing—that was the time of its expected arrival at Balad. At 14:15, the crash site was found by a US helicopter formation.

On our behalf, US forces established a cordon around the crash scene and maintained it for as long as it was considered safe to do so. They did that at risk to themselves, and I am very grateful to them. The board of inquiry was convened and took on the task of recovering the bodies of the deceased and examining the aircraft wreckage for evidence. I commend the professionalism and dedication of all those involved in that difficult and harrowing work. The task had to be completed as swiftly as possible because of the ever-present threat of hostile attack. Much of the wreckage could not be retrieved in the time available before the cordon was lifted.

Despite the loss of physical evidence, the lack of credible witnesses close to the crash site and the absence of an accident data recorder, the board of inquiry has nevertheless conducted a thorough and comprehensive investigation. The board examined all possible causes, eliminated those not supported by the available evidence and then thoroughly analysed the remainder until the most likely cause was identified. Throughout the process, the board was assisted by other agencies, including a senior air accident investigator from the air accidents investigation branch—the AAIB—of the Department for Transport. The experienced investigator independently investigated the crash in parallel with the board and his findings fully support those of the board. Furthermore, the AAIB investigator has stated that he was impressed by the approach adopted by the RAF team given the exceptionally difficult circumstances of the investigation.

On 7 March, my predecessor—now the Leader of the House—made a written statement to the House about the inquiry's interim findings. The interim statement ruled out a number of possible causes for the crash. After exhaustive analysis, the board of inquiry has concluded that the aircraft crashed because it became uncontrollable after hostile ground-to-air fire caused the outboard right-hand wing to explode and separate from the aircraft. The crash was not survivable. The board identified three contributory factors: flying at low level in daylight made the aircraft vulnerable to some types of ground-to-air fire; the lack of a fuel tank inerting system in the wing fuel tank meant that it was possible for an explosive fuel-air mixture to develop; and the flow of intelligence information regarding ground-to-air fire was not as robust as it might have been.

I remind the House that the purpose of the inquiry in identifying those factors is to learn for the future, rather than to apportion any blame. The board made a number of recommendations that we will study closely. We have, indeed, acted on many of them already. During the course of the inquiry, as the findings were emerging, the commander-in-chief of RAF Strike Command instigated a number of steps. C-130 tactics have been reviewed and low-level flying in daylight is now avoided wherever possible. However, it has not been prohibited as it can sometimes be the safest way of achieving an operational objective. We need to allow operational commanders in theatre the flexibility to choose the safest effective tactics to achieve their mission. The fitting of a fuel tank inerting system is being investigated as a matter of urgency and we have made changes to our ground-to-air fire reporting and dissemination system.

Now that the board of inquiry has concluded, the full contents of the report will be thoroughly considered and acted on as appropriate. While we have to accept that any deployment of UK troops involves a degree of risk—sometimes considerable risk—the security of British servicemen and women deployed to Iraq and elsewhere remains our highest priority. We owe it to our personnel to do everything we can to ensure their safety.

This is a very comprehensive report. A military aircraft accident summary will be placed in the Library of the House and on the internet site of the Ministry of Defence. In addition, a redacted version of the main body of the board of inquiry report will be available on our internet site. As the House will appreciate, the safety of our people is a principal consideration and we have rightly removed from the report any information that might endanger the security or capability of UK and coalition personnel or that might be of use to an enemy. That is the purpose of the redaction. For example, we have, for operational reasons, removed the detail of the exact weapon type used against the Hercules. To divulge that information might give the insurgents what they need to replicate the attack. It would be unhelpful to our forces and our coalition partners for the media to speculate on the weapon deployed. That is not a theoretical risk; it is very real. We have, however, tried to be as open as possible under all the circumstances.

Our forces have made a significant contribution to the creation of the right conditions for wider peace and stability in Iraq. They have done, and continue to do, an excellent job in difficult conditions. Our deepest sympathies go out to those who have lost loved ones or who have been injured in operations. I can only speak in the highest terms of the qualities of all personnel who serve, and have served, there—qualities that I know from my own visits and discussions with them.

In conclusion, therefore, the board of inquiry into the crash of Hercules XV179 is now complete. I repeat my gratitude to the president of the board and his team for their painstaking work. I am sure that the House will join me once again in expressing deepest sympathies to the families and friends of the victims of this tragic incident. We must never forget, nor will we ever forget or underestimate the courage and professionalism of our service personnel in carrying out the tasks required of them.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring) (Con): I thank the Secretary of State for his statement. We welcome the results of the inquiry and its thorough nature. We will study its conclusions in great detail. On behalf of the Opposition, may I again send our sympathy and condolences to the family and friends of those who were killed in this tragic incident?

It is true that such tragedies are unavoidable in warfare, so we pay tribute to the bravery and professionalism of all our armed forces involved in the Iraq conflict. It is worth reiterating and remembering why they are there, and why they are making those sacrifices. They are doing so to help the people of Iraq achieve freedom, escape tyranny, develop the rule of law and live in a country that respects human rights. Those are noble ideals to fight or die for.

I agree that it is not appropriate for the House to ask detailed operational questions that could compromise the safety of our troops, but the families of the crew, Hercules passengers and the British public more widely will have concerns with which the Secretary of State may wish to deal.

There are four specific areas of concern. How many similar incidents were identified before this particular one involving British or American forces in Iraq or Afghanistan, and what changes were implemented as a result? On alterations to aircraft, the Secretary of State said that the fitting of a fuel tank inerting system was being looked at as a matter of urgency. What time scale does that involve? I entirely understand and agree that it would be inappropriate—in fact, dangerous—to speculate on the type of weaponry involved but, without giving details that might compromise the safety of our forces, can he tell us how widespread is the availability of such weaponry and what is its origin?

Finally, the Secretary of State said that the flow of intelligence information on ground-to-air fire was not as robust as it could be. Does that mean that, on that occasion, intelligence about the specific threat in the area was available but not passed to the flight crew? That would indeed be a tragedy. Fatalities are inevitable in armed conflict, but the House looks to the Government to minimise the risk to our brave and professional armed forces.

John Reid: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comments, and congratulate him on his new post. This is not the first time that we have shared views across the Dispatch Box, but I know of his commitment to his country and I am sure that that will be reflected in his commitment to the armed forces. I only regret that his first appearance at the Dispatch Box is marked by such a sombre subject. I thank him for the way in which he phrased his questions and for his recognition that we cannot be as open about everything as we are required to be on other subjects. I thank him, too, for the tributes that he paid to the armed forces and for his reminder of the purpose that brings us to Iraq, Afghanistan and other areas, as well as the high ideals that motivate that purpose.

The hon. Gentleman asked several legitimate and important questions, including how many similar incidents had taken place. Ground-to-air fire incidents are quite frequent. In the previous 18 months or so in Iraq, there were over 800 such incidents, none of which resulted in a tragedy of these proportions. In a sense, therefore, there was an element of chance or bad luck on this occasion. That casts light on other questions, such as why an inerting system was not fitted to the C-130K. Until relatively recently, the Hercules was not routinely deployed to areas of such danger. It has been used on specific occasions, but it has not been routinely deployed as a transport plane, although that has become more frequent after 11 September and the events in Afghanistan and Iraq. There has been a wide range of incidents in which Hercules and other planes have been fired on, but never with this result until now. That is one of the reasons that we carry out such investigations. I will comment on two local incidents in the context of the hon. Gentleman's important last question.

On the time scale for reviewing whether we should have a new system that would have assisted, that will be done as urgently as is possible. I discussed matters this morning with the Chief of the Air Staff and I know that some recommendations about the tactics have already been put in place and that urgent consideration will be given to whether measures should be fitted to the wings and fuel tanks to suppress the possibility of such an incident happening again.

The RAF goes to great lengths to fit defensive suites of arrangements. The C-130K is the older version of the Hercules, but I can tell the hon. Gentleman that it has been updated already with such defensive suites as directional infrared counter-measures, missile approach warning systems, radar warning receivers, counter-measures dispensing systems, flight deck armour and a series of other modifications. I would not want anyone to believe that sufficient attention was not paid to these matters. A considerable range of defensive suites have been added, but this is the first example of such an incident happening. The RAF will therefore consider the matter urgently.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether I could give any indication of the ground-to-air weaponry, without being specific. The indications are that a range of weaponry may have been used against the aircraft. That is precisely why I do not want to be specific about which one might have caused the explosion. Given that a range of weaponry was apparently used, the answer to his question about how widely available such weapons are in Iraq is that they are pretty widely available—the types of weapon that were used, though not necessarily the type of weapon, which I do not want to indicate, that may perchance have been successful.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the flow of information. What appears to have happened is that there were two attacks in roughly the same area that day against United States helicopters. They occurred within 1 km and 3 km of where the attack on the Hercules took place. This information—which was collated within about three hours of the flight, so there was not a great deal of time in any case to pass such information to the pilots and crew of the Hercules—nevertheless did not reach them because the route of the Hercules was not known to the Americans. There was a compartmentalisation of information as regards the Hercules precisely for security reasons. On a need-to-know basis, there was no need for the multinational forces outside our own preparations for the deployment of the Hercules to know of that.

That was done for security reasons. With the benefit of hindsight, it would have been better in terms of risk had that compartmentalisation not taken place on that occasion. However, the House should understand why it was done at the time. Even if the information had been available to the crew and pilots before they took off, it may not have changed their decision to proceed. It may or may not have affected the route that they took, but in any case the balance of risk involved was such that, in general terms, the fewer people who know about a particular route, the smaller the risk is considered to be.

It is obvious that the compartmentalisation meant to reduce the risk involves a risk. That is why one of the recommendations has already been acted upon. We have inserted extra British armed forces personnel into the flow of information in order to try to ensure that in future, while any such information is compartmentalised to the British, there will be a structure to convey it in circumstances similar to those in question.

Finally, the hon. Gentleman referred to the tactic of low flying. As I said in my statement, that is being reviewed. Daylight low flying is not being prohibited, because there is a balance of risk. On a short journey, if the normal trajectory rising to a given height and then coming down constitutes almost all the activity, the exposure to certain types of ground-to-air fire becomes greater and far riskier than if the aircraft were flying at a low level, which is why on that occasion that method of travel—low level covering flat ground—was chosen. Nevertheless, that can open up another risk, as we have seen. It re-emphasises the singular point that in an operational theatre such as Iraq, there is no risk-free flying, which is a testimony to the courage of our soldiers.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): I thank the Secretary of State for the advance copy of his statement. We on the Liberal Democrat Benches join him in his expressions of sympathy and condolence to the families of those who lost their lives in this tragic incident. The loss of any life in conflict is to be regretted, but he will know, as I do from my constituents' interests, that when several people from one military base die in a single incident the impact is much greater. I also join him in paying tribute to the military authorities in the UK for all the support they are giving to the families of those who lost their lives, and also to the American personnel in Iraq for all their support and bravery at the scene of the crash.

The Secretary of State drew attention to the fact that the board of inquiry undertook an exhaustive analysis and produced a comprehensive report containing a number of recommendations. He mentioned that some of those had already been acted upon. It would not be appropriate to press any of those issues too strongly today—there should be other ways of doing that away from the full glare of publicity—but can he give an assurance that, bearing in mind how exhaustive the analysis has been and how comprehensive the report is, all those recommendations will be implemented as soon as possible?

John Reid: Yes, I think that I can give the hon. Gentleman that assurance, with one little caveat. The people who are best placed to make the final decision about prioritisation of the recommendations are the Royal Air Force. I discussed the matter this morning with the Chief of the Air Staff, who will be handling all press inquiries today, as is appropriate on such a subject, rather than a politician. I know that he will give the matter the urgency that is required.

I thank the hon. Gentleman for his tribute. We all recognise the effect of such an event on a local community, particularly RAF Lyneham. I had some experience of that when I went to the remembrance service, along with the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray), who represents the area, and met some of the families there.

Finally, I join the hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell) in thanking our United States allies and the servicemen and women who, despite the risk to themselves, not only discovered but protected the site of the wreckage for sufficient time to allow us to collect at least sufficient to make judgments on these matters. The hostility of the area, which is in what is known as the Sunni triangle, was such that we could not stay as long as we would like to have done, and there was some looting afterwards, but we recovered what needed to be recovered for the respect of the families and for the purposes of the inquiry.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): I had the privilege of standing on the windswept tarmac at RAF Lyneham as the 10 flag-draped coffins were brought off the Hercules. I spent the afternoon with the families and remain scarred by that experience. However, I know that the families will be glad that this announcement has been made before Christmas, which will be difficult for them, and I am sure that they will welcome the fact that the Secretary of State chose to brief them before today's statement, which was sensible and proper.

I am particularly grateful that the report entirely exonerates the crew. In particular, the family of Flight Lieutenant "Steady-Eddie", who was one of my constituents, will be glad that no blame has been attached to him. I am sure that the Secretary of State will join me in paying tribute not only to the bravery and professionalism of those who died, but the bravery and professionalism of all those at RAF Lyneham in my constituency – the first in and last out of every conflict.

John Reid: The hon. Gentleman's words are apposite. I know that he has provided assistance and support to families both in this specific case and over many years. I regret the fact that the board of inquiry had to report in the run-up to Christmas, which I know caused a great deal of pain. However, I also know that the families would not have had the board of inquiry unduly delayed and wanted their questions answered as openly and honestly as possible.

Finally, I thank the hon. Gentleman for reinforcing the point that the crew – the pilots, the co-pilots and the one passenger were courageous, skilled, highly committed, highly dedicated professional people and that no scintilla of blame has been apportioned to them. Once the incident occurred, the aeroplane became uncontrollable – it could not have been controlled once it was hit, and the wing was severed after the explosion. I thank the hon. Gentleman for reinforcing that point. I am more than happy to repeat the central point that we have lost grievously from the service of the nation the skill, determination and courage of those who died.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): It is wise that the RAF and the MOD have not prohibited this kind of flying. It is important that the response is measured and we should not introduce so much protection that people cannot do what is required. Will the Secretary of State ensure that the flow of intelligence continues to go upwards towards those in the air? Although one can understand why a particular flight path is not given to those on the ground, the flow of information should be faster when incidents occur.

In reviewing the consequences of the change to some of the responsibilities of ground defence from the RAF to the Army, will the Secretary of State consider the importance of "thinking air"? I hope that that is not a cliché. People on the ground who are linking in with the RAF and other air forces must understand what people in the air need to know. Whether or not the change is a good idea, people on the ground need to understand the air environment.

I think that the way in which the Secretary of State manages these announcements, which are difficult, is appreciated by the families and the House.

John Reid: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that comment and for both of his points. Although we are now aware of a nuance in the balance of risk, it does not mean that there is a risk-free route for such operations, which is why we have not reacted by immediately banning tactical low flying, even during the day. We are aware of the risk and will try to avoid low flying, but it is up to the commanders in theatre and the pilots themselves to decide whether they want to use that tactic. As I have said, there are risks in taking the normal trajectory on a short flight, which exposes people to greater risk for a greater part of such journeys.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman's point about intelligence flow and the appreciation of aspects of intelligence by those who fly. While maintaining a degree of security of information to protect the operations of those who fly, we are trying to bridge the gap between the collection and dissemination of information to people who will appreciate what it means for their flying and for the risks attached to their flying. We are trying to improve the bridge between the collection of information, whether by ourselves or by others, and its dissemination to those who can judge it appropriately. Those skilled and trained professionals had a pre-deployment briefing and considered all the aspects of the information that was at their disposal. For reasons that I have already explained, the aspect about incidents in the area was not at their disposal.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): I thank the Secretary of State for today's statement. I pay tribute to our armed forces who are serving in Iraq and around the rest of the world for the fantastic professional work that they do on our behalf. Our love, best wishes, thoughts and prayers go to the families of the 10 servicemen whom we have sadly lost.

I had honour of flying into Baghdad and Basra with the RAF shortly after the crash. The professionalism shown by the RAF was unbelievable and the Americans stood back in amazement at how the RAF had taken such a disaster on the chin and got on with their work, although the personnel were clearly very upset.

I understand that we cannot discuss lots of details today for operational reasons and because of the sensitivities. Does the rest of the Hercules fleet, and particularly the C-130H and J aircraft, have fuel tank inerting systems, which would make our servicemen around the world safer? The Secretary of State may be considering fitting the C-130K with such a system.

John Reid: The hon. Gentleman's remarks to the families will be much appreciated, as will his recognition of the dangers of flying, which he has experienced personally. Some of us have had the privilege of flying with the RAF in what is for them a day-to-day, risk-filled theatre, such as Basra or Baghdad. Those of us who have put on body armour, put out the lights and flown at night at an angle of descent that is calculated to terrify most people outside the RAF while swerving, understand the risks inherent in such operations. We often forget that such flights are daily occurrences. That particular crew had already flown perhaps four times between Balad and Baghdad before the tragic incident occurred, and they had flown day-in, day-out since their deployment two or three weeks before the incident. Most of the crew were very experienced: between them, they had 19 operational deployments, so they were people who got on with the job as a matter of course and took those risks.

The hon. Gentleman asked why a fire suppressant system was not fitted to the C-130 and what the position is on the other aircraft. As he knows, the K variant was first developed and built in the 1960s, when that technology was not available. Systems to upgrade the aircraft are now available and we are examining as a matter of urgency whether the technology can be successfully fitted to our aircraft. I must repeat my earlier point that, before the incident, the C-130 Hercules was not thought to be particularly vulnerable to that form of attack. We now know that it in certain circumstances it can be very vulnerable.

We shall examine this as a matter of urgency. I merely point out that it is not always an easy thing to do. A data recorder, for instance, can be fitted relatively easily into a modern digitised cockpit, but the C-130K was built in the 1960s. Although we can put in a lot of defensive aids, it is not that easy to put in a data recorder where there are multi-faceted, sometimes clockwork, indicators and no central terminal from which to draw the information. There may be difficulties, but we are considering it as a matter of urgency.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I should like to join in the tributes paid to those tragically killed in this incident. I am sure that the whole House appreciates the manner in which the Secretary of State has delivered this difficult statement. As a humble former paratrooper, I have every reason to appreciate the flying skills of all our Hercules aircrew, especially as most of them are at RAF Lyneham.

My question concerns the search and rescue capability of our forces in theatre. I note from the statement that the last radio message was at 13.30 and that the crash site was not discovered until 45 minutes later. Is it the procedure that search and rescue missions are launched before aircraft are formally reported missing; and do British armed forces have their own independent search and rescue capability in theatre?

John Reid: Let me go through the chronology for the hon. Gentleman, and then I shall answer his question.

The Hercules took off at 13:24 GMT. Iraqi local time was about three hours in advance, but I shall use GMT. Six minutes after taking off, the crew relayed the information that there was a fire on the plane. Some of this morning's press reports said that the plane had been enveloped in flames. That is not accurate, but, as we now know, there was a fire on board on the right-hand wing. That information was picked up not by an air traffic controller, but by other British forces. There was no communication subsequently. At 13:55 GMT, which was the expected arrival time at Balad, the aircraft was officially declared missing. There were a number of eyewitnesses, but they were a fair distance some kilometres away. In addition, there were United States forces in the area, who, after looking for the site, discovered it 20 minutes later at 14:15 GMT.

I understand that that is the precise chronology. It has been explained to me that the message at 13:30 was not picked up by an air traffic controller, so there may have been a slight delay. I emphasise, however, that it is the strong and unanimous view of the board of inquiry, under Wing Commander John Reid, that following the incident the aeroplane was uncontrollable. Whatever happened after the time at which it was hit, the explosion separated the wing.

Whatever had happened as regards search and rescue, assistance or aid would not have averted what ultimately, tragically, transpired. After that, there was nothing that the crew could do, highly skilled and highly trained though they were. They were put in a position whereby nothing would have prevented the plane crashing in the way that it did.

Points of Order

1.4 pm

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring) (Con): On a point of order, Mr Deputy Speaker. Today's ruling by the Law Lords that information obtained by foreign countries through torture cannot be used in evidence in British courts is of enormous importance. Have Ministers made any requests to make a statement on this important issue? If not, will you use your good offices to impress upon the Government the importance of having it discussed in the House of Commons?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I have no knowledge of such a statement being made, but the points that the right hon. Gentleman makes are now on the record, and no doubt everybody concerned will have noted them.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wish to raise the issue of the increasing tendency of Northern Ireland Ministers to avoid coming to the House to make important policy announcements. I refer in particular to the written ministerial statement issued on Wednesday of this week by the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for Basildon (Angela E. Smith), who is responsible for education in Northern Ireland. The announcement had already been made to the press and the public in Northern Ireland on the previous day, and it was reported at length in all the media, including the newspapers, on Wednesday morning. Is it not a grave discourtesy to Members of this House that a statement was not made on the day on which the announcement was made to the media and the public?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman will know that Mr. Speaker takes a very strong line on these matters. Again, the points that he has made will be on the record, and I have no doubt that Mr. Speaker will note them and take them into account.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should like to raise an issue of some importance. During Prime Minister's questions on 30 November, the Prime Minister indicated, as recorded in column 264 of the Official Report, that from the end of November there will be a six-month maximum waiting time for an NHS operation. On 1 December, 437 patients at my local hospital had been waiting for more than six months. This morning, I received a letter from the Secretary of State for Health in which she states that the maximum six-month wait is only a target and in any case does not come in until the end of 2005. Can I have some advice and guidance on how the Prime Minister's statement could be corrected?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am extremely grateful that one of the many things for which Deputy Speakers are not responsible is prime ministerial statements. The hon. Gentleman must challenge those in the usual way, and he must do the same with the statistics.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As I am sure you are aware, in the past few weeks there have been several false fire alarms in Portcullis House. On Tuesday, when three were going off, large numbers of members of staff, members of the public and Members had to leave the building through the front entrance. There are specialised fire doors there, and as a former fireman I know what should happen: the revolving doors should automatically swing open so that we can get people out as safely as possible. Those doors were inoperative on Tuesday. When I approached the excellent security staff, they told me that that has been reported several times but nothing has been done. Do we have to wait for people to be injured getting in and out before those doors are fixed?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand the points that the hon. Gentleman makes, and they are of course serious. Again, they are now on the record and I have no doubt that the Serjeant at Arms will want to look into the matter to ensure that things are working as they should.

Mr. Angus MacNeil (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Has there been any notification from Ministers at the Department for Transport about the award of the Maritime and Coastguard Agency helicopter contracts? Substantial concerns have been expressed about the capabilities and suitability of the proposed replacement helicopters. These are key safety matters that are especially felt in my constituency. Will there be any occasion for a Minister to come to the House to make a statement so that Members may express their concerns?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have no knowledge of any proposed statement. In a sense, the hon. Gentleman's point is for business questions. Again, what he has said is on the record of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That, for the year ending with 31st March 2007, for expenditure by the Department of Health—

(1) resources, not exceeding £27,595,662,000, be authorised, on account, for use as set out in HC 465, and

(2) a sum, not exceeding £26,808,818,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund, on account, to meet the costs as so set out.—[Claire Ward.]

1.9 pm

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley) (Lab): First, I declare an interest in that I am currently a lay member of the General Medical Council and it is mentioned with other regulatory bodies and related associate bodies once in the report. I should put that on the record. This is my maiden speech as Chair of the Health Committee and the attendance resembles that for my maiden speech in 1983.

The Committee's report on the influence of the pharmaceutical industry raised questions about how it is regulated and how it regulates itself. As hon. Members know, the pharmaceutical industry is the third most important United Kingdom industry economically after tourism and finance. The report acknowledged its valuable contribution to patient health and the economy. Although I shall mention some problems and some hon. Members might view the industry negatively, I shall put the debate in context by reminding hon. Members of the Health Committee's first conclusion in its report. Paragraph 336 states:

"The UK-based pharmaceutical industry is large, profitable and highly competitive; it has understandably been described as 'world class and a jewel in the crown of the UK economy'. The industry has an outstanding record in developing new medicines, and is a major source of funding of medical research. The industry's products include many life-saving and important drugs which greatly benefit many people and contribute substantially to national health."

That is absolutely right. Although I am about to say, "however", that paragraph places the industry in the context in which we should all view it: its contribution to the nation.

However, the Committee had several concerns about medical research, the conduct of clinical trials, medicines marketing, the information provided to patients and prescribers and the independence of the regulatory system. Overriding themes of the report included the lack of transparency in medicines research and regulation, and the potential effect of that on patient safety.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on his introductory remarks. He is absolutely right to place the debate in the context of the world-wide demand for pharmaceutical produces. Is not it the case that Britain can hold its head up and be proud of its contribution to improving people's health around the world?

Mr. Barron: That is correct—and in doing so, the amount of money that the industry makes in exporting around the world substantially enhances our economy. That is good for all.

Patient safety is paramount in the use of drugs in this country and it goes to the heart of the Committee's report. If a patient is prescribed one drug rather than another, similar drug, the negative effect on the patient is likely to be minimal. If, however, a patient is prescribed a drug that is linked with negative physical effects of which the doctor is not aware, the results may be far more serious. The regulators, industry and health care professionals have a role to play in ensuring that potential side effects are picked up early in drug testing, made known to doctors and monitored after licensing.

The Committee highlighted the need for better reporting of adverse drug reactions or ADRs. I am pleased that the Department is addressing that. The yellow card system of reporting ADRs is now being rolled out to include patients and all health care professionals, such as nurses, pharmacists, health visitors etc. Previously, only doctors could report suspected drug side effects. Pilot schemes were already running at the time the report was published and final systems will be in place by 2006. A new IT system will improve the detection of signals of a problem with a particular medicine.

Drug-induced illness was recognised by the Government as a serious issue in human and economic terms. The Department of Health and the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency have commissioned research to determine the "frequency of medical errors". According to a recent National Audit Office study, medication errors are the second most common patient incident in the national health service.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): It has come to light that one of the problems is repeat prescription provision, especially in the care of the elderly, particularly those with dementia. Although they initially get the right drugs, the repeat prescriptions do not necessarily help them and, indeed, have a negative effect. There is no proper procedure for reviewing those prescriptions at least every six months.

Mr. Barron: Repeat prescriptions are sometimes numerically limited so that one has one, four or five out of six. After that, it is doctors' clinical responsibility to ensure that they see the patient before any further prescribing of the drug. However, what happens in the real world is not always consistent with that. Occasionally, that is at great cost to the individual concerned, but it is always at great cost to everyone because safety incidents cost the NHS approximately £2 billion a year in bed days in our acute sector. They are problems for clinicians and everyone.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): The university of Liverpool recently reported that there are at least 10,000 fatal adverse reactions to drugs in this country. Is not it therefore extraordinary that the Government's response to the report does not mention Vioxx—the most recent scandal—or Seroxat?

Mr. Barron: I am not aware of the Liverpool report, but my hon. Friend is right about what the Government mention. However, they have been examining the mechanisms around the issues, and I shall consider that later.

The Committee recommended improved post-marketing surveillance beyond ADR reporting. It suggested that more trials of licensed drugs be conducted in real-life situations, but that is not mentioned in the Government's response.

Post-marketing surveillance by the MHRA will be strengthened under a planned reorganisation of the agency. The Government reject the recommendation that drug surveillance be carried out independently of the agency. They say that such a system would "impede the continuous examination of the risk: benefit balance" of the marketed drug. I am sure that the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Byrne), knows that members of the Health Committee will be watching what takes place.

I should like to consider transparency.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that counterfeit drugs are an increasing problem and that many counterfeit drugs are introduced into our country via parallel trading? Does he also agree that legislation is needed to combat the introduction of counterfeit drugs into the market? Unfortunately the drugs that are being counterfeited are those that are most commonly used—obviously, they are the best sellers, which give the most profit to the counterfeiter.

Mr. Barron: I agree with my hon. Friend. Although the report did not look into the matter in detail, parallel trade and counterfeiting is a problem, not only for the market but for safety and efficacy. It is important that those issues are considered.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that we should not assume that randomised control trials designed to establish the efficacy of drugs can always provide the same degree of assurance on a drug's safety? Should not particular importance therefore be attached to the capture of data from whole populations after licensing, to establish the safety of the drug? It would be impractical to undertake that kind of evidence gathering from a substantial population before licensing.

Mr. Barron: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. There should be more ongoing studies to establish what happens after a drug enters the marketplace, and to determine which drugs are being used. Over the past two weeks, the Health Committee has been looking into expenditure levels in the national health service. The Secretary of State and various civil servants have given evidence to the Committee, and we discovered that we often do not know which families of drugs are being prescribed. We need that information to determine certain interactions, perhaps with public health promotion or with people getting assistance in the acute sector. We need to determine whether any great changes have taken place in the level of use of certain families of drugs over the years. We need a big national picture of the use of those drugs in society, because this relates to the money that we, as taxpayers, spend—and the taxpayers' money that the Department of Health spends—to try to improve the nation's health. I do not know whether there are any simple correlations in this regard, but when we were taking evidence the other week, we felt that we ought to be able to get an answer to that question.

Mr. Lansley: This is an interesting point, and I hope that the Minister will tell us more about electronic prescribing and about the conversion of the Prescription Pricing Authority on to an electronic basis. That should, in theory, allow us to extract much more of the data that the right hon. Gentleman describes. However, although the transfer to electronic prescribing has increased, we are still achieving only a tiny fraction of the amount that was intended. By this stage, we were expecting to have pretty much an entirely electronic system, from the doctor's screen right through to reimbursement through the PPA.

Mr. Barron: I do not disagree with the hon. Gentleman, but I shall not be tempted to discuss information technology in any part of the public sector—or the private sector, for that matter—because it has its own history. We have debated the issue in the past, and we will no doubt do so again.

Paul Flynn: A serious situation has just been revealed in a report by the university of Sussex, which shows that we have been much too ready to license drugs in this country, compared with the United States. Between 1971 and 1992, nine drugs were withdrawn in the United States because they had serious adverse effects, whereas the figure in this country was 24. In our rush to put drugs on to the market for the benefit of the pharmaceutical companies, we are conducting experiments with those drugs and using the public as guinea pigs, and those guinea pigs often do not survive the experiments.

Mr. Barron: My hon. Friend will have to forgive me, because I disagree with parts of what he has just said. I know that he has taken a great interest in the pharmaceutical industry for many years, but I do not agree with him on this issue. Proper licensing arrangements are in place. Yes, it is true that issues such as the withdrawal of Vioxx come around now and again, but patient safety was one of the first subjects emanating from the report that I raised in this debate. The House must understand that I was not on the Health Committee when the investigation took place or when the report was published, although I did play a role in trying to get the Government's response a bit earlier, in view of their delay in providing it.

Paul Flynn: I want to give the House a clear example of the disastrous failure of our regulatory system.

The Food and Drug Administration in America has claimed that there were 144,000 cases of heart attacks and strokes due to the use of Vioxx. However, in answer to a parliamentary question asking how many bad reactions had been discovered here under the yellow card system, I was told that there were never more than half a dozen a year, and that they amounted to no more than 12. There is evidence of 4 million prescriptions for medicines of this type being prescribed, and if America had not discovered the terrible, fatal side-effects of Vioxx, we would still be using it, and British patients would still be being killed by it.

Mr. Barron: Vioxx is an issue for everyone here, and the Health Committee asked for a public inquiry into the matter, saying that when a drug is withdrawn in the way that Vioxx was, there should be a public inquiry. The Government did not agree, and I have to say that I have some sympathy with the Government on that. However, the public should have more information on the way in which the drug was licensed and came into use, so that they can be satisfied that we understand the issues surrounding it. My hon. Friend mentioned half a dozen cases. He will be aware that there is the potential for litigation on this matter either in this country or the United States. Reports in The Lancet have put the number of cases in this country of people who have been affected long-term in relation to taking Vioxx at far higher than half a dozen. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will comment on this when he speaks later in the debate.

The lack of transparency in the MHRA and the industry means that health care professionals do not always have all the information that they need to make appropriate prescribing decisions. The report welcomed the introduction of a register for clinical trials, which will allow professionals and the general public to access information about the development of drugs. The Committee's proposal for maintenance of the register by an entirely independent body was rejected, as was the recommendation that information regarding clinical trials be available at drug launch, so that prescribers could access information during the period when the promotion of a new medicine was at its most concentrated. The Government believe that the publication of such trials within one year of launch is appropriate.

The Government's response reiterates the importance of a close relationship between the Government and the pharmaceutical industry, citing as a reason the need to ensure transparency in the way in which medicines are brought to the public. The response stresses the role of the ministerial industry strategy group—the MISG—in this respect. Importantly, the response agrees that "there is a need to look at whether there is a safer way of introducing new drugs", and this is one of the aspects that will be considered by the MISG. I hope that, in doing so, it will consider the issues around Vioxx that my hon. Friend mentioned.

Corrective statements will not be issued in every case of a breach of legislation, as was recommended by the Committee. However, the MHRA is considering publishing the correspondence with companies relating to the promotion of medicines. The agency will also publish an annual advertising regulations outcome report. Contrary to the Committee's recommendation, information received by the MHRA will remain confidential until a licensing decision has been made. However, upcoming legislation will require a public assessment report of a medicine's licensing history to be published shortly after a licence is granted. The MHRA has undertaken to publish assessment reports for licence renewals and safety update reports. Such safety reports will also be issued more frequently.

One of the Committee's main recommendations was for a large-scale, independent review of the MHRA to be conducted. The suggested governing principles included the agency's need for independence from the Government and the industry, greater transparency, greater proactiveness in post-marketing surveillance, the prioritisation of new marketing applications, and the inclusion of lay members in policy-making decisions.

That recommendation was rejected by the Government, although they stated, on page 18 of their response, that perhaps a four-yearly review of the operations of the MHRA should take place. If that were to happen, the terms of reference would remain to be decided. I remind the House that the terms of reference should consider methodology, timing and other issues. If the Government adopt that approach, as I think they should, it would be useful if there were a parliamentary input into exactly what the terms of reference should be, either on the Floor of the House or at least from the Health Committee. I am sure that members of the Committee would be more than happy to consider the issue.

Both the report and the response stressed the importance of research and development for patients and the economy, and the need to maintain levels of investment by drug companies in the United Kingdom. However, the Government agreed with the Committee that there were occasional deficiencies in the design and conduct of clinical trials. Poorly designed trials have significant consequences for patient safety, as is shown by the tragic consequences of widespread prescription of the anti-arthritis drug Vioxx, mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn).

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): I thank the right hon. Gentleman for being so generous in giving way.

It seems that the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence must rely on published evidence. In many cases, evidence of a faulty trial or certain sets of data are not published. Does that cause the right hon. Gentleman as much concern as it causes me?

Mr. Barron: Yes, it does. It should concern us all, and it should concern the pharmaceutical industry more than any of us, because it is directly responsible for ensuring that we have as much information as is necessary.

The Committee recommended closer working between the MHRA and the industry to ensure that trial design benefits patients. No changes or additional work by the MHRA to improve the design of trials to reflect clinical improvements is suggested in the report, which I think is a shame. Guidance on "the type of clinical trial required for marketing authorisation"

is said to be already in place, but that does not apply to guidance on the types of trial likely to prove therapeutic gain. That is one of the issues raised by the hon. Member for Windsor (Adam Afriyie). No additional funding for NICE to address the issue has been agreed, and the report does not mention changes in the way in which research ethics committees review and approve clinical trials. I think that that is wrong. As I have said, the issues should concern us all. On the few occasions that such matters do come into the public domain and drugs are removed from the market, we should establish why that has happened. When drugs come on to the market, we should do our best to ensure that that is dealt with as safely as possible.

The report highlights the problem of "me-too" drugs—medicines that add little to the clinical effects of chemically similar drugs that are already on the market. The Government recognise the problem, and the response states that additional work by the National Prescribing Centre may be considered to address it. The Government agree with the Committee that impediments to generic drugs entering the market should be prevented, and will consider an initiative to investigate the problem.

Mr. Lansley: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that we must be careful about criticising what are described as "me-too" drugs? They may allow incremental improvements in terms of efficacy or dosage. In the industrial context, even where branded drugs have a degree of intellectual property protection, they can disclose further evidence of the benefits of competition, and give us a handle on what would be happening in a more competitive market.

We need not rely on the National Prescribing Centre as a mechanism. We can help NICE to advance the point at which it undertakes multi-technology appraisals, and examine the cost-effectiveness for the NHS of classes of drugs taken together.

Mr. Barron: I do not disagree with that, and I do not think that anyone else would either, although obviously there is the issue of drugs coming on to the market and being patented. I am sure that the issue is considered, but not in the detail that the Committee would have liked. I am pleased that some agreement has been established.

The report also raised the issue of ghost-writing, which relates to cases in which well-known doctors or academics put their names to research articles that they did not write. They may not even have seen the data referred to. The practice was criticised in the report, and has recently received media coverage as well. The evidence taken by the Committee was led in part by the Royal College of Psychiatrists, which submitted written evidence of its concern. Last week I received a letter from its president, Professor Sheila Hollins, who wrote:

"I know that the Health Select Committee, in its report on the influence of the pharmaceutical industry, was very concerned about the failure of drug companies to publish all their findings regarding the efficacy and safety of drugs. This was also the most important issue raised in our submission to the Committee. I am aware that this situation is unlikely to have significantly changed; and many members of this college have grave concerns about the impact of selective publishing upon the trust placed in the pharmaceutical industry by patients and professionals alike."

I have a great deal of trust in the pharmaceutical industry, but I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will address the issue—highlighted by a recent case—at some stage, if not this afternoon.

The Government's response makes no mention of ghost-writing, and does not respond to the Committee's recommendation that the industry adhere to guidance set out to ensure that publications are produced in a "responsible and ethical manner". Ghost-writing is widely thought to be standard practice in the pharmaceutical industry, as the Committee was told. As I have said, I was not a member at that time. However, witnesses from the industry denied that that was the case.

In the past few months, the media have reported a number of cases of so-called ghost-writing. In the past few days, The Times Higher Education Supplement and The Observer have reported a case in which researchers from Sheffield university, collaborating with a drug company, published findings without full access to the trial data. I do not know all the details, but I have seen the media coverage and I have received e-mails from one of the parties. I should like my hon. Friend to examine the position.

Paragraph 199 of the report states:

"Sir Ian Chalmers recommended that the industry adhere to guidelines set out in Good Publication Practice for Pharmaceutical Companies" —that was published in 2003, in Current Medical Research and Opinion—

"that aim to ensure that publications are produced in a responsible and ethical manner. They include the need to publish results of all clinical trials of marketed products, and to report them in a balanced and objective manner. Authors should all have access to the statistical reports and data supplementing each publication. These guidelines are clear on the subject of authorship and the role of professional medical writers".

The guidelines are then listed.

I hope that the whole industry, all academics and all clinicians adhere strictly to those guidelines. It does not matter to me at this stage whether they are statutory, but I suspect that if they are not adhered to at some time in the future they may become statutory. We cannot require our clinicians, who work so hard both in hospitals and in primary care, to read everything, or cross-question on everything, that enters their domain. They need information about new drugs coming on to the market and about what they should and should not prescribe. Academics' reports, wherever they are published, should reflect accurately what has happened when a drug has come on to the market.

I would like to move on to another aspect of the report—its coverage of NICE, which the hon. Member for Windsor mentioned a few moments ago. The Select Committee recommended that NICE receive additional funding in order to issue guidance more quickly. Indeed, it recommended increased funding in order to allow NICE to evaluate more medicines more quickly and argued that the consequent improvement in prescribing standards should make NICE cost-effective.

NICE was criticised during the inquiry not for the actual work that it does—I do not think that anyone can criticise NICE for the brilliant work that it does—but in respect of the speed at which it issues guidance. Doctors, patients and the industry agreed that the wait for guidance to be issued was unacceptable. We have all heard the comment about the phenomenon known as NICE blight, whereby the NHS will not provide a treatment until it has been approved by the institute. Several witnesses who gave evidence to the Committee referred to it. The more thorough an appraisal, of course, the longer the delay. I spoke earlier about getting the balance right between safety and efficacy, and it is important to recognise that in certain circumstances there can be delays. It is a delicate area, as we must all accept.

The Government have recently looked into the new fast-track system of assessment. Fortuitously, I received a letter from the Department this morning. I had written on behalf of a constituent who had contacted me on 15 November about a life-saving drug called Velcade. I received a reply from the Minister of State, Department of Health, my right hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy), which says:

"A new, rapid process for assessing drugs and other treatments will be launched by NICE to sit alongside its standard process. The process will not be used for all appraisals but will be used initially to produce faster guidance on certain life-saving drugs used in a single disease or condition. NICE's new shorter appraisal process is designed to retain the integrity of its existing methodology but there is scope for NICE appraisals to take a longer track if the complexity of the topic warrants it. Publication of NICE guidance on specific drugs will be brought forward by between 6–15 months from the time originally planned. Work is starting immediately on five products, including Velcade"— as my constituent will be pleased to hear. It continues:

"The first guidance developed using the new process is expected to appear as early as June 2006."

I am very pleased about that, as it appears that the Government have seized on the issue. It is difficult on occasions to achieve the right balance, but hon. Members will know that the coverage of drug promotion in the media brings a great deal of pressure on NICE, on clinicians and, indeed, on Ministers. We have seen clear examples of that in recent weeks.

It is a difficult area to balance, but there is an issue about the funding of NICE that the Government did not properly address. It is important to consider how much research it is reasonable for NICE to conduct annually. Somewhere between 200 and 300 medicines and drugs receive a licence every year in this country, and I believe that NICE looks into between 30 and 40 of them. The new process may allow NICE to investigate more. No one would expect all licensed drugs to go through the NICE process, but it would be good if we could get rid of the NICE blight. If that is the intention of the new appraisal process, I am pleased to support it.

The report also suggested that NICE extend its role to give advice to industry on the design of clinical trials likely to yield clear results and to be useful in the production of NICE guidance. That issue was not covered in the Government's response, but I believe that it is a very good idea. On a daily basis in clinical trials, consultants and doctors throughout the country, working alongside the pharmaceutical industry, give advice about what is happening within the NHS. We do not know much about it, as it is not often discussed, but most drugs are developed in situ in our hospitals and sometimes in the primary sector. The more collaborative we can make the process, the better. We want people to have confidence in NICE and what it does, so advice from NICE about what is going on in respect of guidelines for treatment, drugs and care is also important. Clearly, the Government and the pharmaceutical industry should look further into that in future.

I have brought up many issues in my speech and I am sure that hon. Members who were Select Committee members at the time will have further issues to debate. The investigation into the pharmaceutical industry—the first since 1914—was wide ranging. I am pleased that the Government responded well in certain respects, but they could have made a fuller response in other respects. My final comment—to the Minister, hon. Members or anyone else who is listening to or reading the debate—is that the Health Committee will be looking into the developments emerging from this report and response for many years to come.

Julia Goldsworthy (Falmouth and Camborne) (LD): I should like to declare an interest in that I have a slight cold at the moment, so I am probably benefiting from some pharmaceutical products.

Today's debate comes off the back of a report from the Health Committee that was released in 2005—just ahead of the general election, but before the right hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) became Chairman of the Select Committee and before my time in Parliament. Although the report listed a series of concerns and made a series of recommendations, it carefully highlighted the importance of the pharmaceutical industry to our economy. That importance is well understood by Members, because, in some cases, literally thousands of their constituents are employed by that industry. We know that the pharmaceutical industry's contribution to the nation's economy is ranked third only to tourism and finance. We also know that investment made by UK pharmaceutical companies represents 65 per cent. of health-related research and development in the UK, and 10 per cent. of global research and development expenditure.

The industry makes such a marked contribution to the economy because the development and production of drugs has truly revolutionised our lives. The discovery, development and use of drugs has had a revolutionary effect on our lifestyle, life expectancy and our ability to cure and to cope with illness. About 650 million prescriptions are issued each year at a cost of £7 billion to the NHS. Today, it is increasingly believed—I share that belief—that for every ill we suffer, there is a pill that we can pop to cure it.

Despite recognising the important and revolutionary contribution of the pharmaceutical industry, the report highlighted a series of concerns that ultimately stem from the fact that certain issues have been ignored for nearly 100 years and from the imbalanced approach that the Government have adopted to the pharmaceutical industry on the one side and the patient on the other.

As we have already heard, allegations were made about badly designed and biased clinical trials—trials biased towards showing drugs in the best possible light. There is evidence of selective publication of evidence relating to those trials, in which the negative evidence was not made public or full data sets were not published. Allegations were also made about ghost-writing, with the names of third-party so-called "independent" academics being added to papers not authored by them. Sometimes their names were added, but they did not have full access to the full data sets on which the reports were based.

Finally, the report highlighted the ever-increasing intensity of the promotion of new drugs that provides incentives for prescribers that are totally unrelated to health outcomes. Press coverage referred to incentives that ranged from winning an iPod if a drug is prescribed to entertaining nurses and doctors at very nice hotels or restaurants. There were justifiable concerns that such practices could end up having a negative impact on patient outcomes.

One problem is the fact that NICE licensing relies on published evidence, but we have already seen that the full data sets are not always published. If negative evidence is not made available, surely NICE is being constrained in its ability to make evidence-based decisions. There are concerns that the lack of an evidence base could lead to the unsafe use of drugs, and that the level of brand awareness has resulted in extension beyond appropriate prescription because of pressures from patients and prescribers.

In response to these concerns, the Select Committee recommendations centred around the need for transparency in the licensing process, for greater independence of assessment, and for greater research into the potentially adverse effects of prescribed drugs, given that up to 5 per cent. of hospital admissions are the result of adverse reaction to drugs. Its final recommendation was as follows:

"In view of the failings of the MHRA, we recommend a fundamental review of the organisation in order to ensure that safe and effective medicines, with necessary prescribing constraints, are licensed."

So the Committee felt that there needs to be much greater balance between promoting the interests of the pharmaceutical industry, and promoting the health of the public and the effectiveness of the NHS. It was felt that those recommendations would help to redress that imbalance.

Unfortunately, in many respects the Government's response, published in September this year, reflects the perpetuation of this imbalance. Many of the recommendations were not acted on, and in many cases the justification given was that the Government did not recognise or acknowledge the problem identified by the Health Committee report. They said that current guidelines and measures are already, or are about to be put, in place to deal with these problems. The result is that the fundamental balance between the patient and the industry has not shifted, although some welcome concessions have been made to improve the MRHA's marketing material.

The industry itself has also sought to improve its practices. The Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry recently issued new guidelines to help encourage best practice. These are voluntary guidelines that represent a gold standard; they are not backed up by the law. While the ultimate sanction for breaking the code is expulsion from the ABPI, that has never happened. The board has never required a company to publish a corrective statement for a breach of those guidelines.

Some of these guidelines are rather vague. For example, although delegates sponsored by companies to attend meetings can travel there and back only on economy flights and must not stay in "lavish" accommodation, it is not clear what is meant by that or what the extent of their stay will be. Of course, many companies will follow these guidelines for reasons of reputation, but the fact is that if they are voluntary, they ultimately lack teeth.

Recent evidence in the press indicates that such problems are still arising. However, they are being dealt with by the MRHA on a case-by-case basis, without any significant strategic or systemic changes being made. A piece in last Sunday's edition of The Observer refers to allegations of ghost-writing; the academic concerned apparently did not have full access to the data sets that the report put his name to. As I have said before, evidence emerged last month of perks for prescribers. They could win an iPod if they prescribed gum disease medication, and some doctors and nurses were entertained at the Groucho club.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): Am I not right in thinking that the new ABPI code of conduct specifically limits the maximum value of these awards and gifts to £6 excluding VAT?

Julia Goldsworthy: I was not aware of that. I am not sure how the ABPI could provide flights to and from seminars at that low value, even given the existence of some very low-cost carriers. There may still be some devil in the detail and of course this code remains voluntary.

Paul Flynn: The new code of practice is entirely cosmetic and has been described by the British Medical Association as lacking teeth. The Drug and Therapeutics Bulletin describes it as fundamentally weak in all respects. It is purely window-dressing to hide the drugs industry's continuing close collaboration with the MHRA, which has been so detrimental to patients.

Julia Goldsworthy: I recognise the hon. Gentleman's concerns, but of course, although the problems associated with patient safety and access to drugs can in some respects be dealt with through improved regulation of the pharmaceutical industry, that is not the sole determinant. It is clear that the Government's behaviour has had a significant impact, and stories in the media have a fundamental impact on the public's awareness of drugs. Moreover, the Government have a major influence on the ability to get new drugs to patients quickly.

We have heard much this afternoon about NICE blight and the delays in the licensing programme, but to what extent are those delays due to NICE? My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) recently tabled written parliamentary questions on this issue, and the answers show that it takes the Government nine to 10 months to produce the list of drugs that is subsequently sent to NICE for licensing approval. That is another part of the delay in getting drugs to patients who may need them as quickly as possible. I should be grateful if the Minister explained the reasons for this delay and what measures his Department are implementing to speed up the process.

There is also the apparently contradictory position whereby drugs need to be licensed by NICE before they become widely available, yet in some cases—such as the recent and well-known one involving Herceptin—statements have been made implying that there should be widespread uptake before the licensing process has been completed. What assessment has the Minister's Department made of the immediate and long-term financial implications of making such drugs available? On Herceptin, we know that it is not a question simply of the cost of the drug; there are also costs associated with echocardiograms and ongoing monitoring. Herceptin will of course make a huge difference to some women with early-stage breast cancer, but how do the Government envisage that these costs should be met, given the existing pressures on many budgets? The cost of such drugs is only rising, so what is the long-term sustainability of their prescription? There is a real concern that post-2008, when the increase in NHS funding tails off, funding for many such drugs will experience a hard landing.

Finally, in contrast to moves to increase the transparency of the data—

Mr. Lansley: We have not heard the hon. Lady's proposal on Herceptin. On the face of it, Herceptin has significant beneficial effects as disclosed in clinical trials, but a licence application has yet to be made in respect of it. In France, there is explicit recognition that in certain circumstances, certain drugs can provisionally be made available for use, pending licensing and approval. Is that not the right mechanism? If not, what does the hon. Lady propose?

Julia Goldsworthy: It is of course important to make such drugs available as quickly as possible, but certain systemic problems have been highlighted, such as NICE blight. We need to take steps to prevent such exceptions from having to be made.

Finally, given moves to increase the transparency of data relating to clinical trials, why do negotiations with the Treasury on the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme take place in such deep secrecy? Do the Department plan to make this process more open?

I turn finally to other potential dangers and difficulties for patients—

Adam Afriyie: I thank the hon. Lady for giving way before she moves to her final, final point. She focused on costs, but does she agree that although the work that NICE does is very important, it is also important that it be done quickly? In many cases, it is a matter of life and death as to whether or not a particular drug gets to the patient quickly. Does she also share my concern at the fact that, rather than the budget increasing, it has just been reduced by £3.5 million? That will surely cause more problems than even the difficulties relating to Herceptin.

Julia Goldsworthy: I think that the hon. Gentleman is right. What will happen once the funding structure changes and what the impact will be on the availability of certain drugs are important issues to consider.

Reference has already been made to the shift to cheaper generic drugs and the practice of drugs bought in other EU countries being repackaged and relabelled through parallel trading. In both cases, I understand that while the medication itself remains the same—I have discussed the matter with an hon. Friend who is a pharmacist—excipients such as additives for colour might change or vary in the medication. That can cause unfortunate side effects, particularly in the case of epilepsy drugs.

Dr. Iddon: I must challenge that statement. Evidence was given at a meeting in the House last night that packages of parallel traded products contained drugs that were not the same as the drugs made by the professional company that had discovered them. Such products contained impurities that could cause serious side effects and in some cases death in the patient.

Julia Goldsworthy: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his point. I was just coming to that. The issue is not simply a question of different additives that might be used in different countries, but the possibility that such trade might be a soft underbelly for the counterfeit trade. There have been examples of counterfeits, such as those for Viagra, Cialis and Reductil, entering the legitimate supply chain, as the hon. Gentleman said. That is a significant cause of concern, and action to counteract it is outside the strict regulation of the industry.

The extent to which the Government truly appreciate the scale of this problem is also an issue. Recent answers to questions asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam reveal that the Government have made no estimates of the level of counterfeit medicines circulating in the legitimate supply chain and available on the internet. If they have made no estimate of the scale of the problem, how can they deal with it properly?

Further problems include the possible misprescribing of medication due to lack of training. Not all the problems lie at the foot of the pharmaceutical industry, but we have heard plenty of evidence this afternoon that more effective regulation of the industry will help to establish a clear balance—

Adam Afriyie: I apologise to the hon. Lady for pressing her in her ill health, but can she be clear about what solutions she is suggesting?

Julia Goldsworthy: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. We support many of the recommendations outlined in the report, which seem to be sensible proposals to redress the balance between maintaining a successful pharmaceutical industry that continues to develop life-changing and potentially world-changing drugs, and maintaining and representing the best interests of the patient and the NHS. Regulation will help to ensure a more equitable balance.

I am concerned however, that the Government have not even recognised adequately that that imbalance exists. They also seem to display a similar attitude to other, greater potential threats to public health and the available, appropriate and effective medication to deal with them. Let us hope that today's debate will help the Government to take the first steps towards recognising those problems and addressing them, so that the public can be confident that their health will remain at the heart of the issue of when and why they are prescribed drugs.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): I believe that this report is among the three best that I have seen in my 20 years in Parliament. I believe that it required a response from the Government that reflected the courage and thoroughness of David Hinchliffe and the other members of the Committee. Sadly, the Government's response is lamentable. Not only did they not respond to the Committee's clear and important calls, but they ignored many of them altogether.

I will go along with what has been said about the enormous, miraculous progress in pharmaceuticals in the past 100 years or so. Tens of thousands of people would be dead today were it not for drugs, particularly the recent advances in cancer drugs. I make no criticism of the science involved or of that part of the work of the industry whatever. We and the Committee, however, should be very critical of the dark side of the industry—the disease-mongering, the medicalisation of society, and the way that it abuses all the dark arts to encourage all of society to believe that we are ill and need a pill every day. Recently, the greatest increase has been in the incidence of depression, for which prescriptions have risen by more than 400 per cent. in a decade. In the great majority of cases people are suffering from mild depression, but we are taught to believe that if we are sadder today than we were yesterday, we are ill, and we need medication. That is useful for the pharmaceutical industry.

The worst aspect of that was contained in report that came out of America less than a week ago, which suggested that many two to five-year-olds need Ritalin or anti-psychotic drugs. As a consequence of this view, in America one in seven children are on Ritalin—similar to amphetamines in some ways—and worse drugs. The ambition of the pharmaceutical industry is to get us all taking those drugs, which are of questionable value.

I want to consider in particular the effect of the pharmaceutical industry's strategy on us as MPs. About an hour and a half ago in this Chamber, a Member called for the acceleration of the supply of Velcade, I think, which my constituents can get, but many other Members' constituents cannot, because it can be obtained in Wales but not here. There was warm support and almost universal approval for accelerating NICE's processes. I briefly pointed out the results of that in an intervention.

Let me give one story as an example. Yesterday, I received an e-mail from somebody trying to persuade me to raise with the Minister the health problems of obesity, which are well known and a serious matter. I noticed that the e-mail came from a well known lobbying company. I therefore got in touch with it and I asked it who was paying its wages. It turned out to be a group of people called the obesity council. Who pays the obesity council? It is the drug industry—the people who sell slimming aids.

A few weeks ago, I received a letter that interested me greatly, as I had a constituent suffering from pancreatic cancer. The letter was about a new wonder drug called Tarceva, of which I had never heard. I got in touch with the letter's writer, and I felt that I must investigate the matter if such a drug would help my constituents. On investigation, however, it turns out that the cost of prescribing this drug will be £16,000 a year. Its effect was to increase the life expectancy of pancreatic cancer patients by 12 days, and it had adverse side effects including death in 10 per cent. of the patients involved. Increasingly, MPs are being approached to use our office here to put forward a case for the drug industry. That is a thorough abuse of our position. From the Health Committee, however, we had a splendid clarion call against the great abuses that have occurred.

The Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency and the Association of the British Pharmaceutical industry work jointly together, hold joint seminars and campaign together. The MHRA, the regulatory body, is funded 100 per cent. from the pharmaceutical industry. The pharmaceutical industry calls the tune. We could give numerous examples of that. Perhaps the worst was Seroxat, on which I have had two debates in the recent past, before its problems were discovered. The MHRA set up a sub-committee to look into the issue, but it had to disband after some nine months because the majority of the members had a financial interest in the company that produced the drug. The sub-committee had to be re-formed and progress was very slow.

The Health Committee invited me to give evidence and I was able to raise the question of the influence that drug companies have on bodies in this House, such as the all-party groups which have well-intentioned, good hon. Members on them who are trying to reduce the effects of diseases. However, almost all of them are infected by the influence of the pharmaceutical companies. An example that applies to Seroxat and the treatment of mild depression was revealed in a book that I sent to all the members of the Committee before it started its work on the issue. The book is called "Medicines Out of Control?" by Charles Medawar. It asks what would have happened if we had gone to see Sigmund Freud when he practised as a doctor. He gave all his patients and friends, and took himself, a medicine he knew that was believed to improve people's mental health and stability. That medicine was cocaine: it was the popular drug of the time. A later popular drug was bromide, which creates its own form of psychosis, called bromism, which was a scourge of society at the time of the first world war.

For an awful period in the 1960s and 1970s, diazepam—or valium—and other similar drugs were prescribed like smarties. That caused great distress and did very little good. There was also the experimental period of the mental health industry in the 1950s, with the inducement of deep psychosis, lobotomies, leucotomies insulin coma therapy and electroconvulsive therapy. People were used as guinea pigs and suffered greatly. Many of those therapies are rightly no longer used.

More recently, we have had the tricyclics, which were regarded as wonder drugs, but they are now seen as old-fashioned and have been replaced by selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors—SSRIs—of which Seroxat is one. When the campaign against Seroxat was mounted by a few courageous people outside the drug industry, the drug companies mounted a ferocious campaign to ensure that the voices who were protesting about the dangers of Seroxat were muffled. For example, Depression Alliance, a patient group that is virtually a creature of the pharmaceutical industry and gets 80 per cent. of its funding from it—as it has admitted to me—criticised those people who drew attention to the dreadful effects of Seroxat in turning depressed people into suicidal people.

The organisations that emerge with great credit are those that take not a penny from the pharmaceutical industry, such as MIND, which continues to act in the patients' interests. Many so-called patient organisations still receive instructions from and carry out the work of the pharmaceutical industry, and some otherwise splendid organisations are affected. For example, on the day that Vioxx was banned, I went on to the Arthritis Care website. I greatly respect that organisation and it does fine work in encouraging the use of non-drug interventions such as exercise in the treatment of arthritis. On that day, its website told people not to panic if they were taking Vioxx. That drug has been identified as causing 144,000 heart attacks and strokes in the US. I would have thought that reasonable advice in such circumstances would be to panic, if people were taking such a drug. The website also advised people to visit their doctor and follow their advice about changing to another drug. However, it is significant that the website of that respectable organisation contains a notice saying that the site has been refurbished with help from Merck Sharp and Dohme, the company that makes Vioxx. Even a worthy, conscientious organisation such as Arthritis Care must be influenced in some way by the fact that if it upsets the pharmaceutical companies or fails to do their bidding, it will lose some of its staff or funding. Understandably, the Committee recommended action on those patient groups, which should declare all significant funding. It also recommended that the Government should make changes to charity law to ensure that that happens. Unfortunately, the Government have stated that self-regulation should be the first resort in improving fundraising standards, so no action has been taken, although the Home Secretary maintains reserve powers.

This House is infested with organisations that, on the surface, are perfectly good. I had some influence in one of them—I shall not name it—and I see that it is now organising a relaunch with help from a lobbyist. Who is paying the lobbyist? It is one of the pharmaceutical companies. Their influence is everywhere and their tentacles stretch into the Government, the patient bodies and elsewhere.

The key, and most dramatic, moment in the Health Committee inquiry was the unbelievable evidence about the inducements given to clinicians and others to use particular drugs. One of the questioners asked whether the free trips, the holidays and the chance to take one's wife, husband or girlfriend to the Bahamas or the Alps had any effect. The witness replied that they did not, but that articles in the British Medical Journal and The Lancet did. The point, made with great force, was that the way to influence public and medical opinion was to get articles written by authoritative figures in those journals.

As someone with scientific training who has always defended double-blind and properly peer-reviewed trials, my greatest shock in the last couple of years was when the BMJ published an article two years ago, giving examples of reports presented in the medical journals—reports that had got past the very suspicious editors—in which the conclusions did not match the data. The data said something and the conclusions said something else. There were examples of how this was done; the pharmaceutical companies write most of the reports and hawk them round for others to sign and approve. They get some figures and they provide some fat fees.

This element of ghost-writing, raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) in opening the debate, is a matter of great concern, and it is continuing. We saw the accounts given by Dr Blumsohn in last week's edition of The Observer. I met this gentleman and heard what had happened in his case. People talk about life and death; often, it is death and death. The number of people who have lost their lives from an adverse reaction to drugs is enormous. In America, it is claimed that the fourth-largest cause of death is adverse reactions to drugs.

The Leemon McHenry Hastings centre report pointed out that the companies first select the data that promote the drugs. They file away the results that are unfavourable and buy the right academic credentials to sign a ghost-written article produced by marketing department staff or by public relations agencies employed by the company. What are we to regard as the fundamental science, the authoritative work, to which doctors and physicians look if they want to approve a new drug? We know these articles are being ghost-written and the case of Dr. Blumsohn, published last week, made it clear that the companies refused to give him the data on an article to which his name was attached. They claimed his authority for the article and he had not seen the data.

Adam Afriyie: The hon. Gentleman is making a powerful case. NICE does a good job, but is he confident that it will pick up these erroneous reports, trials and information in its processes?

Paul Flynn: We all hope so. Like many, I thought that having a rational and genuinely independent body to look at these matters was a fine reform. The difficulty is the pressure that we all feel as human beings. If a member of our family or a close constituent wanted a drug, we would go along with it, even if there was only a 1 per cent. chance of success, and would want to hurry NICE along. But if we as politicians take a decision, as we should, we should look at what happens with rushed approvals. The reason that Seroxat caused problems was that it was approved off-label for people under 18 when it had not been trialled.

As I said earlier, a fairly recent report, published since the Health Committee report, said that we withdrew 24 drugs in the long period between 1971 and 1992, while the United States withdrew only nine. We had approved all those 15 other drugs, which did a great deal of damage, when America had refused to approve them. A balance must be made—this is often impossible—when patients who suffer from terminal diseases demand drugs that might have even a very slim chance of postponing the inevitable. They want us to approve those drugs, and we politicians tend to put pressure on NICE to give quick decisions.

The evidence is that that the faster the licensing process works, the more frequent the problems and a greater number of lethal reactions take place. If we continue to accelerate our review times, there will be more adverse reactions. That is a difficult case to put across, and it is perhaps almost impossible for us, as politicians, to do so when we see someone sitting in our surgeries telling us that they have a fatal disease and want a drug that might be available in France or Wales, but not elsewhere.

Dr. Blumsohn spent a year requesting to see the full data on which the work that was published under his name was based. He was one of two lead authors. Two years after raising his concern, he was suspended from his university post. In The Observer last Sunday, Proctor and Gamble is reported as saying that it is "standard industry practice" not to hand over all data to professionals. That seems extraordinary, and it is regrettable that the Government have failed to respond in any way to that crucial issue in their response to the report. That is the key issue turned up by the Health Committee.

No reforms are proposed for the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency, although it has been criticised in debate after debate in the House because of its nature, organisation and funding. That was another main concern that the Government left untouched in their response. The MHRA is still 100 per cent. funded by the industry and the system relies on self-regulation. There is talk of reviews every four years, but a thorough, independent review was not agreed to.

We have seen the pathetically weak response from the ABPI, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy). An early-day motion was tabled last night—it has amassed one signature so far—and I tried generously to amend it to point out that there was presumably some support for the ABPI in praising its new code. As the hon. Lady rightly said, the code of practice has been described as weak by the BMJ and by the Drug and Therapeutics Bulletin. She rightly made the point that the ABPI has never expelled a member. It has never even forced one of them to publish any corrective statement, although there are dozens of examples of misleading advertising and products that should not have been marketed as they were. We are dealing with a defensive group, lobbying for and defending the industry and putting at the top of its priorities not the concerns and health of the public, but the financial interests of the pharmaceutical industry.

Dr. Iddon: My hon. Friend paints a very black picture indeed of the pharmaceutical industry. I cannot deny that the industry has had some failures, but would he admit that, overall, its benefits far outweigh its deficiencies? Would he admit that the large mental institutions have been emptied by the introduction of modern drugs for the treatment of mental illness? Would he admit that the treatment of cardiovascular disease has been revolutionised by the introduction of beta blockers? Would he admit that the treatment of ulcers has been revolutionised—indeed, no ulcer patient goes into hospital anymore—by the discovery by Smith Kline and French at Welwyn Garden City of H2 inhibitors, of which cimetidine was the first? Would he admit that the pharmaceutical industry does far more good than harm of the kind that he is highlighting?

Paul Flynn: I agree entirely; we could continue to record such successes at great length. Indeed, I think in my opening remarks I used the word "miraculous" when talking about the industry. I am trying to separate the job creation and the benefits to humankind, which have been enormous, as my hon. Friend said, from the marketing side of the industry. That is the whole point of the debate. We want to give the industry the pat on the back that it definitely needs, but we also want to draw attention to the points that the Health Committee legitimately raised.

Dr. Iddon: So will my hon. Friend admit that scientists throughout the pharmaceutical industry are acting purely ethically and that the main trouble lies with the marketing of drugs, and with the salespeople and accountants of those firms?

Paul Flynn: I am not sure whether my hon. Friend was present earlier, but I tried to make that distinction when I said that the integrity of the scientists in the industry and their devotion to their work was not in question.

The Select Committee report called for much greater action from the Government in every way. It is disappointing that so few members of the previous Committee are members of the new one, but I am sure that the new Committee will vigorously take up the report and the deficiency in the Government's response to it. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) said, enormous strides have been made in the work of the drug industry over the years, but there is still an awful energy in the industry that is used with malign effect—disease-mongering by inventing diseases and then a cure for them. The medicalisation of society has proceeded at a great rate and is looting huge amounts of money from the national health service to the detriment of other services. The drug budget increases constantly. Some of those drugs are essential and life-saving but others are not; in fact, they are life-damaging.

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): The hon. Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn) has strong views on these issues. He and I have discussed them on various occasions, and we are joint officers of a group that is particularly interested in such matters. I am not sure how widely the hon. Gentleman's views are shared in the House. He may prove to be a Churchillian figure and eventually his views will be shared by a majority of us. As a member of the Select Committee, I am grateful for his support of our views.

The inquiry into the influence of the pharmaceutical industry was the idea of David Hinchliffe, our excellent former Chairman. I am sure that his successor, the right hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), will prove equally excellent. It is a shame that David Hinchliffe, who retired at a relatively early age at the last election, is not with us this afternoon. He was keen to hold the inquiry, a highlight of which was our visit to Australia. I warn the House that I shall shortly be submitting a photograph taken on that trip to the caption competition in The House Magazine. I was not in the photograph, which shows a number of my colleagues who look like Snow White and the seven dwarfs. I hope that the winner of the caption competition will invite me to enjoy a glass of whisky.

As the hon. Member for Newport, West said, unfortunately only two members of the Select Committee responsible for the report are in the Chamber today. That is no discourtesy to the House. One of the members who participated in the inquiry, Patsy Calton, tragically died at an early age. As several other such members were regrettably defeated at the last election—I say that genuinely—the membership of the Committee changed.

The report is excellent. Following on from a point made by the hon. Member for Newport, West, may I say to the Minister that we are just a little disappointed that in contrast to many responses to the report, the Government seem to have said no to more of our recommendations than is usual? I would appreciate hearing from the Minister why the Government were so firm.

I now part company with the hon. Member for Newport, West because there is a danger that this is a debate in which we will want to have our cake and eat it at the same time. After hon. Members have heard my speech, they might say, "Hang on, that is exactly what the hon. Member for Southend, West has just done." The United Kingdom owes a great debt of gratitude to the pharmaceutical industry for its funding of significant amounts of medical research and the consequent reductions in cost to the national health service.

There is an argument that the regulatory burden on developing new medicines has increased markedly over the past two decades and that the balance between risk and benefit has been tipped a little too far in favour of the former. The National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence is an important body, and my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor (Adam Afriyie) has referred to it several times today. However, our report said that the recent cut to its budget might have a significant impact on the speed at which new medicines reach patients. The Government's recent moves to extend the prescribing power of nurses and pharmacists, which many of us welcome, might render it more difficult to restrain the growing influence of the pharmaceutical industry and the increase in the medicalisation of our society.

I hope that I will not regret making this statement, although it will please the hon. Member for Newport, West, but there is a view in certain quarters that we can sometimes be seen as a nation of hypochondriacs. We all know about those who are really ill and perhaps never even go to a GP, while other people always think that they are dying, although they invariably live to be 100 or more. All the new products on the market to make us look more wonderful and feel better pressurise people to think, "It's out there; let's have it." However, as the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) said, that is perhaps due to accountants and advertisers, rather than scientists, who do such wonderful work.

There was a theme throughout the Health Committee's inquiry that highlighted the increased medicalisation of our society. Every malfunction in the human body can now be diagnosed as a defect and some sort of medication is available to treat it. It is thus no surprise that self-medication is on the increase and that GPs are put under more pressure by their patients. People can now access websites on which they can find out about whatever their problems are. I was interested by what was said about pancreatic cancer because many of us deal with constituents who come along and say, "My loved one is in dire straits. Here's this product; what can you do to try to make it available?" It is difficult to deal with such a situation.

The phenomenon is symptomatic of the pharmaceutical industry. It can be argued that the industry has been left to its own devices for too long. That was the thrust of the Health Committee report. The industry can target not only general practitioners, hospitals, treatment groups, medical journals and professional bodies in distribution campaigns, but individuals as well. The Health Committee thought that that practice put genuinely ill and vulnerable people at risk to some extent. Everyone, including patients and consumers, should be protected from pharmaceutical companies' persuasive product pushing. As a Conservative, I am certainly not in favour of the nanny state, but a balance must be struck and there is a role for Government, which is why we are genuinely disappointed that more of our recommendations were not accepted. The powers of the statutory regulator—the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency—should be strengthened to ensure that the evidence produced by pharmaceutical companies truly reflects the findings of their clinical trials. That research should be undertaken in a professional manner, and the disadvantages as well as the benefits of licensed drugs should be well known to people who prescribe and use them.

I welcome the revised and updated Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry code of practice, which was announced on 16 November. It will govern the UK-based pharmaceutical industry's relations with health care professionals from January next year. It highlights the key priority of patient safety, and sets guidelines and restrictions on pharmaceutical companies' advertising strategies. It bans promotional competitions, including one cited in the Library briefing. In September 2005, a dentistry magazine featured a promotion for the drug Periostat that included a competition to win an iPod Mini. I have not entered the competition, but I am tempted to encourage my children to do so, as they all want iPods for Christmas.

Responsibility for clinical practices should not lie with the pharmaceutical industry alone. The Health Committee strongly recommended that doctors should be obliged to declare significant sums of money or gifts that they receive as hospitality, and that they should register them with their professional bodies. The profession will say that only a tiny minority is involved but, even so, we believe that those gifts should be registered. Likewise, the ABPI code tightens the rules on hospitality, stating that delegates to company sponsored events, as we have heard, should only be flown economy class. However, it does not go as far as banning provision for five-star hotel accommodation, which is a shame.

The ABPI says:

"There are rigorous guidelines for conducting clinical trials and a code of practice governing all promotional activities."

Despite those assertions, a number of practices have emerged that are clearly against the public interest, including the suppression of negative clinical trial findings resulting in a body of evidence that does not allow a transparent view of a product's risk-benefit ratio. That is especially important, as guidance such as that produced by NICE is based on such published evidence.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that a Sheffield university lecturer was sacked because, although he was not quite a whistleblower, he queried a decision? He began some work, the results of which were sent to Proctor and Gamble. He queried the company's decision to allow a drug on to the market, and he was sacked. Is that ethical and is it good practice, or is it a one-off event?

Mr. Amess: The House will have heard what the hon. Gentleman said. It is a valuable intervention, which I know the Minister heard. I hope that the case was a one-off, but I suspect not. We should reflect on it, and perhaps the Minister will respond.

It is gratifying that the industry is being forced to look seriously at the concerns that we raised in the report about its professional practices. It should be stressed, however, that the code is voluntary, without the backing of law. The code promises reforms to speed up the complaints procedure, with tougher measures to withdraw products during investigations, but on close examination, the sanctions for companies that break the code are lightweight in relation to the serious implications of such failings, with naming and shaming taking preference over financial penalties.

I shall not attempt to pronounce the name of the editor of the Drug and Therapeutics Bulletin. He was quoted in the British Medical Journal on 26 November as saying:

"This has been heralded as a new dawn in the promotion of prescription medicines and allied activities. But the problem is that the code is fundamentally weak because the ultimate sanction a company faces for breaking it is very limited."

Indeed, the ultimate sanction that a pharmaceutical company can face for breaking the code is expulsion from the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry. As the House has heard, that has never happened. What we should be striving towards instead, as the Select Committee report suggested, is the strengthening of the MHRA, the statutory regulator that exists purely to protect the public interest, independently of the industry.

I am not suggesting that the Department is naive enough to assume that the interests of the health sector and of the pharmaceuticals industry are synonymous. Clearly, although there is an overlap, the former is driven primarily by patient care and the public interest, whereas the latter must also weigh medical need against the returns that it will get from its investment. This is why, quite wisely, the Committee concluded that a key recommendation of its report would be that the sponsorship of the industry be passed from the Department of Health to the Department of Trade and Industry, so as to avoid that conflict of interest. I very much regret that this recommendation was rejected by the Government in their response to our report. I hope the Minister will comment on that.

Overall, the tone of the Government's response was complacent. We have heard from the Chairman of the Select Committee that he was responsible for geeing up the response. Whether it was prepared too quickly I do not know. In reply to a number of the Committee's concluding recommendations, the Department of Health stated that the current guidelines or measures were sufficient to deal with the concerns raised. The Committee does not accept that. For example, the Government did not strongly support the Committee's proposals to subject the MHRA to an independent review that would examine the regulation process with a view to making it more transparent. I much regret that.

The need for more transparency in the industry was another ongoing theme throughout our inquiry, not only so that medical practitioners and the public can make informed judgments about the evidence they are presented with by the pharmaceutical companies, but so that they are more informed about the materials considered by the MHRA in its inquiries. It was disappointing that in their response, the Government committed only to a suitably planned review of the MHRA without giving a start date for the review cycle, which leaves us unclear as to whether the process will go ahead. A four-year cycle is too loose and not realistic enough.

The issue of independent regulation is given added salience when we consider a series of controversial treatments that have hit our headlines in recent months. The hon. Member for Newport, West mentioned that following the death of a patient who had been taking the painkiller Vioxx, which, as he rightly said, has been shown to increase the risk of heart attacks and strokes, a US court found against the responsible company, Merck. During the case, it emerged that Merck had deliberately hidden its reservations about the treatment, which was a worrying discovery.

Here in Britain, the Minister announced at the end of October that primary care trusts should fund the treatment of Herceptin for the early stages of breast cancer, if it is clinically appropriate. He has probably not had time to read his boss's comments to the Health Committee on Tuesday, when the Secretary of State for Health was involved in an interesting exchange with a Labour Member. Herceptin has not yet been licensed for treatment in early cases, and to allow a politician to bypass all the licensing safeguards to demand that a treatment should be made available on the NHS is surely not a precedent that we should set.

Two weeks ago, I asked the chief medical officer about inoculation against tuberculosis. The old product ceased to be used when Parliament broke up for the summer recess, so there was no chance to challenge the decision in Parliament, and the new product is unlicensed. I do not want to start scaremongering among the general public, but I am concerned about the message that is being sent out. The House has probably forgotten that change, although I do not bear the scar of a TB inoculation.

Mr. Lansley: Does my hon. Friend agree that although this matter is not covered in the Health Committee report, the mechanism for the approval of vaccinations and immunisations is still within the hands of the Department of Health and does not rest with National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence? On TB testing, there is a very good case for examining the efficacy of the old technology for skin tests compared with new blood-testing technologies, and I have asked questions about that matter. At the moment, the mechanism sits inside the DOH and vaccinations and immunisations are not exposed to an evidence-based appraisal by NICE.

Mr. Amess: I like where my hon. Friend is leading me and am aware of his interest in the matter. The Minister has heard our exchange, and I am sure that the general public will become increasingly interested in what is going on. We certainly need to clarify the matter.

It is vital that new drugs are proven to be of real therapeutic benefit to patients, and clinical trials should therefore aim to produce health outcomes that are relevant to patient care rather than relevant to the profits made by pharmaceutical companies. That is why the Health Committee made the sensible recommendation that better communications should be established between the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency and the pharmaceutical companies in the early development stages of a drug. There should be more post-licensing monitoring of medicines, which requires systematic appraisals of drugs on the market. I hope that the Minister will comment on that point in order to reassure the Committee.

There is no doubt that medicines contribute enormously to the health of the nation. The hon. Member for Newport, West is not present, but I was concerned by his remarks about drugs to assist people who are depressed or who have other mental health problems, because I think that he overstated the case against those drugs. For many people, they are the source of a better quality of life, negating the need for surgery or other invasive treatments.

Economically speaking, the production of pharmaceuticals is the third most profitable activity in the United Kingdom after tourism and finance. The UK should be very proud of the many achievements of its domestic pharmaceutical industry, as it has an excellent global reputation for scientific research, accounting for 10 per cent. of global research and development expenditure.

In order to maintain that wonderful reputation, the Government must act to protect the public, especially the elderly and less well-off, who are the biggest users of prescription-only treatments but also the most vulnerable people in society. It would be unrealistic to rely on the pharmaceutical industry to protect the public interest through self-regulation, but neither must we over-regulate through the statutory body. All restrictions on pharmaceutical companies must be targeted, and they must have a clear purpose in the promotion of public safety.

I believe that the United Kingdom's pharmaceutical industry is a respected and highly lucrative business, but I also believe that it is the Government's responsibility to ensure that it remains so.

2.51 pm

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): I have not come prepared to give a speech, but I should like to comment briefly on patient safety. I congratulate the Health Committee on an excellent report and my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) on introducing the debate.

I turn first to internet sales and self-medication, although the report does not cover that particular aspect. We are reaching the point where we have to think about regulating internet sales of medicines. A growing number of people are buying medicines that are available in this country and cheaper on the internet or that are unavailable in this country and have potential risks attached to their use. I am worried that people may be putting themselves at risk by self-medicating in this way. I am told that some of the information associated with these products that is given on the internet can be inaccurate. People should therefore use it with caution. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to consider that.

Parallel trading is of even greater concern to me. Britain is one of the leading research countries in the discovery of new medicines. We have a very proud record, going back to the early sulphonamides and leading up to some of the most advanced anti-cancer drugs of today. That fine record continues to thrive, for various reasons. We have a good science base. The universities produce excellent scientists and medical people who do the research. We have tremendous hospitals that carry out excellent clinical trials, despite what has been said.

The whole environment in Britain is conducive to the discovery of first-class medicines. The pharmaceutical industry is of course profitable, as we have just heard. The pricing structure for the purchase of drugs by the national health service aids in the discovery of drugs in this country because medicines are sold at a higher price to the NHS than they are in many other countries throughout the world, including in Europe. Products that are available in this country can also be bought in Greece, but a country such as Greece does not contribute to the research and development of drugs to anywhere near the degree that Britain does. A product will be on sale in Greece, and in many other countries, at a much cheaper price than in Britain. The pharmaceutical companies in, for example, America, Germany and Britain export their products to countries such as Greece and Bulgaria with foreign-language packets and foreign-language inserted leaflets, so that the patient knows about all the side effects. An entrepreneur can therefore pick up those products in Greece much more cheaply than he or she can buy them in this country. The entrepreneurs then trade them back to Britain, where many may have been made in the first place.

There is a requirement to repackage the product if the box and the leaflet inside it have been printed in a foreign language. Therein lies the difficulty. The boxes are reopened, the leaflets are removed, new leaflets are put in, sometimes new labels are stuck over the French or Greek on the box and, often, even the boxes are reprinted. The product is then sold through the outlets that are commonly available in this country. That might appear okay, but there are problems.

Earlier this year, the Science and Technology Committee visited the small African country of Malawi. We split up into two teams—an agriculture team and a health team—and I joined the health team. We visited hospitals in Lilongwe and elsewhere in the country. I visited a small district hospital in the centre of Malawi, which orders its drugs for some very sick patients from the central stores in Lilongwe. They are supposed to reach the hospital on the back of a wagon. Unfortunately, corruption is rife in many African countries as in many countries throughout the world. Many drugs do not reach the patients; they fall off the back of a wagon into the hands of a criminal entrepreneur. Consequently, patients die of tuberculosis, AIDS, HIV and all sorts of tropical diseases. They die as a result of parallel trading.

The entrepreneur trades the product that has been exported from a western country to Africa back to the western country because it is available much more cheaply in the African country than it is in, for example, Britain. Those parallel traders cause immense damage. In repackaging the products and sticking in another leaflet, mistakes can be made. For example, the drugs can be mixed up. However, I am even more worried about parallel trading from what I heard recently. As I said earlier, my great worry is counterfeiting.

The trade in counterfeiting drugs is growing at an enormous pace. People are copying drugs all over the world. Last evening, at a joint meeting of the all-party group on the packaging manufacturing industry and the all-party group on pharmacy, I heard that the counterfeiters are professional and are even buying the same packaging material as the professional companies use—for example, Pfizer in Kent. Obviously they do not have the same careful production processes and, in particular, they do not have the same quality control processes.

Last night, we were shown pictures of drugs that had been counterfeited. They had been made chemically, using the same processes, but there are impurities in all chemical processes. Our pharmaceutical companies have good quality control to ensure that there are no dangerous impurities in the drugs on the market in our countries.

So, what happens? A drug is counterfeited, often with impurities in it, and placed in packaging identical to that produced by firms such as Pfizer, GlaxoSmithKline and AstraZeneca. We were shown examples of those packages last night. When they were placed side by side with the real ones, we could hardly tell the difference. Inside the packages, the leaflets and blister packs also looked authentic. When we in the audience were asked which was the authentic drug and which was the counterfeit, or parallel-traded, drug, it was very difficult to tell the difference.

Mr. Walker: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that organised criminals are moving into this field because it is more lucrative than narcotics?

Dr. Iddon: I agree. I am suggesting that criminal entrepreneurs have now entered the parallel trading market. Last night, I was given a figure for the amount of counterfeit, parallel-traded products that are now entering the market in this country. I shall not repeat it because I cannot remember it accurately, but it was a very significant figure indeed. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to listen to the industry on this issue, because it is now complaining very loudly, not only directly to the Department of Health but through trade organisations such as the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry.

Dr. Gibson: Is my hon. Friend saying that pharmacists do not know where the pills have come from? Do they simply make a judgment based on the colour of the box? How do they know whether they are getting the real thing?

Dr. Iddon: Pharmacists often do not know where the box has come from. Last night, we were shown a trick that the pharmaceutical companies have introduced. They have invented a new kind of print that is stuck on to the box. In the example that we were shown, the name "Pfizer" was used. The pharmacist is provided with a device that allows them to match an example of the print with the print on the box. If the print on the box is not authentic, it is possible to see the difference. However, it will not be long before the criminal entrepreneurs are doing the same thing.

Last night, we discussed how we could prevent the counterfeiting of drugs and the use of the parallel trading system. One suggestion was that electronic tags could be placed in the boxes. I suggested to the meeting—and I suggest to the House today—that when a pharmaceutical product leaves the factory, it goes out with a transport audit. For example, if it had been manufactured by Pfizer, it would come out of Kent and the transport audit would follow it through every stage of its journey. Perhaps, however, I have not thought the idea through; criminal entrepreneurs could find a way round that, too.

I must tell the Minister that we urgently—and I do mean urgently—need to have discussions about this matter, otherwise patients in our national health service are going to start dying as a result of taking these contaminated, counterfeit, parallel-traded products.

3.2 pm

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): I should like to start by echoing the comments of the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), who paid tribute to the previous Chair of the Health Committee, the former hon. Member for Wakefield. I also pay tribute to the staff of the Committee, particularly the excellent Committee specialists, who assist the Clerks so ably. I also echo the comment that the right hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) has shaped up well in his first few Health Committee meetings.

I agree with the hon. Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn) that the Government's response to the report was rather slim. It was also incredibly late. We finished our report on 5 April, but the response did not come out until September. I had imagined that the people who wrote these responses would not have much to do during the general election campaign. I do not think that the Minister wrote very much of it. Why was the response released right in the middle of the recess, when no one could really comment on it and we could not get any press coverage?

My other complaint about the response is that it is the most difficult one to follow that I have ever seen. We made 48 recommendations. The Government, in their wisdom, have renumbered them, so anyone who reads them has to have both copies open in front of them. They would need to work out that our recommendation No. 18 was the Government's recommendation No. 2. Perhaps we made a mistake with the heading "Conclusions and recommendations". The Government may have thought that they were to respond to recommendations and not to conclusions. In any event, they responded to only 32 of our 48 recommendations, although, to be fair, some of their responses to those covered some of the others.

Although much has been said by other Members, regrettably only the hon. Member for Southend, West and I were on the Committee. I think that I can reassure those who were photographed in a remarkable disguise. The hon. Member for Southend, West somehow avoided that. I must take it up with him afterwards: why on earth was he not present? The disguise was like Ku Klux Klan garb, without the pointed hat but with just a narrow slit to look through. As I do not think that many of us will have been recognisable, I am not too worried.

Members have left me a good deal to cover. I shall begin with research. Five recommendations mentioned it, but only one was given the honour of a reply. As is well known, the Department of Health invests about a sixth of the amount invested by the drugs industry in research—about 0.8 per cent. of its budget. That may be why it did not feel willing or able to comment on an activity that is funded so generously by the industry.

Our recommendation 2—I had to struggle to remember what number we gave it—was not mentioned in the response. It states:

"Priorities for research into medicines inevitably reflect the interests of the pharmaceutical companies and are not necessarily well aligned with the medical needs of all patients. The industry will continue to undertake the bulk of research in this area, but there are improvements which could be made. We welcome Lord Warner's recognition of this and look forward to his proposals to align more closely the drug companies' research strategies with the public health aims of the NHS."

I thought that if Lord Warner, a Minister of State at the Department, had said that, there should have been a response, but try as I might, I could not find it.

Dr. Gibson: Did the Committee's study of research reach any conclusion on the merger mania in the pharmaceutical industry? When Glaxo and SmithKline merged, Sir Richard Sykes and Jan Leschly said that research would benefit from the merger because they would be working together. Is there any evidence that mergers lead to better research?

Dr. Taylor: I do not think that there was any hard evidence that that merger had produced an increase in research, but I do not think that we asked the question, so regrettably I cannot help the hon. Gentleman. The one thing I remember only too well about the Glaxo merger with SmithKline is that I had to sell my shares so that I would not have to declare an interest.

Several Members mentioned "me-too" drugs, the duplicates or near-duplicates of existing drugs, which are relatively cheap for companies to produce. We were rather down on them because of the number available. Three or four beta blockers will provide all that is needed in terms of variety, as will a small number of non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drugs. We issued a plea for a wider distribution of really effective local drug and therapeutics committees working over acute and primary care trusts to introduce some control to prescribing of that kind.

Clinical trials have already been mentioned briefly and several recommendations in the report refer to them. We wanted an independent register and records kept of negative trials and of drugs that were terminated due to side effects. We wanted to ensure that comparator drugs were used and that the particular comparator drug was the right one to choose. We wanted drug treatments to be compared, where possible, with non-drug treatments. It is not clear from the Government's response whether they have taken all those details into account; they seem rather to hide behind European rules.

I feel very strongly about the promotion of new drugs. Our recommendation 5, which was not answered, stated:

"The aggressive promotion of medicines shortly after launch, the sheer volume of information that is received in its many forms by prescribers and the 'promotional hospitality masquerading as education', in the absence of effective countervailing forces, all contribute to the inappropriate prescription of medicines."

I thought that that was a powerful recommendation.

I am interested to hear other hon. Members' comments on the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry code of conduct. I am slightly less dismissive of it than others. I agree that there may be an element of window dressing, as mentioned by the hon. Member for Newport, West, but I hope that it is at least a first attempt at self-regulation. In other inquiries, such as the one into obesity, the Health Committee has recognised that self-regulation of the food industry was probably a more practicable measure to aim for than strict regulation from outside. I will study the code of practice carefully. I am not sure whether it covers either ghost-writing or fees to experts, which are important matters.

Returning to the intensive promotion of new drugs, I would like to refer to another recommendation. To avoid confusion, it was our recommendation 33, though it appears as recommendation 6 in the Government response. Our recommendation stated:

"The intensive marketing which encourages inappropriate prescribing of drugs must be curbed. Present methods of supplying independent information, as described by Lord Warner, are inadequate."

We went on to recommend that "the promotional material for a new product" should be "pre-vetted by the MHRA". I believe that that is going to happen. We further recommended that "consideration be given to limiting those who can prescribe a new drug in the two years following launch. Drug and Therapeutics Committees would be well-placed to implement this."

That provides another function for such committees.

In their response, the Government agreed that there should be proper controls, but they subsequently lost the plot completely, saying:

"There is no indication that the measures currently in place are not effective. The fact that generic prescribing has risen to nearly 78 per cent. (in 2003) clearly indicates that clinicians are writing prescriptions generically and not by individual company product."

[Dr. Taylor]

One cannot write a prescription generically for a drug that is new and under patent because it effectively does not yet exist. I was not very impressed with that aspect of the Government response.

An example of the rapid uptake of a new drug causing problems is of course Vioxx. It has been referred to by several Members today, but I will go over some of this ground again because it is so important. Vioxx was launched as an answer to all the upper gastrointestinal problems that undoubtedly occur through the use of existing anti-inflammatory drugs for various forms of arthritis. It was introduced in 1999 and withdrawn in September 2004 when work in America showed how dangerous it was from the point of view of causing heart attacks and strokes.

To express a slightly different view, we lost what was thought to be a potentially useful drug due to the unpredictable side effects brought to light by very widespread, very rapid prescribing. I have spoken to drugs firms about this and they claim that in fact, it was a good thing that Vioxx was prescribed so widely, because doing so brought the side effects to light much more quickly. I do not quite follow that argument.

During the inquiry, we visited University College London hospital to hear about its Use of Medicines Committee. We were incredibly impressed with its drug formulary, which is used not only by the hospital trust but by the nearby primary care trusts. Because members of those trusts are on the committee, it is also well accepted by the GPs in the area. Its prescribing levels of Vioxx—surprise, surprise—were lower than the nationwide average because it had careful guidelines. It took the view that this is a new drug and no one knows entirely what is going to happen, so we should be careful with it, please.

Paul Flynn: Does the hon. Gentleman believe that, given the problems with Vioxx, which is just one of the COX-2 inhibitors, there is reason to look carefully at other such inhibitors? Some 1 million prescriptions were issued for Vioxx, but 3 million prescriptions have been issued for other COX-2 inhibitors that are still being prescribed.

Dr. Taylor: I agree absolutely with the hon. Gentleman, and I shall deal with another point relating to COX-2 inhibitors in a moment.

On the explosion of new drugs, several of our report's recommendations pointed out that prescribers must share part of the blame; we cannot put it all on to the pharmaceutical companies. In this respect, local drug formularies are vital. Prescribing should possibly be limited to certain groups of doctors, and they certainly should have better education on these matters. Both the British National Formulary and the Drug and Therapeutics Bulletin are absolutely essential in that education process.

I am rather worried by a communication that I received just yesterday from the Drug and Therapeutics Bulletin, in which it pointed out that it is in discussions concerning its contract with the Department of Health to supply the bulletin free to 117,000 health professionals. At the moment, the Department of Health takes out a bulk subscription for doctors, nurses and other people who prescribe drugs. This little publication consists of just four pages. It can be folded, fitted into the pocket and read in the lift or on the tube, but it is incredibly important and valuable. A survey has shown that 89 per cent. of its readers find it either "very" or "quite" influential. It is in the top three of the most-read of such publications. The vast majority of respondents—86 per cent.—cited its independence as a very important factor. So I ask the Minister to examine the question of the withdrawal of that bulk subscription very carefully. The bulletin is extremely valuable to the 117,000 people who receive it.

I emphasise that the restricted prescription of new drugs is automatic when advances are made with drugs. Examples of that would include the new treatments for cancer or rheumatoid arthritis, for instance, as such drugs would be prescribed only by consultants. The recommendation mainly applies to the more popular drugs, such as those in the Vioxx group and, as usual, a balance must be struck between the pharmaceutical industry's need to get a return on its huge investment and the requirement to ensure patient safety.

I do not know whether the hon. Member for Newport, West saw last week's British Medical Journal, but it contains a most interesting report on a large group of patients who took one of the Vioxx group of drugs. The results throw into doubt suggestions that the drugs in that group are safer than the ordinary non-steroidals used for the gastrointestinal tract. The article is very interesting, and shows that we cannot win in this respect.

I was trained by wise and experienced physicians in the good old Westminster hospital, only about half a mile from here. One of them was practising when cortisone was invented and he had seen patients who were crippled with rheumatoid arthritis be cured absolutely for six weeks—the so-called cortisone honeymoon—but who had to come off the drug as soon as the side effects became evident. I was brought up to be extraordinarily careful with new drugs, because doctors do not, and cannot, know what they do. For example, thalidomide was introduced just after I qualified, and I am ashamed to say that I probably prescribed that drug for some people when I was a houseman at Westminster hospital.

The first duty of a doctor is not to cause harm. With reference to that, I came across the marvellous proverb:

"A merry heart doeth good like a medicine."

Sadly, that needs to be brought up to date so that it says "like a good medicine", as I am sorry to say that some medicines are not good, contrary to initial appearances.

I also came across a quotation from Sir William Osler, as follows:

"The desire to take medicine is perhaps the greatest feature which distinguishes man from animals."

The drug industry therefore has an extraordinarily favourable market right from the beginning: people want to take medicines as they do not believe that other types of treatment work. That brings me to the need for regulation, a matter that has been covered extensively by several hon. Members already.

I am sorry that the Government have not agreed to an independent review. I am hoping against hope that the four-yearly cycle review will be independent, that it will cover the ground set out by the right hon. Member for Rother Valley and so go some way towards removing concerns about the independence of the MHRA.

Just yesterday, concern was expressed to me that the replacement organisation for the Committee on Safety of Medicines, which was abolished on 31 October, is not yet in place. The Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I understand that the expert advisory groups that will take the place of the CSM in advising the MHRA have not been set up yet. During that gap, are patients more at risk? I believe that the groups will not be in place until February, and they will not be functional immediately, so for how long will there be a gap during which patients are probably vulnerable?

On post-marketing surveillance, which has also been covered quite well, let me quote recommendation 29, which was our paragraph 45:

"We recommend that the extent, cost and implications of illness resulting from the use of medicines be systematically investigated by the Department of Health in conjunction with the MHRA."

It is known, as the Government's response states, that the burden of adverse drug reactions on the NHS is high, with 6.5 per cent. of hospital admissions due to it.

Why is that still happening? Many statements in the British National Formulary, which many doctors carry, will enable the sort of side effects that lead to illness to be avoided. A classic side effect of SSRIs—selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors—particularly in the very old, is to cause a drop in the sodium level in the blood, which can be extraordinarily dangerous for the elderly. Three people in my area have suffered that side effect, which is mentioned in the British National Formulary. These are matters of education to be considered.

I look forward tremendously to electronic prescribing, which has also been mentioned, as the electronic system, when it is really working, will be able to flag up immediately side effects with other drugs or a contraindication with the age of the patient, and could make a tremendous difference.

When the Committee visited Australia, we were impressed by the production of a series of lovely little pocket books of well-organised therapeutic guidelines across many subjects in the whole of medicine. We are lagging behind on that. The only disappointment was that it did not appear that the Australian authorities had done a trial on hospital admissions due to drug-induced illness, to see whether those guidelines, which were being used widely, were making a difference.

Possibly one of the most controversial recommendations, which has been mentioned, related to the Department of Health's concern to represent the interests of patients, the NHS and the drug industry, which was described by some of our witnesses as "cross-dressing". One of the recommendations, which was responded to but in a negative way, referred to the Department of Health's role, which, because of those wide responsibilities, perhaps does not serve the public as well as it should.

I agree with everybody that we must retain a viable pharmaceutical industry. If we consider rough figures, however, 90 per cent. of the world's research is targeted at illnesses affecting only 10 per cent. of the world's population. We would love to see some guidance given to the major pharmaceutical industries to give some help to those huge numbers of the world's population who are not being thought of. In Australia, we came across one small firm making a microbicidal gel for the prevention of HIV/AIDS. That would be relatively cheap and a huge advance. I would love the Minister to comment on whether the Government can try to influence the industry in that way.

Mr. Lansley: Let us give credit where it is due. The World Health Organisation has instituted the global campaign for microbicides and the British Government have allocated £16 million in support between 2003 and 2006.

Dr. Taylor: I am aware of that and I agree.

The Government somehow have to balance the needs of patient safety and the industry's ability not only to survive, but to survive in a reasonably profitable form. The lesson that we learned in Australia from New Zealand was that the controls were so firm that the pharmaceutical industry had virtually moved out of that country.

3.30 pm

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this important debate. I thought that I would need to have my boxing gloves on, metaphorically speaking, to take on the hon. Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn), but as I listened to his excellent speech I found that I agreed with much of it.

I must first declare an interest in that Merck Sharp and Dohme is based in my constituency. I am pleased to have that company there, it is a good employer and I hope that it continues to operate out of the UK as well as other countries. The pharmaceutical industry plays an important role in the UK. It employs many hundreds of my constituents and across the country it employs many tens of thousands of people. It spends a vast amount of money on research—it should be remembered that only one or two in 100 drugs on the drawing board reach fruition. Of course, pharmaceutical companies need to make returns on those one or two to fund future research. I have no objection, therefore, to pharmaceutical companies marketing more aggressively than perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to see them do, or to their making a profit.

Before I became a Member of Parliament, I worked in health care as a PR person. That is why I listened with great interest to the hon. Gentleman. At the tender age of 27, I was responsible for promoting certain diseases, one of which was osteoporosis, and 11 years ago, it probably needed promoting. The system works as follows. Some motivated and passionate charities are connected with certain diseases, and they have very little or no money. In such cases, generous pharmaceutical companies with a treatment for one of those diseases come along and sponsor some of the charities' activities. As I said, we needed to promote osteoporosis because so many people, especially women, were afflicted with it, and politicians—we had a Conservative Government then—did not take it seriously or see it as a priority.

I have to say that I now regret my involvement in promoting some diseases, especially depression. While some people do suffer from serious depression and

[Mr. Charles Walker]

SSRIs are useful drugs for treating it, I am concerned that too many doctors, for whatever reason, prescribe SSRIs without taking the time to understand the causes of their patients' problems. I understand, from talking to many of the same charities to which the hon. Gentleman has talked, that sometimes a patient gets less than five minutes and to get them out of the door they are prescribed SSRIs, which can have serious side effects for some people and cause great discomfort. They can also be very difficult to come off. I hope that as a result of this debate the Minister will take away the concerns about SSRIs. Perhaps we need a process of education for GPs to ensure that they take more time to understand the root causes of people's problems before prescribing a pharmaceutical solution.

I am glad that the ABPI recognises some of the concerns about support for patient groups and paid-for doctors writing in support of drug companies' solutions to an illness. Coming from a PR background, I am aware that there was always a difference between an advertorial and an editorial, and perhaps we have seen editorials that should have been branded as advertorials. There should be greater transparency. Pharmaceutical companies should make it clear which groups they support, be they academic or charities, and when a doctor or professional writing in support of a treatment is in receipt of funding from the company producing that treatment, that should be made clear.

This was intended to be a short speech, so I shall conclude by agreeing with the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) on the danger of counterfeit medicine and internet pharmacy, 99.99 per cent. of which is unregulated and operated from places such as Tonga in the Pacific. Drugs that are sold back to the UK may be as harmless as sugar but, for example, if a woman were to take Propetia, it could have severe, possibly even life-threatening, implications for her health. I hope that I can join the hon. Gentleman, perhaps in a future debate in Westminster Hall, to explore that problem, which was not covered by the report.

Madam Deputy Speaker, I thank you for allowing me to take part and I thank all Members for listening to me so closely.

3.35 pm

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): It is a pleasure to participate in this debate. We should be thankful to the pharmaceutical industry, which, over the past couple of hundred years, has introduced cures and treatments for ailments that affect many people. We should be thankful to the Select Committee for its excellent report and recommendations. We should also be thankful to Parliament for establishing the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence, which does good work in regulating what comes on to the market as an acceptable treatment.

The Select Committee report and the Government response are concerned with life-and-death issues, particularly with regard to the speed with which treatments reach the market. I should like to raise three brief concerns, the first of which is the funding available to NICE. There was a clear recommendation that its funding should be increased. The Government response was fairly clear: they would look at the matter in the round in the future. It is slightly more urgent than that. If we expect NICE to do its work, the fact that so many drugs are coming on to the market and so many clinical trials are taking place mean that its funding needs to be increased, and soon. The £3.5 million that was withdrawn resulted almost directly in one of the appraisal panels being closed. Perhaps the Minister can say a few words about that in his response.

My second concern relates to the recommendation from the Secretary of State that Herceptin be fast-tracked and that PCTs should begin allowing women with early stage breast cancer to use the treatment. I welcome that decision—by all accounts, the drug is effective—but it raises concerns and questions. On what basis should a Secretary of State for Health intervene in the process? On what basis should the Secretary of State select a drug or treatment for fast-tracking? Surely there should be overt, rational and robust guidelines that are open for everyone to see, so that any decision is not made as a result of public pressure or, dare I suggest, PR pressure from the pharmaceutical industry. Although the decision raises some questions, I was delighted with the recommendation.

My third concern is that medicines reach the market on the basis of robust evidence. I said earlier that if NICE is unable to see all of the evidence, clinical trials and data on a treatment, it is not necessarily in a position to make a sound judgment. If it sees only the published reports of clinical trials, it is not seeing the full picture and it cannot necessarily make a fully informed judgment.

The House and the Government have a duty to protect people from unsafe medicines, and NICE does a good job in the circumstances. However, I urge the Minister to take a good look at, first, the guidelines for NICE to ensure that it can consider all the evidence involved; secondly, the basis on which the Secretary of State for Health can circumvent or intervene in the process of drug prescription; and thirdly, the funding available to NICE, so that, as patients and the pharmaceutical industry make more demands in the future and the evidence becomes clear that certain medicines look useful, those medicines can be processed, examined and reviewed very quickly by an excellent institute.

3.40 pm

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): This has been a very good debate, and I am delighted to have had the opportunity both to listen and to respond to it. I apologise, Madam Deputy Speaker: I am part of a Standing Committee upstairs, so I had to depart once and was unable to hear all that my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) had to say.

I join other hon. Members in congratulating the Health Committee on its work. Its report has already proved to be a very important; it has led to action by the Government and the pharmaceutical industry. I am sure that the Health Committee will help to guide and press for action in the future. As the Chairman of the Select Committee said, it will return to the issue and rightly so, and it would be very useful if it did precisely that in one or two instances that I might mention during my remarks.

I want to say a special word of thanks to David Hinchliffe, the former Member for Wakefield, who was Chairman of the Health Committee when I was a member of it in the early part of the 1997 to 2001 Parliament. He did a remarkable job. Many people across the NHS very much valued his work, and the right hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) will be a distinguished and equally competent successor.

The right hon. Gentleman was quite right to point to the importance of safety, which is a central issue. I was surprised, particularly during the discussion of Vioxx, that there was little mention of the subsequent actions by the pharmaceutical industry to promote the publication of all clinical trial data. That is an important matter. The Select Committee considered the origin of the problems with Vioxx, and they were substantially related to the failure of transparency on clinical trial data, as well as, arguably, the company responses. If we are to deal with those problems, we require not only ethical responses on the part of pharmaceutical companies, but the sort of transparency that allows early indications of effectiveness to be challenged by others using the data.

The hon. Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn) rightly illustrated the fact that it is terribly important to use the data properly. However, if he is right and there have been instances where conclusions reported in medical journals are not consistent with the data—that would be entirely wrong—it is absolutely essential that other researchers have access to the data in a form that allows them to engage in the scientific method and to challenge the conclusion that others have reached. That is what science is about. We applaud scientists for what they are doing, so we should give them the maximum opportunity to use their method in that way.

Paul Flynn: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that Eliot Spitzer in New York took GlaxoSmithKlein to court and the company was fined? That revealed a truly shocking picture of falsified research: negative results were ignored; results showing that new drugs were not as effective as placebos had been buried and not published; and the results of trials during which people had died had been suppressed. That is a dreadful record and although I tried to congratulate the drug companies on having changed their act, the past is one of deception, errors and manipulation on a scale that most of us could not imagine.

Mr. Lansley: I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman has been making and I do not doubt his long history of work on the subject. He does an important job and I do not dispute that. We need people in this place who come at the arguments from many different angles, but his argument seems to be that the bottle is one tenth empty. We must remember that the bottle is nine tenths full; the pharmaceutical industry has made and continues to make a remarkable contribution to the public benefit by improving our health.

One of the Government's central messages is about the reduction in mortality from coronary heart disease, but they know perfectly well that that has occurred throughout the world as a consequence of the introduction of statins. That is but one example. The hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) rightly gave the hon. Member for Newport, West a short lecture on the range of benefits that the drug industry has brought us.

The hon. Member for Bolton, South-East was also right to point out the risks associated with both parallel trade and internet trading, which are not necessarily the same thing. Parallel trade is not illegal. It is a consequence of the fact that we do not have a single market in pharmaceuticals, nor are we likely to. I am certainly not saying that we should leap to that situation. We have to acknowledge that large price disparities, especially in parts of Europe, can have a substantial impact on trade and can dramatically undermine the intentions behind the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme. We need to be aware of that and, if necessary, adapt the PPRS in response. I shall return to the PPRS later.

Counterfeit trade is illegal and extremely harmful. Everything I hear confirms that the scale of internet trade in counterfeit drugs is rising. Whenever there are questions about the preparations for pandemic flu and the availability of Tamiflu, the counterfeiters try to trade on that public concern and satisfy the demand.

We have not talked much about the necessity for public information. There is a range of possibilities for better informing the public about the availability of drugs and about why some medicines should be prescription-only. We need to think hard about the circumstances in which they should become pharmacy medicines. That has been advantageous in the case of statins and the same may be true of antiviral drugs in the future.

We must also consider the public understanding of risk, about which we could talk for a long time. If the public become direct participants in reporting adverse drug reactions and adverse events, as they will under the yellow card scheme, they need to be much more aware of risk and the kind of adverse event that we anticipate. I am sorry that there was not more discussion during the debate of the Government's response to the yellow card scheme, which is important, although we should not get too carried away. The yellow card scheme in the UK did not disclose the problems with Vioxx, nor did the Medwatch scheme in the United States. As the Select Committee pointed out, they were largely disclosed during large-scale, long-term trials, designed to establish the efficacy of non-steroidal anti-inflammatory drugs in the treatment of other conditions. That illustrates that the longer one continues the process, the more trials one does and the more patients who are exposed to a drug, the more likely one is to establish safety data. I am not a scientist, so I cannot explain how the procedure works, but I am confidently assured that although trials that establish efficacy, safety and quality for licensing purposes are immensely expensive, there are many reasons why their scale is not necessarily sufficient to establish safety against a range of untoward events. Such trials disclose immediate safety events in controlled populations, but they do not reveal less common events that could occur in larger populations. That explains why we must think about post-licensing surveillance, which is important, as the Committee and the right hon. Member for Rother Valley rightly pointed out.

[Mr. Lansley]

There are several factors that could help us to achieve that. The national health service could be an important international organisation in the process. It would help the pharmaceutical industry in this country if we could use effectively the connecting for health programme, the electronic patient records and everything that goes with them to create population-wide databases that would give us good information about adverse events. We have the general practice research database, but if that were to expand and migrate into the connecting for health programme, it would help us enormously. Although we have prescription-event monitoring at the moment, I understand that about 30 per cent. of GPs do not participate in it. We need something that will be effective across the board and not likely to be affected by any distortions and biases that might occur due to the self-selection of participants.

The document "Safer Medicines", which was published by the Academy of Medical Sciences only two weeks ago, makes interesting reading. I do it an injustice by picking out only one or two aspects of it, but it addresses useful matters that have not been mentioned. The document refers to conditional approval, which would occur if licensing meant not simply saying that a firm could market a drug without any further conditions, but saying that there were as yet unproven safety considerations that would have to be addressed through the subsequent use of the drug. If a company were able to extend the life of patent protection while it continued to acquire data, it would be in its commercial and economic interests to undertake much of the larger-scale work that would be necessary to acquire data from a wider population who were using a drug that was effective for their needs, rather than only those involved in clinical trials. It would thus be understood whether any contraindications associated with the drug would affect its final licensing approval. The academy did not recommend such a scheme, but as it discussed it, I thought that it would be an interesting matter to put to the Minister for further debate.

Secondly, the academy referred to the importance of using European data. Of course, the sooner one arrives at a point at which a large population is using a drug, the more likely one is to identify adverse events that might occur. The academy refers to the need for an international co-ordinating centre on drug toxicity and the ability to undertake DNA sampling. The beauty of such an approach is shown by the fact that we increasingly find that drugs might be especially effective in circumstances in which people have a genetic predisposition. For example, Herceptin is likely to be effective for the 20 per cent. of women with breast cancer who are HER2-postive. Equally, there may be genetic predispositions towards adverse drug reactions, and we must focus as much on that possibility as on the positive opportunity to find drugs by understanding people's DNA responses. If we can do so, that will provide another positive benefit.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West made a good point about tuberculosis testing and the Mantoux test. If we are to have a NICE mechanism whereby the NHS undertakes evidence-based appraisals of clinical and cost-effectiveness to inform its clinical activity and priority setting, and if vaccines are available as alternatives to drugs and chemical compounds for the treatment of prostrate cancer and other cancers, I can see no reason why those vaccines should not be subject to NICE analysis. Indeed, that would have a positive benefit, as it would be more transparent. I have voiced the persistent complaint that the joint committee on vaccination and immunisation fails to give transparent advice. Its advice is subject to delay, and all the papers submitted to it are effectively invisible, because it is only the minutes of meetings that appear on its website several months after the meetings themselves are held. My constant plea is that we should have more transparency, as vaccines will become increasingly effective treatments.

Another major issue raised in our debate is the take-up of drugs and the extent to which the NHS, through NICE, can access information about new drugs and their cost-effectiveness. My hon. Friend the Member for Windsor (Adam Afriyie) is right that there have been reductions in NICE funding, which has reduced the number of its appraisal committees from three to two at a time when their work load is increasing. For example, 29 new cancer drugs, a proportion of which will be fast-tracked, have to be submitted for appraisal. I shall not even consider the number of clinical guidelines that NICE should use, as it is important to focus on appraisals.

We have urged Ministers to make good the reduction in NICE's resources, and I hope that the Minister will confirm that the Government will do so. The aim of the review of arms-length bodies associated with the Department of Health was not to cut bureaucracy but to try to focus resources on those that would be of the most value to people working on the front line in the NHS. The Health Committee emphasised the need for NICE to gain access to all the data accompanying licence applications to the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency. As NICE will increasingly conduct appraisals alongside the MHRA, we may need to consider incentivising the acquisition of the appropriate data for NICE purposes while ensuring that companies are aware that they must produce data for MHRA licensing approval. Very often, those things happen in series, because the data required by each body are not the same. Companies are not sure whether NICE will make an appraisal, so any work that they undertake at an early stage may be costly and abortive. As the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) said, they do not know whether Ministers will refer a drug to NICE, or whether there will be a delay.

We need greater independence in the process of choosing what should be referred to NICE and when. For the purposes of appraisal and issuing clinical guidelines, I accept that it is Ministers' responsibility to determine what should be referred to NICE. The structure for the appraisal of new drugs should be straightforward and independent. If they are likely to be a cost-effective response to existing NHS requirements to provide treatment, should that not be communicated to the NHS as soon as possible after independent assessment?

Herceptin was mentioned by the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne and others, and it raises significant issues. The hon. Member for Newport, West spoke about the speed with which drugs are taken up. As it happens, Britain is not a country where drugs are taken up with alacrity. In October the Karolinska institute published a report, with the benefit of financial support from Roche, which I none the less think is true, showing that although Britain has the highest level of direct cancer research, we have one of the slowest rates of take-up of cancer drugs in Europe.

Dr. Iddon: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the take-up of cancer drugs would be even slower if we did not benefit from translational research, where the clinicians work side by side with the scientists in wonderful institutes such as the Christie hospital and the Paterson laboratories in Manchester?

Mr. Lansley: Indeed. I have had the benefit of visiting the Christie hospital to see how translational research allows the whole range of cancer treatments to be provided in the same place, which is why, earlier this year, it was important to me to support the hospital in its argument that cancer surgery should not be transferred to another institution.

I agree with the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East, not least because in the new year Cancer Research UK will open its largest UK research facility at Addenbrookes hospital on the Cambridge biomedical campus. There will be 600 dedicated cancer researchers in my constituency, who will be operating alongside clinical teams. That will not be just translational research. As time goes on it will be the closest that Europe gets to the National Institutes of Health.

I know that the Government are proposing to create a virtual national institute for health research, but at the Cambridge biomedical campus we have everything from the laboratory of molecular biology doing world-leading blue-skies research at molecular level through to teams doing translational work. Professor Bruce Ponder at Addenbrookes hospital will lead the oncology teams for the Cambridge University Hospitals NHS Trust while also being director of the new Cancer Research UK unit, combining responsibility for clinical work with responsibility for academic work.

We will not debate the availability of clinical academics, but if we do not reverse the recent decline in the number of clinical academics following the recommendations of Mark Walport's committee, it will be difficult for us to sustain the benefits of research. We talk about drug research, but if we are to translate that into benefits in clinical practice, we will need clinical academics, and the more of them we have, the more likely we are to retain the drug companies' commitment to drug development in the UK.

Dr. Iddon: That is the very reason for the controversial move of the National Institute for Medical Research from Mill Hill into central London so that the excellent work on, for example, stem cell research that is done there can be brought closer to the clinics in central London.

Mr. Lansley: The hon. Gentleman keeps touching a raw nerve. I have corresponded with the Medical Research Council for some time on that matter. The working group that decided that the National Institute for Medical Research should be in central London rather than Cambridge because of the institute's international obligations was deluding itself. The work of the National Institute for Medical Research relates to the work of the institute of stem cell biology, which will be in Cambridge, and of the laboratory of molecular biology, which is in Cambridge, and I could go on.

Although Cambridge university was not that fussed—plenty of candidates want to be on the Cambridge biomedical campus—it would have been justified in objecting, and I certainly felt that a peculiarly blinkered view was taken on where medical research can be carried out. However, University college and University college London will provide a fine home, and I will have nothing said against them. [Interruption.] I had to get there eventually. I also want to echo the remarks by the right hon. Member for Rother Valley about the importance of safety.

We must decide whether we believe in the process that NICE undertakes. We cannot believe in NICE and the independent evidence-based analysis of what is clinically effective and cost-effective, and then simply throw the results out of the window. The right hon. Member for Rother Valley and I share that view on infertility treatments, because if one asks NICE to produce guidelines, one cannot suddenly pop up and say, "Let's do something different."

I acknowledge that Herceptin raises a completely different question. The matter does not rest with NICE, because the licence has not been applied for. That prompts the question on what basis is Herceptin being prescribed. I know the answer, because Cambridge university oncologists, who are convinced of its effectiveness, have written to me. Across the country, there are instances in which clinicians can prescribe drugs before licensing on the basis of their own judgment of emerging clinical evidence. However, that is a judgment by clinicians rather than by the Secretary of State or by a professional executive committee. Individual clinicians examine the data and take responsibility for such prescription.

Before 2001, my predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox), suggested the creation of an exceptional medicines fund to help to accelerate the take-up of novel but potentially effective medicines in the NHS. I am not advocating that route—if we are devolving responsibility in the NHS, it is probably not appropriate—but it is one way to think about the problem. Even if we are devolving responsibility, we must examine, for example, the French system and understand more explicitly the circumstances in which such prescription should take place through the NHS. Perhaps we should involve NICE at an early stage in considering emerging evidence through clinical trials, even if the licensing process has not been completed. However, we should be aware that Herceptin, by its very nature, cannot be regarded as a precedent, and my party will not seek to use it in that way.

The rest of the debate has concerned how we can support the industry while achieving effective self-regulation. Hon. Members disparaged the new code of practice promulgated through the ABPI, but we have to view these things with a bit of discretion. Frankly, if one sends a senior consultant who might be earning £150,000 to Kuala Lumpur, one can try to put him in a three-star hotel but I am not sure that he will stay there.

[Mr. Lansley]

Nobody has been expelled from the ABPI. However, I wonder whether we would conclude that the new standards and privileges arrangements brought into this House in recent years must be defective because nobody has yet been expelled. I am not sure if that is the right basis on which to judge such matters. [Interruption.] I am probably tempting the hon. Member for Newport, West again. Self-regulation is a better way to proceed. Let us ensure that we work with the industry. If we can see reasonable enhancements to the code of practice that are likely to have an impact, let us by all means propose them, but I heard no such substantive proposals today.

We should think hard about how we support the pharmaceutical industry. We put an enormous burden on it as regards deciding where resources should go. An immense amount rests on its shoulders in terms of our futures. What would happen if those companies were to leave the UK? The disaster scenario would be GlaxoSmithKline deciding that it would be better off locating all its research and development activity in the United States. I do not suppose that it will happen—I fondly hope not, touching wood. That would have enormous consequences for this country, not only economically but in terms of our whole research base.

I want to mention two areas: first, NHS research and development activity; and secondly, the role of the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme. The Government's document, "Best research for best health: A new National Health Research Strategy", confidently asserts:

> "A summary of responses, including the next steps, will be published by 30 November."

As it is now some time after that, this is an excellent opportunity for the Minister to tell us what conclusions have been drawn from the consultation so far. Since 1991, when a director was first appointed, NHS research and development has grown in its scope and ambitions. I am pleased about that.

The additional five areas of clinical research networks will be terribly important, but we wait to see what scale of resources will flow into them. The clinical research network on stroke requires there to be corresponding levels of NHS research funding, because in comparison with cancer a very small amount of money is spent on supporting stroke research, notwithstanding that stroke is the third largest killer in this country and the major cause of adult disability.

Creating a network therefore needs the resources to support it. I hope that NHS research and development will take seriously the possibility of accepting more responsibility for the costs of clinical trials so that the NHS is in a position to undertake a higher proportion of such trials with patients.

The Under-Secretary knows that one of the major factors that differentiate five-year survival rates in Britain from those in, for example, France is the extent to which patients take part in clinical trials. The National Cancer Research Network was established in 2001 and the number of patients in clinical trials doubled but we remain some way behind France. Of course, we have only one national clinical research network. Clinical trials with patients should be conducted in the NHS. However, the costs of clinical trials in this country have doubled and the regulation has increased dramatically. I cannot dissociate myself from some of the responsibility for that because, when we considered the Human Tissue Bill, we added to the regulatory burdens. After many discussions with the Department of Health, we managed to reduce them, but they remain. The clinical trials directive and the Mental Capacity Act 2005 also added to them.

Many people who work on clinical trials and try to set them up tell horror stories about the number of bodies that they have to approach to set up a clinical trial. They include funding bodies, local hospital research approval bodies, distant research and ethics committees, and data protection committees. The list appears endless. Approaching all those bodies is not only expensive but can provide a major disincentive to clinicians, whose time is valuable to them and to the hospital when deciding whether to devote time to clinical trials. We need more patients in clinical trials.

Let me consider the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme. I made it clear before the election that, if we had the chance to do so, we would consider the range of matters that support a strong biomedical research capacity in this country. That includes the NHS research and development strategy and I am pleased that the Government have published a document about that. However, we should also consider the cost of clinical trials, which I have just mentioned, and the action that we can take against animal rights terrorists. The further legislation that the Government have proposed is right but the industry will tell them that it is important to ensure that there is a drive behind enforcement.

We should consider the economic framework through the PPRS. Although the report is excellent, the Committee described the PPRS and made a passing reference to reform in the context of marketing allowance, which, in the grand scale of things, is trivial, but did not tackle the central question of the purpose of the PPRS and whether it is a fit-for-purpose scheme. I do not suggest that it is not fit for purpose and no one in their right mind would suggest simply abandoning it and letting the industry charge what it liked for drugs that have intellectual property protection.

However, many other countries have alternative mechanisms and we need to consider carefully what happens on a European-wide basis. Too many other countries buy in a centralised system but benchmark themselves on an international basis and increasingly choose to benchmark their prices below the average. If that continues, one or two major markets—the US and Japan—will overwhelmingly provide the profit to the pharmaceutical industry while Europe progressively reaches a point where it pays much less. That will not be a sustainable basis on which the industry can regard Europe as its second home for drug research and development. We must understand how to incentivise the conduct of research and development in this country in circumstances whereby we increasingly expose the industry to competition.

I personally do not regard rate-of-return regulation as the right long-term solution, because it does not deliver genuine competitive pressures. The Government imposed a 7 per cent. cut, and no doubt that will deliver a reduction in the drugs bill. However, there is a lack of participation in the negotiations of the scheme by small drug companies and biotechnology companies, and this last review of the PPRS has exposed the way in which small companies, often those bringing just one product to the market, are severely disadvantaged. The big companies that negotiate the PPRS are able to change their prices between branded products; there is no real constraint in that regard. So if they have a competing product in a particular treatment area, they can respond through their price structures in ways that a small company with one product simply cannot.

I still think that the PPRS provides an export disincentive. If companies are making major profits as a consequence of the exploitation of their drug in other markets, the price that they get from the NHS could be a disadvantage. There should be real incentives for exports, rather than disincentives. Although the research and development allowance went up, and although it can be an effective floor, I fear that it can also be a ceiling. Companies such as Pfizer have demonstrated the value of high levels of research and development activity in relation to their turnover, but our R and D allowance sets a benchmark and perhaps underplays the benefit of allowing companies to take a strategic option.

The Office of Fair Trading is engaged in a review of these matters. I believe that the House, whether through the Select Committee or some other means, should examine the health and NHS purposes of the PPRS. I am an advocate of what the OFT does, and Members will recall that it quite rightly tries to drive towards competition outcomes. It needs to understand, however, what the health and NHS purposes of the PPRS are, in the course of its review.

When the OFT considered the control of entry regulations in regard to pharmacies, it went away and thought about competition, and came up with a set of solutions. There was then a big row about the consequences because it had not taken fully into account the NHS purposes involved. Perhaps the answer is that we should derive all the competition benefits and, if the NHS wants other things, such as research, to happen, we might just have to pay more for that. Perhaps we should pay much more through the science and technology budgets to encourage companies to undertake their R and D here, and defray many more of the costs that they would otherwise meet.

I am absolutely sure that because the PPRS is not a statutory scheme—it is all voluntary—it is very difficult for us to get a handle on anything that happens in it. That is not necessarily because the Government and the industry are secretive; it is because there is no mechanism for the scheme to be examined. I am asking for a mechanism—perhaps operated through the Select Committee—by which we can examine the fitness for purpose of the PPRS. We should do this over the next year, not in three years' time, when any such examination would become confused with the question of the negotiations. It would be better to examine in theory what the PPRS is intended to do, before we arrive at the next PPRS negotiations.

Having said all that, I believe that the Select Committee has done an excellent job that has resulted in real, positive benefits in terms of the reporting of adverse events and the promotion of a new code of practice throughout the industry. I hope that the report will also lead to the more open and responsible use of clinical trial data and to the establishment of a scientific community that is able to give us a much better idea of what works and what does not, because we depend dramatically on the output of the industry.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): I am grateful for the opportunity to respond to this excellent debate. I, too, congratulate former and current members of the Select Committee on its report. I should like to add my own words of praise to those of the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) about the Committee's former Chairman, David Hinchliffe. Mr. Hinchliffe was very generous with his advice to me after I got this job, and I hope to be able to benefit from some of it this afternoon. I want to put on the record my thanks and praise for him.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) rightly began by saying that the House should be interested in an industry that develops new medicines from which we all benefit, and on which the national health service spends about £10 billion a year. Thousands of patients survive diseases such as cancer and coronary heart disease from which they would probably have died in the past.

The industry is in no small part responsible for the extraordinary advances that the chief executive of the NHS was able to mention in his report, which was published yesterday. He was able to state, for instance, that over the past few years mortality rates for cardiovascular disease had fallen by more than 31 per cent., and that those for cancer had fallen by 14 per cent. I am sure that the whole House will wish to congratulate the staff of the NHS on the way in which they have harnessed our investment and reform to produce such remarkable results, with the help of Britain's pharmaceutical industry.

My right hon. Friend presented an excellent summary of an excellent report, but before I respond to his points in detail, I want to deal with some of the points made by other Members. The hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) is a direct beneficiary of some of the pioneering developments produced by the pharmaceutical industry. She referred to a number of issues involved in drug promotion, such as ghost-writing, regulation and Herceptin. I was pleased to learn of her concern about some of the future financing implications for the NHS. Fiscal rectitude does not commonly feature in Liberal Democrat speeches, but I welcome its emergence.

The hon. Lady made an important point about inappropriate promotion of medicines. The MHRA can and does take action against the practice. She mentioned the inappropriate promotion of iPods. In that case the MHRA took action to stop the offer and require corrective statements to be made by the publication in which it appeared. Like a number of other Members, the hon. Lady mentioned the ABPI code. The code has been strengthened, but the key point is that it is underpinned by statutory controls, including criminal sanctions for breach of advertising regulations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn) made an important contribution. His speech was well informed, well argued and backed by good evidence, as—I have come to learn—are all his speeches.

[Mr. Liam Byrne]

He also spoke with great passion. He presented a powerful argument about the medicalisation of society. The Government made their position clear in the public health White Paper "Choosing Health: making healthier choices easier". In the White Paper, we emphasised the need for the NHS to become a health improvement and prevention service. We are tackling that in a number of ways, putting health and prevention at the centre of our national service frameworks but also giving primary care trusts real means with which to tackle health inequalities and improve health.

My hon. Friend highlighted a dilemma. On the one hand, speed is needed in the licensing of drugs—my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley, in particular, mentioned that—on the other hand, there is the need for safety. In that context my hon. Friend cited Vioxx, with which I shall deal later. There are real conflicts and dilemmas, and it was right for my hon. Friend to draw our attention to them.

The hon. Member for Southend, West made a fascinating speech. I cannot wait to see those photographs: I look forward to the arrival of the December edition of The House Magazine. He mentioned issues relating to the ABPI code, with which I shall deal in a moment. He also referred to NICE funding, MHRA statutory controls and industry sponsorship. Let me deal first with the NICE budgets, which were also mentioned by the hon. Member for Windsor (Adam Afriyie).

The Government created NICE for a reason, and recognise the value of its work. Its contribution to the health debate has been extraordinary over the past few years. The NHS and international medical science have benefited from its work. Like all arm's-length bodies, however, it has been asked to make savings in its back-office and accommodation costs. We have taken great care to protect the budget for its core work: the budget for 2004–05 is some £30 million. We are confident that NICE can deliver its challenging work programme within the existing envelope of those resources. It is, of course, for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider future spending in the spending review that will start next year.

The issue of statutory powers is important. From 1 January 2005, the MHRA has required pharmaceutical companies to provide all the evidence. The powers have always been robust, but the new requirement to notify the MHRA without delay of all new information impacting on risks and benefits is, I think, very important and the Select Committee will welcome it. Failure to provide such information is a criminal offence to which the sanction of unlimited fines and imprisonment applies. It was right for the Select Committee to highlight that matter. The new measures introduced from the beginning of this year will go some way to addressing some of its concerns.

The hon. Member for Southend, West mentioned Herceptin, as did the hon. Members for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) and for Windsor. As we know, it has received considerable publicity from our constituents and also in the media. The drug is already licensed for women with advanced breast cancer, but not yet for those with early breast cancer. As the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire said, a number of oncologists have pointed to its quite extraordinary potential.

It is already possible for clinicians to prescribe a drug outside licensing indications. It is then down to individual clinicians to decide whether it is suitable to prescribe a specific drug after discussions with patients, taking into account the potential risks, not least those suggested by the patient's medical history. Primary care trusts then have to be involved, as they have to decide whether to support a clinician's decision and supply the drug at NHS expense. They will have to take a range of factors, including the circumstances of the individual patient, into account in taking those decisions.

The position that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State sketched out is really threefold. At the moment—pre-licence and pre-NICE—it is for individual clinicians to consider with patients whether Herceptin is an appropriate course of treatment. Secondly, PCTs should not rule out treatment in principle, but should consider individual circumstances in taking their decisions. Thirdly, PCTs should not refuse to fund Herceptin solely on the grounds of cost.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) made a number of important points about parallel trade. It is, of course, a legitimate trade that is allowed under EU law, but there are controls on it. If safety concerns arise out of parallel trade, I am sure that the MHRA will be keen to know about them and will subsequently investigate. My hon. Friend trained as an organic chemist, so I know that he is well qualified to comment about the risks in the process of counterfeiting. I completely agree that it is a growing concern. The MHRA is working with regulators worldwide to combat what is an international problem. Evidence at the moment suggests that incidence in the UK is low, and tools are in place, carrying criminal sanctions, to deal with it.

We certainly cannot afford to be complacent about that problem, particularly in the light of growing internet sales. I completely share the concern of my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East about the potential risk to the public. Public and patients are well advised to exercise great caution in purchasing medicines on the internet. My hon. Friend will know that the MHRA has had considerable success in taking action against illegal internet sales, which has been extensively covered in the media this week. It remains a difficult area to police and the MHRA continues to find new ways of impacting on illegal sales. I am sure that, as the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mr. Walker) suggested, that matter will benefit from our further attention on the Floor of the House.

The hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) talked about many matters, particularly highlighting the need to align industry research priorities with NHS public health aims. As we are spending about £10 billion a year, that is not an unreasonable expectation. The Government found the Select Committee's conclusion extremely helpful. One of the ways in which we are taking its recommendations forward is through the UK's clinical research collaboration. As a first step, we have asked that a futures forum be held, to bring together many of the key stakeholders to advise Ministers on the future priorities for innovation in health care. The forum will be held in 2006 and it will be informed by the results of an ongoing strategic analysis of current research, funded by partner organisations. The pharmaceutical industry will be included, and the report will be available next spring.

The hon. Member for Wyre Forest spoke about Vioxx with some import. Vioxx is an important part of the debate, particularly if we contrast the associated issues with those associated with Herceptin. There is a central dilemma and we are very grateful to the Committee for highlighting it. My questions, and those of other Ministers, are essentially the same as the Committee's. Why did pre-licence clinical trials not illustrate some of the problems? Were the trials long enough? Why did spontaneous adverse reporting not show up some of the problems post-introduction? As my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West asked, what lessons can be learned to mitigate the possibility of such problems occurring again?

Like Herceptin, Vioxx was seen as an incredibly important drug. It had the potential to provide an important level of pain relief and it did not have the side-effects associated with many existing drugs. The pre-clinical trials did not show up all the various problems and although there were differences with the placebo group, they were on a pretty shallow curve. Indeed, it can take up to 18 months for some of the side-effects to become apparent. That said, patients were obviously anxious for this new and potentially very valuable drug to come on to the market as quickly as possible. Adverse reporting was not going to help because many of the associated side-effects can be attributed to underlying patient conditions, such as heart disease and diabetes.

Since then, an extremely important change has occurred. From the end of October this year, the licensing requirements for new drugs include the requirement for a risk-management plan, which must be agreed with licensing authorities. It can stipulate a range of requirements to monitor the effects and side-effects of new drugs, so for the first time, regulators have a degree of latitude in specifying, for example, the long-term clinical trials necessary in the new drugs field. That was an important issue for the Committee to highlight.

The hon. Member for Wyre Forest also discussed the promotion of new medicines. The ABPI code now restricts promotion on the launch of new products, but to underpin that code the MHRA is vetting the advertising material for new drugs. However, we will monitor the new measures and if they do not deliver the change that the Committee and the Government are looking for, we will have to look again at the current controls.

Expert advisory groups is another important issue that was raised. The Committee on Safety of Medicines will have expert advisory groups—some 14 of them—and they are in the process of being appointed. As Members know, the Government adhere very closely to the Nolan principles, so the appointments being made—from some 400 to 500 candidates and from every area of expertise, including lay members—will take a little longer. In the meantime, however, the committee can call on the expertise of an external panel of experts in order to cover specialist areas.

The hon. Member for Broxbourne, who has worked at the coal face of many of the issues that we have discussed today, raised the question of SSRIs, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West. The UK has gone further and has acted much faster in reviewing SSRIs than any regulator worldwide. The CSM's expert working group's report, which was published a year ago almost to the day, has been recognised as the most thorough review of a class of medicines ever undertaken. It resulted in new advice—backed by an unprecedented release of summaries of clinical trial data—which was published alongside NICE guidelines. The MHRA continues to monitor the safety of selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors, and this week issued new advice on the use of Seroxat in pregnancy. I do not think that that is a record of complacency.

I turn now to the points of substance contained in the Select Committee report, which my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley spelled out with great eloquence. If I may, I shall take a slight detour through the vexed question of how many conclusions and recommendations the Government have accepted.

From what I understand, the Select Committee report grouped a number of recommendations into one overall recommendation. The Government responded to all the recommendations, and to the sub-recommendations that they contained. Of the 32 recommendations, 26 were accepted in full or in part. I know that the Government response took some time, but the Committee took 10 months to write the report, and it was felt that the response needed proper consideration. After all, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley said, this is the first such report for many years.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley raised various points, and I shall try to deal with each in turn. First, he asked about MHRA governance arrangements, an issue also highlighted by the hon. Member for Southend, West. When it was reviewed by the National Audit Office, the MHRA—which was then known as the Medicines Control Agency—was found to be a major contributor to public health in the UK. That was a welcome finding, as was the assessment that it was a world leader in some respects, such as in the field of drug safety.

The agency is tackling directly some of the issues raised in the NAO report, and the Government response strongly welcomes the Select Committee's suggestion that there should be a further review once current reforms have bedded in. In addition, and as is to be expected, Ministers continue to monitor the MHRA's performance. The agency has been strengthened by the adoption of many new internal controls of its own, which will ensure that the agency remains independent and its staff free of conflict.

Nevertheless, I welcome the suggestion from my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley that the House should monitor the agency's progress closely. I am sure that his proposal that the House and the Select Committee should provide input in respect of the review's terms of reference will be of great interest to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

As part of the ongoing reform process, the MHRA recently revised its medicines advisory committee structure. The Commission on Human Medicines came into being on 1 November. It is not a direct result of the Select Committee report, but it does deal with some of the issues raised in that report. For example, each advisory committee now contains two lay members, to ensure that wider judgments are made about risk benefit as well as about medical and scientific matters. Importantly, the new structure allows the patient voice to be heard in the regulatory process, and the rules on the interests of committee members have also been strengthened. As a result, the new committee's chairman and members will not be allowed to hold financial interests in the pharmaceutical industry.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley also raised issues to do with promotion and industry information, both pre and post-licensing, and six or seven points are relevant in that context. First, since the Government's response was published, much progress has been made on ensuring high standards in the promotion of medicine. For instance, initial advertising is now vetted before publication.

Secondly, the agency has delivered on its commitment to agree a memorandum of understanding with the prescription industry's self-regulatory body, which was published last month. Thirdly, and as the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire pointed out, the ABPI code has now been strengthened.

Fourthly, a great deal of progress has been made in improving the quality of patient information, about which the hon. Member for Wyre Forest spoke most cogently. I have not had the benefit of visiting Australia to see how matters are handled there, but if I behave myself that opportunity may be afforded me at some time in the future.

The issue of promoting information to patients is important, especially in a world in which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) mentioned, people are beginning to buy products on the internet. The new requirement for user testing of information in patient information leaflets came into force in the UK in July, ahead of the time frame in European law. That will deliver potentially the most powerful tool to ensure that the needs of patients are properly met. In the same month, the expert group of the Committee on Safety of Medicines published its report, "Always read the leaflet", with new guidance on user testing, risk communication and, importantly, the usability of patient information leaflets.

The fifth measure was on the safety monitoring of medicines, to which many hon. Members referred. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley mentioned, patients and members of the public have been able to report suspected adverse drug reactions through the yellow card scheme since January 2005. Since then, around 750 yellow card reports from patients and members of the public have been received. Since the Committee reported, the UK-wide patient reporting pilot was launched in October, developed on the basis of considerable engagement with stakeholders, and supported by a major promotional campaign.

The sixth area, which many hon. Members on both sides of the House will welcome, is the registration of clinical trials. The Health Committee argued in favour of the registration of all clinical trials and the publication of the results of trials. The Government largely accept that argument. We fully support the case for transparency and accountability, and we are working nationally and internationally to get the principles applied in practice. A number of important developments have taken place in the past year, and it is now clear that the movement towards registering trials and providing much better public access to research evidence about safety and effectiveness is unstoppable. Much of the momentum comes from a shared aim of the Government and the industry to build public confidence. International pharmaceutical industry associations have made public commitments, which have been strengthened by the understandings in the UK. At the same time, the World Health Organisation is working on standards for trial registration and international agreement on systems to give easy access to information, and the European Medicines Agency is about to launch a public database called EuroPharm. We very much welcome all those developments.

To go further, however, the Government strongly support more openness and transparency in the regulation of medicines. The MHRA is making good progress in that field, as we highlighted in our response. A communication strategy is now in place, which considers how we raise the profile of the agency and increase the understanding of medicines-related issues among the general public. In our published regulatory information, all newly licensed programmes will be accompanied by a UK public assessment report, which will be posted on the MHRA website. The agency also regularly publishes summaries of clinical trial data to support key communications on drug safety, along with all details of adverse drug reactions.

Several Members, such as the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne and my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley, mentioned the report in The Observer a week or two ago about the alleged case of research misconduct involving a comparative study of two drugs for the treatment of osteoporosis. The MHRA is investigating that at the request of the chief medical officer. The aim of the investigation is to establish whether there has been an abuse of the regulations governing clinical trials, but it will also seek to establish whether legislation requiring companies to submit immediately to the MHRA any new information that might affect the risk-benefit balance of the product has been breached. The Government view that as a very serious matter—false research can lead to the wrong treatment being given.

For academics who might be involved, who are not part of a profession, criminal sanctions are not yet available. At the moment, we rely on employers to take action. That is why we warmly welcome Universities UK's initiative in setting up a UK panel for research integrity in health and biomedical science. One of its functions will be to help research employers, including universities, the NHS and industry, to take effective action against allegations of scientific misconduct.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley, in his concluding remarks, highlighted the need for speed in introducing drugs to market. That is something that is being addressed in part through the ministerial industry steering group, which brings together leaders from the pharmaceutical industry and Ministers to consider issues that might impact on the industry. One of those issues is how regulation can be adopted to accelerate the pace of introduction of new drugs to market, including what kind of controls are needed and how can we gather safety data to avoid scares such as the withdrawal of Vioxx. We have to keep in mind the balance between public safety and the difference that new drugs can make.

The issue of NICE is part and parcel of that. I have dealt with the question of its funding and it is now out to public consultation on fast-track assessment on single therapies. Those assessments will sit alongside full appraisals. NICE is now prioritising its work plan to ensure that new needs are met.

I welcome much of the Committee's report, but I also welcome much of what the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire said. He was right, in particular, to say that connecting for health has extraordinary power to help. I know that I am not supposed to say this in the new mood of consensus that has broken out on the Floor of the House, but connecting for health is not free. Its future rests on investment—the kind of investment that is precluded by policies such as the patient's passport. After the events of the past two days, I look forward to hearing about its future.

We have had a useful, lively debate this afternoon. The pharmaceutical industry brings enormous benefits to this country, to patients and the NHS and to the economy.

Mr. Lansley: If we are going to break the consensus, I shall ask the Minister this question. The Prime Minister at one point pledged that 1.5 per cent. of the NHS budget would be devoted to research and development. When will that happen?

Mr. Byrne: I am sorry to see that the consensus has collapsed as quickly as a soufflé. I do not have the precise figures on research and development in front of me, but I shall be delighted to write to the hon. Gentleman with the details of NHS research and development. It is an issue of great importance not only to the NHS, but to the country, which is why my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced such bold proposals to increase funding in that area by, potentially, more than £1 billion over the next few years.

Mr. Lansley rose—

Mr. Byrne: No, I must conclude, because I know that my right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley is waiting to respond to the debate.

It is important that the relationship between the health service, the Government and the pharmaceutical industry is transparent. It is also important that continued investment goes into new drugs. Those drugs will be vital as we put record investment into the NHS over the next two or three years so that we can continue to make the advances that we have made in the battle against big killer diseases.

4.53 pm

Mr. Barron May I first say to the House—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The right hon. Gentleman should ask for the leave of the House to reply to the debate.

Mr. Barron: With the leave of the House, I wish to reply to the debate. I thought that the Whips had more influence on the debate than they have.

It was remiss of me not to say that the report was brought together and put before the House under the chairmanship of David Hinchliffe. Many hon. Members have said what I should have said at the beginning, but I shall say it now. David was a well-respected Chair of the Health Committee and I hope to be as helpful to the House and, on occasions, to our Front Benchers, as he was. I agreed earlier today to have lunch with David before Christmas and I will pass on everybody's good wishes, as well as a copy of Hansard to digest along with his turkey and whatever else he has at Christmas.

I thank the hon. Members for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) and for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) who went to Australia on behalf of the Committee. They have been to Dublin with me, which may be a reflection on me as Chairman. They took part in a long investigation and I am pleased that they have been here this afternoon.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Paul Flynn) mentioned all-party groups. Had this debate taken place six weeks ago, I would have had to declare that I was the chairman of the all-party group on the pharmaceutical industry, which I was for eight years. I gave that up because of the position I now hold, although I will remain a member.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West will know that the ABPI provides the secretariat of the all-party group. In all the years that I have had dealings with the ABPI, I never thought that it was trying to get me to come here and argue its case. If that is what it was after, it failed quite miserably in many areas. But over the years it has given me, and many other hon. Members of this House and the other place, the opportunity to discuss issues relating to the industry, whether animal testing or any of the other things that have happened. We were able to question it and the professionals involved on issues related to what is, and will always remain, I hope, a very important sector of the British economy and an industry that looks after the health of many hundreds of thousands of people.

Over many years, as my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary said, the ABPI has played a key role between different Governments and the pharmaceutical industry, making sure that the industry remains a healthy part of the economy and at the forefront of European research and development.

Mr. Lansley: Doctors attend many industry-sponsored conferences, meetings, dinners and events, including those supported by drugs companies. Their integrity is no less than ours and my experience is that they are not in the least affected by who their sponsor or supporter might be.

Mr. Barron: That is my experience as well.

I declared that I am a lay member of the General Medical Council, the regulatory body for doctors. I was at the GMC on Tuesday on Euston road and had an exchange of letters with the chief executive about this debate. I was not able to have a long discussion with him, but he wrote to me on the recommendation to keep a register of members' interests, for want of a better expression.

[Mr. Barron]

There are about 230,000 doctors registered with the GMC and we think that about 130,000 have an active role. Many have retired but remain on the register, as that was a big part of their professional career and they would like to keep their names on the register. The chief executive, Finlay Scott, said that the GMC as a regulatory body—unlike the Royal College of Nursing, which is a membership association, or trade union, for want of a better expression, without the GMC's statute—lays down conditions under which doctors have to work.

The publication "Good Medical Practice"—often described as the doctors' bible—clearly states what doctors should and should not be doing. The chief executive reiterated the section to me:

"You must act in your patients' best interests when making referrals and providing or arranging treatment or care. So you must not ask for or accept any inducement, gift or hospitality, which may affect or be seen to affect your judgment. You should not offer such inducements to colleagues."

If doctors breach those rules, they go before a fitness to practice committee, with the likelihood of action being taken against them—they could even be struck off the medical register—but that has not happened during my six years' experience of serving on the GMC.

The new ABPI code of conduct has been mentioned. The ABPI is a trade organisation that works well with the Government, but it is not a statutory body and therefore cannot issue statutory codes. Given all that is said about Members of Parliament enjoying BA upgrades, kettles calling pots black come into mind, so I shall move on from that because a lot has been said about patient safety and drug efficacy that does not hold water.

I shall briefly deal with what the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) said about the PPRS. Paragraphs 113 to 120 of the report explain in reasonable detail what the PPRS does. That is the most transparent translation of the PPRS that I have seen in over a decade of being involved in one way or another in the House with the pharmaceutical industry. We have gone about as far as we can go with the PPRS. If we were to make it totally transparent, the companies would be looking over their shoulders asking why one of them receives more on one scale and less on another than the others.

The PPRS is not the most transparent scheme and it is not a statutory one. The Government and the industry sit down together, and they have recently reached another decision that will benefit the NHS, inasmuch as they agreed that more money will come from it. I am not tempted by the suggestion to take a further look at the PPRS that was made by the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire. I may have to be tempted by members of the Committee if they decide that we should take a further look at it. However, making the scheme more transparent would probably destroy something that no one argues is detrimental to their case. I have spent a decade visiting pharmaceutical companies and having dialogue with them, and I have never yet met anyone with any weight in the pharmaceutical industry debate who says that we should get rid of the PPRS.

Mr. Lansley: I have not suggested getting rid of the PPRS either, but irrespective of whether the right hon. Gentleman thinks that there should be greater openness about the PPRS, frankly, the Office of Fair Trading will ensure that that happens. I was particularly concerned about the fact that past experience has demonstrated that the OFT will do a thorough job on the competition aspects, but it is very important that the Department of Health, the House or somebody thinks very hard about the NHS aspects.

Mr. Barron: If the OFT drives that, it will happen. The report suggested that the Department of Trade and Industry, not the Department of Health, should be the sponsoring Government organisation, but the Government did not agree with that either. I have some sympathy with the Government's response, because we get a lot more via the PPRS than we would if accountants considered the industry on the basis of how many pounds it is worth to the United Kingdom. The OFT may take us down that road, but we will have to wait and see. If it does so and the Government respond, the Health Committee will consider what should replace the scheme, but it has great benefits.

I visited Pfizer about 10 years ago and was shown the big second phase of its research and development in the UK. The company beat off Pacific rim institutions to bring that work to this country. We chatted about the UK's science base and what our universities were delivering at that time. Why did Pfizer want to come to this country and invest such massive amounts of money, especially on the north Kent coast? It is not the most attractive place on earth. Apologies to the people who live there—they would probably think the same about my home town. There are reasons why the UK has been so successful—as successful, if not more so, than most European countries—in attracting inward investment for research and development over recent decades and the PPRS has something to do with it, although what is happening with the OFT may overturn that.

Some people argue that the scheme is wrong. People who are not aware of the full R and D picture might think that small manufacturers, for example, would be better off without the PPRS, but I think that it is of great benefit. It is no coincidence that the pharmaceutical sector is the third largest in our economy. We shall see what the future brings, but that is my feeling at present. As well as the PPRS, the industry has much wider engagement with the Government.

I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for what he said about the contributions to the debate. Like other Members, I pointed out the numerous aspects of the pharmaceutical sector on which the Health Committee will keep a watching brief over years to come. We shall also look at the Government's responses.

The debate has not been well attended, but the quality of the contributions and the knowledge of the participants on both sides of the House has been excellent. It shows the House and, I hope, the Executive what the Select Committee system can do to assist us in our deliberations on behalf of the nation. Parliament and the Executive can work closely together and Parliament can advise the Executive through the work of Select Committees. I hope that my hon. Friend's positive approach to some aspects of the debate will extend to the Select Committee's reports and recommendations in the not too distant future.

Multiple Road Traffic Offences

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Coaker.]

6.2 pm

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): I am especially grateful to Mr. Speaker for granting me this Adjournment debate, which deals with serious issues of public safety. I hope that the Minister will realise how serious these matters are, and that in his response he will be as positive as possible about how to deal with them.

The problem of multiple road traffic offences, which involves vehicles registered at false or incorrect addresses, has been brought to my attention by a number of my constituents. Vehicles that they have never owned and about which they know nothing have been registered at their addresses, with the result that the police have been in contact with them on many occasions.

I want to pay tribute to Bedfordshire police for their persistent action to try to deal with this problem, and specifically to PC Sean Quinn and PC Graham Dunn, who have worked tirelessly on behalf of the people of Bedfordshire in that regard.

The problem, in essence, is the police's complete inability to prevent and successfully prosecute repeated road traffic offences of an extremely serious nature. Let me give some examples.

In the case of excessive speed, I have recent documented examples, with photographic evidence, of drivers doing 98 mph in a 50 mph limit, 117 mph in a 50 mph limit at night, 73 mph in a 30 mph at night, and 82 mph in a 30 mph limit in the middle of Dunstable, a major town in my constituency. The highest recorded speed that has come to my attention was of a vehicle doing 119 mph in a 50 mph limit, on 4 September this year on the A505 between Leighton Buzzard, Dunstable and Houghton Regis in my constituency. As I shall explain shortly, such vehicles have been doing those sorts of speeds in those conditions time and again.

There is a problem not just with speed, but with vehicles jumping red lights, in some cases up to six seconds late. We know that one vehicle has done that on nine separate occasions, but the police are powerless to do anything about it. The reason that the police are powerless is, as I said, that vehicles are incorrectly registered to false addresses, or cloned, whereby a vehicle of a similar description to that which the perpetrator wants to register to a false address is registered to a law-abiding person's address. Farmers are often coerced into having their property used as a false postal address. One property in Chelmsford—25 Duke street—is notorious among not only Bedfordshire police but Essex police. I understand that it is no more than a drop-off postal address at which many vehicles are registered, apparently legally, but the police have no ability to contact the owners or do anything about the perpetrators of such offences.

As well as excessive speeds and going over red lights, there have been examples of extremely dangerous driving, such as people driving with their hands over their face at 64 mph at night, people taking their hands completely off the wheel even at night in a 30 mph zone, a child in the front seat on an adult's lap with no seat belt, and many offensive gestures made by drivers of vehicles at cameras. In the village of Kensworth in my constituency, which has a speed camera, a photograph was taken of a driver with one hand on the wheel while giving a thumbs up gesture out of the window to the camera with the other. All three other adults in the car are grinning at the camera. That shows that people who behave in such a way know that they can break the law, are flaunting their law-breaking and are taunting the police, who, they know, are powerless to act.

The Minister will agree that the danger to the public from the examples that I have given is huge. How would he like people driving in that manner to come close to the vehicle in which he was travelling with his family?

The problem is significant, and the incidents are not isolated. As at 7 April this year, the police have evidence of 1,004 such offences in south Bedfordshire alone. Of those, 466 were current and due to have fines paid of just under £28,000, and 538 offences were lost under the six-month rule, so the police had no ability to recoup more than £32,000 of fines that will not be paid. Therefore, there is also a public expenditure implication, and I am sure that the Minister would want all fines that have been properly levied to be paid and to come in to the police.

The powers that are needed to do something about this problem are as follows. The police need to be given the ability to seize a vehicle that is incorrectly registered and involved in multiple offences. The police should then have the power to retain that vehicle until the owner or offender is correctly identified and, if necessary, to dispose of the vehicle by suitable means, not least to pay off any fines levied on it. The police also need a further power of entry to land and/or garages—not dwellings, as people obviously do not keep cars in their houses—to seize such vehicles.

As I said, these are repeat offences. Moments before the debate, I was told that one van still on the road in South Bedfordshire has just clocked up its 73rd offence and a motorcycle has clocked up 61 offences. When I say "multiple offences", that is the order that I am talking about.

Bedfordshire police have done their homework on this issue and visited the Home Office on 15 April. I understand that it was suggested to the police that section 59 of the Police Reform Act 2002 should be sufficient for them to be able to address the problem. Bedfordshire police then contacted another five police forces to discover whether they were in the same position of not being able to apply section 59 in practice on the ground. Thames Valley police replied:

"To have power to seize vehicles showing multiple offences, if granted, would indeed be a useful tool in increasing road safety, if the safeguards required did not blunt its effectiveness . . . I can say that we rarely use the Police Reform Act because of the frustrations put upon us by the control room."

Suffolk police replied that "it could also be extended to cover vehicles owned by foreign nationals. We have a serious problem with transient workers in the food processing industry. They use a single base address to register their vehicle and then quickly move on."

Greater Manchester police said that they had

"asked our force solicitor re anti-social behaviour and serving a notice on the owner/driver of multiple offenders (concerning seizure). The Solicitor's response has deemed the act inappropriate in this case."

Cambridgeshire police replied:

"I would see seizure of vehicles could be promoted as a major contribution to road safety, in getting the cars out of circulation, even though temporarily."

And Essex police replied:

"I am not aware of any forces using the Police Reform Act for repeat offenders of camera activations, and there does not appear to be any other legislation that may assist."

I understand that it has also been suggested that section 43(c) of the Vehicle Excise and Registration Act 1994, which was put in place by the Serious and Organised Crime and Police Act 2005, has been suggested as a means of dealing with the problem, but I am again reliably informed by the police that that is not the case because that provision deals purely with driving without a valid driving licence and driving without insurance. Most of these vehicles are driven by people with licences and most are insured, so that legislation would not do the job that is required.

I tabled a parliamentary question on this issue recently to ask the Secretary of State to make a statement on the effect of the registration of false vehicle licence addresses on the ability of the police to combat multiple road traffic offences. The Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Paul Goggins), replied:

"An accurate register is important for identification purposes, so that the police can take effective action against the perpetrators."

The problem is that we do not have an accurate register. He continued:

"we have strengthened the likelihood of accuracy by the introduction of continuous registration and by creating a new offence of using a vehicle that is incorrectly registered."—[Official Report, 5 December 2005; Vol. 440, c. 968W.]

That power does not give the police the powers that they need to do the job.

In a letter to me dated 21 November, the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency stated:

"It is essential therefore that information about vehicle keepers on the register is both accurate and up-to-date but we are very much reliant on the public and the motor trade to provide this information."

It said that the information is used to "assist with road safety, law enforcement and the collection of vehicle excise duty."

I hope that I have outlined the scale of the problem and how serious it is. It is not a party political matter. What can we do about it? The Minister will know that the Road Safety Bill is about to arrive in this House. I have looked carefully at the Bill with Bedfordshire police and I suggest that it should be possible to amend clause 15—the clause deals with speeding, but we need to look at red-light issues and at dangerous driving—on the power to seize, retain and dispose of vehicles. Could we insert in clause 36 a requirement to prove one's address when a vehicle is registered? I know that the Government have looked at this and decided not to go down that route, but given the scale of the problem in my area alone, will the Minister agree to take the issue back, perhaps to a joint working party between the Home Office and the Department for Transport, and look at it again to see whether utility and council tax bills, or documents of that nature, should be required?

Above all, this is a crime prevention measure. I would argue that, if we get these measures on the statute book, we would rarely need to use them because the deterrent would be such that the word would go out that the police had the necessary powers. People would comply and the problem would disappear. I look forward with eager anticipation to the Under-Secretary's reply.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Andy Burnham): I congratulate the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) on securing the debate. He began by saying that it raised serious issues of public safety and I agree. Only last week at my advice surgery, I was dealing with a case of death by dangerous driving of a teenage boy in my constituency. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that this is not a great party political issue. Members on both sides want the police to have adequate powers to tackle irresponsible driving, which poses a danger to all of our constituents. There is a common purpose in wanting that to happen.

I welcome the spirit in which the hon. Gentleman introduced today's debate. Our responsibility is to ensure that the legislation on the statute book deals adequately with the problem, but is also proportionate. We believe that that is the case. He said at one point that the police were powerless to act. I hope that I can convince him that that is not the case and that the police do have powers to act. We keep those powers under review, but they are proportionate and balanced.

Andrew Selous: I have just told the Under-Secretary that six different police forces in different parts of the country have said that, for all sorts of practical reasons that affect police forces on the ground, the powers currently on the statute book are not adequate. He will no doubt tell me what legislation there is on the statute book, but will he address those specific concerns raised by six police forces?

Andy Burnham: The hon. Gentleman will know that we have changed the law in a number of ways in recent years in respect of irresponsible and dangerous driving, vehicle keeping and the powers that the police have to seize vehicles. The Home Office has received advice from the Association of Chief Police Officers that many forces are using the section 59 powers extensively and effectively. I heard the comments from the forces that the hon. Gentleman read out, but some 43 police forces have told us that those powers are being used and that they are very welcome in tackling antisocial driving.

Andrew Selous: I have given the Under-Secretary an illustration from my constituency, where there have been 1,004 offences. I can assure him that I have extremely good officers in Bedfordshire who are desperately keen to enforce the law. They are not stupid people; they are very bright and follow the law very carefully. Why are they unable to use the current law to deal with a situation where one vehicle has 73 offences charged to it and where there are 1,004 in total?

Andy Burnham: Of course I was listening carefully to the comments that the hon. Gentleman read out. We would want to work through those issues with the forces concerned, and I will refer to some of the detailed advice on the issue that we have recently given to forces. I do not doubt for a second the committed efforts of the officers whom he named during his speech and the general efforts of Bedfordshire police. He also mentioned my police force—Greater Manchester police—and I face issues in my constituency similar to those that he described, and I would want to pursue them with the force from my own perspective. I assure him that the advice that we have received via ACPO is that the powers are welcomed and that they are being used. If there are problems in certain areas, it is important that we work them out. We have a common interest in ensuring that the powers that the police have at their disposal are used.

I want to read out a comment from the hon. Gentleman's website with which I wholeheartedly agree. He gave notice on his website that he would seek a change to the Road Safety Bill that will soon come before us, but he also said:

> "I would like the government to concentrate on enforcing the laws we have on the statute book, rather than continually passing new laws."

That is absolutely the right position with regard to this issue, and the important thing is to focus on fully implementing the laws that we already have.

Let me set out some of the background. The hon. Gentleman will know that the roads policing strategy statement was issued jointly by the Home Office, the Department for Transport and ACPO in January and that reducing the antisocial use of the roads is one of the five specific actions on which the statement envisages that roads policing should focus.

Before I deal with some of the specific issues that the hon. Gentleman raised about seizure and the use of false addresses, I want to stress that the key to enforcing the law is ensuring that we have an accurate vehicle register. He is right to focus on that. Vehicles that are registered with incorrect details or not registered at all are regularly used in criminal and antisocial activities. They are often subsequently abandoned or burnt out—I am sure that he has experience of those problems, too—with further costs to local authorities. For the police to track and take effective action against the perpetrators, there must be an accurate register for identification purposes. It is an offence not to supply the relevant details for correct registration, but, of course, we cannot rely just on the willingness of the people who behave in that way to comply with the law. That is why we steadily strengthened the accuracy of the register.

A major step forward was the introduction of continuous registration, to which the hon. Gentleman referred and under which the registered keeper of a vehicle has statutory responsibility for licensing it and retains that responsibility until the DVLA is informed that the vehicle has been sold, exported, stolen or scrapped, or that a valid statutory off-road notification has been made. The registered keeper is therefore responsible for requirements in respect of the vehicle, such as the payment of vehicle excise duty, and cannot now evade them by claiming no longer to be the keeper. The DVLA also takes steps to ensure that false addresses are not accepted. I was listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman when he mentioned an address in his constituency that was regularly used to register vehicles falsely.

Andrew Selous: The address that I mentioned was 25 Duke street, Chelmsford, which is some way from my constituency, but it is well-known to the Essex police. It is curious that a number of vehicles in Bedfordshire are registered at that address. Will the Minister tell the House whether he thinks that the current laws on vehicle registration are adequate, given the problems that I have outlined? I am aware that the Government have gone further recently in that respect—of course that is welcome—but the proof of the pudding is in the eating. Is the law working and helping the police to do their job?

Andy Burnham: That is an important point. I hope that the DVLA will read in Hansard the hon. Gentleman's comments about that address and be able to take some action.

I can assure the hon. Gentleman that a procedure introduced in October 2004 means that known temporary addresses, addresses of convenience or post office box numbers are not acceptable for vehicle keepership details. When he introduced his remarks, he referred to strengthening the identity checking procedure when a vehicle is registered and he asked whether a utility bill or council tax bill could be used for that purpose. A utility bill does not prove much, however, and as the Minister responsible for identity cards and the national identity register, I urge the hon. Gentleman to think again if he, like his party, still opposes those measures. Linkage with the national identity register could bring real benefits in maintaining an accurate vehicle record. The register is a much higher proof of identity than a utility or council tax bill.

Under a procedure introduced in January 2004, the DVLA undertakes identity checks for high risk vehicles, such as those that are being imported. The checks cover both the vehicle and the prospective keeper. A database of all vehicles with no confirmed keeper is available to the police and can be checked by their automatic number-plate recognition—ANPR—cameras. Once a suspect vehicle has been stopped, the police have access via the police national computer to the full drivers' database to help establish the identity of the driver. The system is being improved—I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we constantly look to improve it—so that the police will have direct access to drivers' details through a handheld device. Trials are scheduled for spring next year, and from 2007 we expect the photographic image to be available through those devices in respect of drivers holding a photocard driving licence.

We think that will be a significant step forward. It will support the already increased roadside enforcement through greater use of police ANPR cameras and through the DVLA's powers, working with local authorities, to wheel-clamp and crush unlicensed vehicles.

In the remaining time for the debate, I want to discuss police powers on seizure, which is an important point and one that the hon. Gentleman wanted to cover.

Andrew Selous: The Minister is being generous in giving way and I appreciate his doing so.

If the Minister's case in the remainder of the debate is that the current powers are adequate, can he give me a simple, clear explanation why Bedfordshire police have been unable to do anything about that one vehicle that has 73 serious offences recorded against it? That is the fundamental question. If the law is adequate, why have the police been unable to anything about that?

Andy Burnham: I cannot discuss that case as I do not have the details, but if the hon. Gentleman will allow me to explain the law as it stands perhaps we can agree or disagree about whether the current position is adequate. New legislation is not always necessarily the answer; indeed, the hon. Gentleman himself says that we need to enforce our existing powers.

Section 59 of the Police Reform Act 2002 gives the police the power to seize any motor vehicles being used antisocially and to release them only on payment of prescribed fees. The power exists where a vehicle is being driven both inconsiderately or carelessly on-road, or off-road without authority, contrary to sections 3 or 34 of the Road Traffic Act 1988, and in such a manner as to cause or to be likely to cause alarm, distress or annoyance to members of the public.

We believe that is a powerful tool. It enables the police to put an immediate stop to the antisocial driving, inconveniences the vehicle users, requires them to meet costs to get the vehicles back and provides a deterrent to further misbehaviour. It does not preclude a prosecution, but nor does it depend on one. Nor should the fact that the driver may be committing some other motoring offence for which he could be prosecuted rule out seizure. The requirement is only that there should be reasonable grounds for believing that he is driving the vehicle contrary to section 34 and causing alarm; for example, he could be committing some other offence, such as speeding, at the same time, and could be charged with that in preference to a charge under section 34.

There is a requirement to warn, to give someone a chance to stop misbehaving, which is after all the main purpose of the police intervention. That may be where there is a problem of interpretation in relation to some of the issues that the hon. Gentleman raised. However, that requirement does not apply if it would be impractical to give a warning, and nor does it apply if an earlier warning had been issued on the same occasion to the same or a different person in respect of the same or a different vehicle. It does not apply if at any time during the preceding 12 months the person has already been given a warning.

Andrew Selous rose—

Andy Burnham: There is not a great deal of time left. If I can, I want to touch on several other issues that the hon. Gentleman raised.

To ensure that all forces realised the full potential of the powers available, we issued further guidance a few weeks ago together with examples of best practice—I told the hon. Gentleman that we were doing work in this area. We also made several amendments to the regulations that the police had identified as beneficial by setting out detailed arrangements for seizure, storage and disposal. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the powers exist. The important thing is to ensure that all forces realise the full power of the measures at their disposal and to encourage them to use the powers fully.

The power of seizure under the Police Reform Act 2002 is not the only power that is available. Many of the bad drivers who cause such concern are likely to be uninsured, as the hon. Gentleman said, or without a valid licence. Uninsured drivers are more likely than others to be involved in road traffic accidents, to be non-compliant with other road traffic requirements and obligations, and, perhaps, to be involved in other criminal activity. This year, we have taken action through the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 to deal with these problems. The offences are being more readily detected due to the increased use of police ANPR cameras. Until now, however, the only action that the police could take was to issue a fixed penalty notice or a summons. The police now have the power to stop such driving immediately. With effect from July, the police can seize a vehicle if a driver does not produce on demand a valid licence or proof of insurance and they have reasonable grounds for believing that the vehicle is being driven without either.

We are taking further action to address the concerns that the hon. Gentleman has rightly raised. He will know that we propose to create an offence of causing death by careless driving in a Bill that is soon to come before the House. I believe that the measure will be welcomed by hon. Members on both sides of the House. We have a good range of powerful and proportionate measures to ensure that the sort of behaviour that we all deplore and that causes so much distress can be effectively addressed. At present, we do not believe that we need to add to those measures, but I agree with the hon. Gentleman that we need to work hard to ensure that the powers that we have are fully used.

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

The Secretary of State was asked—

Iraq

1. Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): If he will make a statement on the security situation in Iraq. [36094]

2. Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): If he will make a statement on operations in Iraq. [36095]

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): Despite the best efforts of terrorists to destabilise Iraq, the Iraqi people continue to build their democracy and their own security forces. Fifteen million Iraqis have registered to vote in their elections on this coming Thursday. The Iraqi security forces now participate in 80 per cent. of operations and will lead the operations on Thursday. We wish them well.

Mr. Mackay: As Christmas approaches, will the Secretary of State convey to our troops in Iraq the heartfelt thanks of every Member and that our thoughts will be with them at what will inevitably be a difficult time?

Would the Secretary of State care to comment on President Bush's recent remark that, sadly, the reconstruction process is going much slower than we wished because of the security difficulties? What is the Secretary of State doing to ensure that those security difficulties are lessened in Basra and the areas for which we have responsibility?

John Reid: I join the right hon. Gentleman as, I am sure, does the whole House in sending our thanks and gratitude, especially at this time of year, to servicemen and women who are away from their families. I was able to do that in person about nine days ago when I visited our troops in Iraq.

It is true that developing democracy, security, and the economy and civil society in Iraq is slower than we would wish for this simple reason: the Iraqi democrats, with our support, are building democracy, security and the economy, but the terrorists are trying to destroy it. They will not win. On democracy, despite the threats of the terrorists, 8.5 million people came out to vote in January; more than 10 million came out to vote in the referendum in October and 15 million have registered for the vote this Thursday. Nor will the terrorists win when it comes to building the security forces. When I first came to the Dispatch Box as Secretary of State I think I said that we had trained and capable security forces in Iraq to the number of 160,000. I can tell the House today that the number is more than 214,000, and 80 per cent. of all operations involve Iraqi security forces. Though the terrorists may do their worst, the entrenchment of democracy, security and stability in Iraq will continue and we will continue to help the Iraqi people to do that for as long as is necessary.

Patrick Mercer: The Secretary of State will know as well as the rest of us that recently several brave young men have been killed by roadside bombs, the responsibility for which has been laid fairly and squarely at the feet of Iran by our ambassador to Baghdad and also by our commander in Basra. When asked about Iran's behaviour the Secretary of State said:

> "That is a risky way for anyone to behave, so we hope that it does not continue."—[Official Report, 10 October 2005; Vol. 437, c. 34.]

Have we anything more to offer our young men who face death and danger on a daily basis than empty rhetoric?

John Reid: I will ignore the hon. Gentleman's churlish comment. I can assure him that I and the Chiefs of Staff, and everyone engaged in the armed forces, are doing everything possible to make sure that at tactical and equipment level we bring in whatever protection we can before, if possible, any advances in terrorist capability. I am afraid that the substantial rhetoric that he would require for us to outline that at the Dispatch Box would do nothing but give assistance to the terrorists who are trying to kill our troops. Given the hon. Gentleman's position, I would have thought that he understood that.

On Iran, we have never said that the matter could be linked to the Iranian Government but the use of some of those explosives and improvised explosive devices can be traced to Hezbollah and Iranian elements. Of course, that is only part of the reason why the international community is so worried about the conduct and statements of Iran and Iranian politicians.

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East) (Lab): Has my right hon. Friend had the time to read the Oxford Research Group report released yesterday? Although I realise that he will not want to anticipate the outcome of the elections, does he agree that it is of concern that many Sunnis see the foreign forces in their land as partisan towards Shi'as and Kurds?

John Reid: I am glad that the Sunnis have been registering in higher numbers than ever for the elections coming this Thursday, which will be a major step forward, and I hope that that is part of a continuing process in ensuring that the new democratic Iraq represents all elements of Iraqi society, not just the Shi'a, the Kurds and others, but the Sunnis. As for the presence of multinational forces there, with great respect to anyone—academic or otherwise—in this country, I prefer to rely on the expressions of intent and the explanations of the democratically elected Iraqi politicians, who have made it absolutely plain that our forces are there at their request to do a job that they cannot do at the moment, which is to safeguard their fledgling democracy, but that, as soon as the Iraqi security forces are capable of defending their own democracy, they will ask us to hand over, and I can tell the House that we will be delighted to hand over. So we would be well advised on these occasions to listen to the views of the Iraqi democratically elected politicians, as we would expect them to listen not to minorities or fringe groups in this country, but to the democratic will of the House of Commons.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): Is the Secretary of State aware that, over the weekend, a peace conference on Iraq was organised in London by the Stop the War coalition and other groups, that many of the speakers at that conference were from Iraq, from parties that are contesting the elections in Iraq and, indeed, in some cases, are already represented in the National Assembly in Iraq, and that they all made the point that the security situation gets ever worse the longer that British and American forces remain in occupation of Iraq and that the best way forward was to name a date for the end of the occupation, so that the Iraq people themselves can take over the country, rather than continuing with an occupying force that seems to have brought a awful lot of terror into the country?

John Reid: Of course, there are other voices in Iraq—the ones who get elected—and the overwhelming majority of them welcome our presence there. President Talabani, President Barzani, Prime Minister Jafaari, Minister of the Interior Jabr, whom I met eight days ago, Defence Minister Delami—the Government of Iraq—have expressed their desire for us to stay there until they get the stability and security to defend their own democracy.

Alternatively, we could look, of course, at the opinion poll that the BBC commissioned and issued this morning that shows that between 64 and 69 per cent. of Iraqis believe that they have a more positive future, with only 11 per cent. thinking that the future will get worse. I dare say that that is a higher percentage of people who are optimistic about the future in Iraq than would be recorded in this country. However, the point is that if we look at the practice on the ground, 8.5 million people came out and voted, despite the threat from bombs and bullets, and 10.5 million came out and voted in the referendum, despite the threat of being murdered or massacred. The turnout was 64 per cent.—bigger than the turnout here in a general election—and 15 million people are registered, despite all the threats, to vote next Thursday. That is the voice of the people of Iraq that we should listen to.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): Does the Red Cross and the Red Crescent have full access to all suspects taken into custody by UK forces in Iraq? Does the UK condone coalition allies who do not allow the Red Cross access to all prisoners?

John Reid: To the best of my knowledge, the International Committee of the Red Cross has such access.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): What opportunities are there for members of the Home Service Battalion of the Royal Irish Regiment to serve in Iraq, bearing in mind that they are highly trained, very capable soldiers? Surely there is capacity perhaps to get some companies from that battalion to operate in Iraq, to the benefit of not only those dedicated soldiers, but United Kingdom operations.

John Reid: My hon. Friend will know that, uniquely among British troops, the Home Service Battalion of the Royal Irish Regiment, by institution, is confined to the geographical area of one part of the United Kingdom—Northern Ireland—because of the troubles there over decades. However, he is right to point to the fact that individuals from the Home Service Battalion have volunteered, been trained and served with distinction in Iraq.

Andrew Mackinlay: What about companies?

John Reid: Such things cannot happen with formations of the Home Service Battalion, but individuals have served, as many people from other regiments have done, on attachment with the basic regiments that are serving in Iraq.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring) (Con): On Iraq, the Foreign Secretary said this morning:

"Mistakes have been made subsequent to the war."

What mistakes were these, and which were the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Defence and his Ministers?

John Reid: In retrospect, I think that the process of de-Ba'athification probably went too far, too rapidly. That is now being reversed to some extent, for example with the willingness of the authorities in Iraq to take back former serving members of the Ba'ath party up to the rank of major. I would like to have seen a quicker response on an invitation to the Sunnis—despite their boycott—to participate in the constitutional commission. With the value of hindsight, which is, of course, the only exact science known to man and woman, we would have taken in more troops as a multinational invasion force to overcome an entrenched enemy. I am sure that there are several other matters to which we could point with hindsight. However, I stress that in terms of the generality of opportunity, freedom, democracy and security in Iraq, I have absolutely no doubt whatsoever that the correct position was followed, that a threat has been removed from the world, and that a burden was taken off the backs of the Iraqi people when the dictator Saddam Hussein was removed.

Dr. Fox: I am quite clear that the intervention has been of net benefit to the people of Iraq, yet we heard reports this morning that British troops might be withdrawn as early as the first part of next year. Is that correct? What discussions have taken place about a timetable, and on what criteria, and by whom, will it be decided that a handover is appropriate?

John Reid: I have made the position plain to the House several times, but I understand that the hon. Gentleman was not in his present office then, so I have no problem in reiterating it. There is no immutable timetable. The handover to the Iraqi security forces will be set primarily not by timetable, but by conditions. Those conditions are the ability of the Iraqi security forces to lead operations with our support at first, which would allow us to remove to barracks, and then to lead on their own, which would allow us to leave the country. That would be a process, not an event, but since July, I have said that that process could well begin in parts of Iraq, including our area, in the course of next year. Therefore, what was said in the past 48 hours here and what was said last week by the President of the United States was completely in accord with the conditions that I set down for victory: the handover to the Iraqi security forces themselves.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): While we recognise that there are arguments about coalition troops leaving Iraq and that the coalition has undoubtedly made serious mistakes in the past two years, would it not be useful if those who organised the sort of conferences mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) also condemned in the strongest possible way the terrorism that occurs day in and day out against innocent Iraqis, which in no way could be described as acts of liberation or anything of the kind? If there is a responsibility on us to recognise mistakes that have been made during the occupation, surely the critics have a responsibility to condemn along the lines that I have urged.

John Reid: Well, not for the first time on these matters, I agree with every word that my hon. Friend says. When we analyse tactical mistakes that have been made, it would be helpful to consider the strategic nature of what has happened.

Personally, I have never had a principled problem with removing fascists from power, and it surprises me that some people on the Labour Benches appear to have developed one. As for the people of Iraq, I have never claimed, and nor would I, that everything is perfect by any means. However, I am absolutely sure that the acts of the terrorists—the murder and massacre of pilgrims, ordinary working Muslims and children both inside and outside Iraq, for instance in Amman in Jordan recently when 29 of the people killed were Palestinians—should be utterly condemned by every single Member of the House. I am amazed that they are not repeatedly condemned in the way in which I would expect.

Afghanistan

3. Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): What recent assessment he has made of the security situation in Afghanistan. [36096]

7. Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): If he will make a statement on the security situation in Afghanistan. [36101]

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): The security situation in Afghanistan is broadly stable, but some areas are less settled than others. Our armed forces are playing a pivotal role in security assistance, helping the Government of Afghanistan to create a prosperous, democratic and secure country, and denying terrorists a base from which to prepare attacks.

Mr. Vaizey: I thank the Secretary of State for that reply. May I echo the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bracknell (Mr. Mackay), and extend the heartiest good wishes of the House to our troops—our serving men and women—who are deployed in Afghanistan?

Can the Secretary of State give the House an update on the security incidents that have occurred in Afghanistan? I only ask because one of my constituents contacted me—he has a son serving in Afghanistan—to say that at the end of November two Swedish soldiers were killed and that in October a RAF Tornado had been destroyed and another one badly damaged. I had not heard those reports before and I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman can give us an update on incidents against our troops and our said forces in Afghanistan.

John Reid: Tragically, it is true that not only ourselves but I believe the Portuguese and the Germans have lost personnel in Afghanistan. At this stage, however, we do not believe that that represents a step change in the violence that is occurring there, but several incidents in Kabul should have served to remove anyone's complacency. We—when I say "we", I mean NATO—are in the north and the west of Afghanistan. I have already said that we will deploy the headquarters of the Allied Rapid Reaction Corps to Kabul in the middle of next year, around May. In principle, I am prepared to see a significant contribution from British troops to the south of Afghanistan as NATO expands from the north, the west and to the south. I also said that that last decision, in principle, had to be subject to the correct military configuration from the British point of view, the correct multinational dimension and configuration within NATO and the correct complementary assistance in aid and development resources in terms of our counter-narcotics strategy to offer alternative livelihoods. All of those issues stand and no final decision has been made on the second point regarding British troops.

Mr. Graham Stuart: Is not the lesson of past insurgencies that only proactive patrolling and control of territory offers long-term security? Is the Secretary of State satisfied that all NATO contingencies have taken this lesson to heart?

John Reid: On the first point, yes; on the second, not entirely. I agree with the hon. Gentleman. It is a source of concern that the proliferation of caveats issued by the various multinational forces may impede effective operation and co-operation in the multinational force. We continue to discuss these matters at every redeployment and at every phase, as we will in phase 3, if we go into the south. Significant contributions to the effort in Afghanistan have come from nations not only inside NATO but outside, with help from colleagues such as the Australians.

Mr. Michael Moore (Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk) (LD): First, may I associate myself with the comments of the Secretary of State and of others about the bravery of our armed forces wherever they serve throughout the world? We have particular thoughts for them at this time of year.

Following the NATO ministerial meeting last week, the Secretary-General stressed that the organisation could not work in a void and that other international actors should stay equally committed. Within NATO, can the right hon. Gentleman set out how the United States will contribute to the proposed new ISAF—international security assistance force—plans? Can he confirm that the United States will maintain its current overall level of military commitment to Afghanistan? Given the proposed area in which UK armed forces will operate, is there any intention that British military personnel should become a significant part of the counter-terrorism efforts of Operation Enduring Freedom.

John Reid: The hon. Gentleman asked a host of questions, but I shall try to tackle a couple of the biggest ones. The number of US forces fluctuate, as is the case for any other nation, but there is no reason to believe that they should not continue to make a significant contribution to Afghanistan in future. I do not think, however, that there will be a huge difference from the number of forces deployed there today. Our contribution to the ISAF operation will essentially be the reconstruction remit, which is the responsibility of NATO, rather than counter-terrorism, which is the purpose of the American mission—Operation Enduring Freedom. However, I stress that wherever NATO troops are in Afghanistan they may be liable to attacks from insurgents. If they are attacked by insurgents and terrorists, of course we will defend ourselves—that is the nature of the rules of engagement and of our remit. There is not a complete distinction between counter-terrorism and counter-narcotics. During counter-narcotics operations, for example, insurgents or terrorists, some of whom gain income from narcotics, may be provoked to attack those who are attempting to stop the trade. The distinction is therefore not a neat one, but I can assure the hon. Gentleman that, overall, the US troops, who have taken significant risks and shown great courage in the face of danger, will remain there for a considerable time.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring) (Con): Can the Secretary of State tell the House about his discussions with our NATO allies about the rules of engagement? When does he expect to make an announcement about a further deployment of UK forces, and does he agree that it would be absolute folly for different NATO troops to operate in Afghanistan under different rules of engagement?

John Reid: I think it is inconvenient, but it is not necessarily an utter folly to have different rules of engagement in different areas, as different forces are undertaking different tasks. Some may be training the Afghan army, some may be assisting the resurrection of the judicial system, and some may be training police. However, I fully accept that the nearer one comes to a combat situation, the better it is to have rules of engagement that allow maximum flexibility when engaging with the enemy, which is why we have continual discussions on these matters with our colleagues. As for the south, I can confirm that we continue to hold discussions with the Supreme Allied Commander Europe and with NATO. I have spoken to Bill Graham, Robert Hill and Henk Kamp, my opposite numbers in Canada, Australia and the Netherlands about the possibility of going into the south and the configuration that we will use. However, as I have said, we have not achieved a final configuration that satisfies me that the configuration that Britain is prepared to provide is suitably encompassed within a NATO configuration. When we reach that stage I will, of course, make an announcement on deployment to the House. I would merely say that the delay in that final decision has not caused any risk of lack of preparation or training for our troops, because my right hon. Friend the armed forces Minister announced some weeks ago that training and preparations would go ahead on a contingency basis.

Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill

4. Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): What discussions he has had with the Prime Minister on the possible effects of the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill on Army efficiency and morale. [36097]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has not had any discussions with the Prime Minister on the possible effects of the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill on Army efficiency and morale.

Adam Afriyie: It seems to me that common agreement has developed over hundreds of years in our nation that time does not diminish the severity of a crime, especially murder and terrorism. On the one hand, the Government appear to seek to lock up unconvicted terrorists in Britain, so can the right hon. Gentleman explain in clear terms why, on the other, they seek to release convicted terrorists in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Ingram: We have to look at the situation in the round and over the piece. Preceding Governments at all times tried to find a way through the very difficult situation that we faced in Northern Ireland. I spent four years as the Minister responsible for security there. I reflect on every piece of legislation that I had to put through—the decommissioning legislation, the early release of prisoners legislation, the policing reform legislation and the public procession legislation. Each time, we were told that that would be the end of civilisation as we knew it, that it was an outrage and that it was totally wrong. Where are we now? We have a peaceful environment in Northern Ireland, which could not have been envisaged four or five years ago. There are still issues that must be addressed and big matters to attend to. There is no question but that the Bill is painful and difficult, and visits itself most dramatically on the victims of terrorism. They are the community that must be considered in this process, but if we want a peaceful future, we must take such painful decisions and the associated risks.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): My right hon. Friend has had a great deal of experience and distinguished service as a Minister in the Northern Ireland Office. Does he agree that the peace process has required compromise by all parties, and that the benefits that it has brought, principally to the people of Northern Ireland but also to our armed forces—the peace dividend—is valuable, and that if one fails to take difficult decisions, the process may backslide? The Government must take difficult decisions in order to secure the gains that have been made so far.

Mr. Ingram: I agree entirely. That is what I was trying to get across in my earlier answer. I reflect that every time we come up against those difficult decisions, and remembering the various constituencies out there, if we did not make those changes, we would still be in the troubled period of past decades. Previous Administrations, not just the present one, understood that. They understood that there had to be such a process and that, by definition, it would come up against very difficult decisions. I have expressed my view on the extent of those difficulties and where they visit themselves most dramatically. I also reflect on our armed forces and the security forces overall—the many hundreds of them who have lost their lives in the struggle. I pay tribute to them. We would not be in our current position had it not been for their determination, fortitude, skill and, in the case of too many of them, their ultimate sacrifice. The process is difficult and we will continue to do what is right for the people of Northern Ireland.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): The Minister is clearly not comfortable with the Bill, which is probably the most unpopular brought before the House in living memory. Does he accept that it will hold up the restoration of devolution, rather than accelerate it?

Mr. Ingram: I do not think that that is necessarily a matter for me—that is what Northern Ireland Ministers are for—but I have pointed out that at each step, each time we come up against difficult legislation, we have to reflect, consider and decide what is best. The Bill is undoubtedly a difficult piece of legislation. I do not demur from that point of view at all. The question is whether it is necessary and whether it will move the process forward. Some will say no, some will say yes, and only time will tell whether we got it right.

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): Is the Minister aware that the morale of the Home Service Battalion of the Royal Irish Regiment is low because of the pernicious provisions contained in the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill, but that it is also low because of the outstanding issue regarding the future of that battalion and its members' financial package, which must recognise the courage and commitment of those soldiers in the front line for so long?

Mr. Ingram: Yes, I do. Only a few weeks ago I met many of those who serve in the Home Service and I took them through some of the reasoning for what we are currently engaged in. I think they knew, as we all know, that ultimately, if we get peace, such a standing force will no longer be required. We have to manage our way through the process. I pay tribute to all that they have done over the past 37 years, and to the civil servants who have worked in the Ministry of Defence alongside the Home Service Battalion and the many tens of thousands of regular soldiers who have served in Northern Ireland. They made a major contribution to bringing stability and peace to Northern Ireland, and we have to find the best solution to manage the conclusion to that step in the process when they are disbanded or, in the case of the MOD civil servants, their tasks are no longer required.

Iraq

5. Mrs. Sharon Hodgson (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the development of the Iraqi security force. [36098]

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): We are continuing to build the capability of the Iraqi security forces so that they are increasingly able to take responsibility for delivering law and order themselves. The Iraqi security forces will provide the immediate security for the planned elections this Thursday and oversee the whole event.

Mrs. Hodgson: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. Does he agree that this Thursday's elections will further marginalise the violent forces and increase the prospects of victory and of liberation by Iraqi democrats, especially the new trade unions, which need solidarity from the international community and the British Labour movement, including groups such as Labour Friends of Iraq?

John Reid: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. This Thursday's elections will be a huge step forward for the people of Iraq, the country of Iraq and the middle east as a whole. Despite all of the threats, 8.5 million people turned out in January, 10.5 million people turned out in October and 15 million people are now registered. I only hope that the people of this country pay attention on Thursday to what the overwhelming majority of Iraqis are saying by coming out to use their new-found freedoms in the same way as some commentators in this country continually pay attention to the minority who are attempting to destroy Iraqi democracy and Iraqi lives.

Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): What is the Secretary of State's estimate of the impact of UK-based private companies on the security situation in Iraq? And what plans does he have to sign new contracts with those private companies?

John Reid: I do not have any estimate of those companies' contribution to the overall security situation, which primarily lies in the hands of the multinational forces, who are handing over to Iraqi forces. Iraqi forces are increasingly becoming trained, capable and able to take over leadership on security, which they will do on Thursday of this week, and they are the people who will ultimately play the major role. The multinational divisions or any private companies who are temporarily providing a degree of security will remove themselves from Iraq as soon as the Iraqi security forces and the democratically elected Government of Iraq want it to happen.

Defence Training

6. Mr. Pat McFadden (Wolverhampton, South-East) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the future of defence training. [36100]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): The defence training review programme will deliver specialist training on a defence rather than single service basis. Our vision is to create national centres of training excellence, giving our people the best opportunities, training and living environment that we can provide. Modern training methods and technology will be introduced, and training will be concentrated on a reduced number of sites to give the Ministry of Defence the flexibility that it needs to match training demand to defence needs.

Mr. McFadden: I thank the Minister for his reply. Will he acknowledge the tremendous strengths of Cosford as the site for future combined defence training, given its ideal transport links to the main areas of armed forces recruitment and its place as part of a critical mass of IT, aerospace and engineering skills, which exist in abundance throughout the west midlands?

Mr. Touhig: I will certainly pay tribute to the work that goes on at Cosford and to the Members of Parliament who represent that area and who look after the interests of its people. The defence training review will have an impact on Defence Estates, but future plans for RAF Cosford will not be decided until a decision has been taken on the defence training review.

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): On behalf of all the civilian communities around the defence training areas, notably Salisbury plain, may I say how much we appreciate the increasing professionalism of the management of those training areas? It is important that the permanent staff who maintain them retain their special links with all the parish councils and civilian communities that make up the everyday life of those estates. If they sometimes slip a little over some detail, they will normally put things right as quickly as possible, but use of the training estates has intensified massively and those relationships are very fragile.

Mr. Touhig: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's point. We are determined to have good neighbourly relations with all those with whom we work closely across the country. The creation of centres of training excellence that will be acknowledged and admired globally will not only enable our people to be recognised for their skills while they serve in the front line but make them valuable employees when they later become civilians. That impacts on the work that we are doing on the defence training estates. When a decision is taken and the programme is finally presented, that will benefit us all. I have no doubt that in the new environment we will want to work closely with our very good neighbours.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): My hon. Friend recognises that the British armed forces are among the best trained in the world and that the qualifications that they gain in training are second to none. The words that he is uttering at the Dispatch Box as regards centralising training are music to my ears. However, will he give an assurance that that will involve the best centres—those that have been the most cost-effective and have turned out, consistently and on time, the right numbers of recruits? Will he use that as the basis of building up the centres of excellence that are important for the future of this country?

Mr. Touhig: My hon. Friend is absolutely right that those are the criteria on which we must base our decision. The decision that we ultimately take must be taken in the best interests of this country and of the Ministry of Defence.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Can the Minister give me an assurance that in the defence training review St. Athan in Wales will not be given a competitive advantage over RAF Cosford in my constituency as a result of Welsh Development Agency money being used to promote it?

Mr. Touhig: I cannot possibly comment on whether WDA money is being used, but I can try to reassure the hon. Gentleman by saying that I have no doubt that all bidders understand the potential of RAF St. Athan as regards the defence training review. I am not in a position to comment on the various sites. However, I assure all right hon. and hon. Members that, based on all the information that we are given at the time, we will take the right decision in the interests of the country and of the Ministry of Defence. That is the only criterion that we can possibly use. No location should be given any special favours.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. McFadden) commented on the excellent location of Cosford, but it is equally important that all the off-balance-sheet and hidden subsidies that may be at play in the competition must be seen in the context of who can provide the very best location for the service. I believe that that means it will come to Cosford.

Mr. Touhig: My hon. Friend may well be right, but I cannot possibly comment at this stage.

Iran

8. Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): What assessment he has made of the potential threat to NATO countries and armies of the development of long-range missile technology in Iran. [36102]

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): We continually monitor the potential threat that long-range missiles present to NATO countries and armies. Iran already has short and medium-range missiles in service, some of which could reach NATO territory, and its potential for developing longer-range missiles has been recognised for some time.

Mr. Hollobone: What assessment have Her Majesty's Government made of the potential leakage to Iran of personnel and knowledge connected with Pakistan's nuclear programme?

John Reid: We continually keep that under review. It is not possible, by the very nature of intelligence matters, to be definite about these things. However, we know, for instance, that Iran has made no secret of its aspirations to develop a satellite launch capability, which of course has a very close relationship with the technology required for longer-range missile systems. We also know that Iran is proclaiming its desire to develop civil nuclear capacity in the context of the International Atomic Energy Agency's revelations that it has been trying to deceive the international community by developing a nuclear weapons facility. There are also the public statements by the President of Iran, threatening to wipe off the map another member of the United Nations. Taken together, those matters alert us to a serious problem, which is not only ours but that of the international community.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): I listened to what my right hon. Friend said with great interest. He knows that countries in the South Caucasus such as Azerbaijan, Armenia and Kazakhstan have close relations with NATO—they are members of the partnership for peace programme—but they also have good relations with Iran. Does he believe that we could encourage those countries to build better relationships with Iran that might lead to a better understanding of NATO's role?

John Reid: Undoubtedly, we would all, including the United Kingdom Government, like better relationships with Iran. We would much prefer problems to be tackled in a civilised, diplomatic and fraternal fashion. That is why the United Kingdom has led the European three with France and Germany, and I pay tribute to the efforts of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on that. We want to try to resolve the problem through diplomatic means.

However, that is not helped by statements such as those by the President of Iran, revelations of a secret development or attempt to develop nuclear weapons, or a breach by Iran of its obligations under the non-proliferation treaty. That is a challenge not only to us but to the international community and the United Nations. However, we are doing what we can to resolve the matter diplomatically and I hope that the Iranians will respond and go back to their original action—to stop the unwelcome restarting of the uranium conversion facility at Isfahan and suspend those activities while we try to resolve the problems diplomatically.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Does the Secretary of State recall the powerful speech that the Prime Minister made in March 2003, when he described the nightmare scenario of a rogue regime with nuclear or WMD technology and the means to deliver it coming together with fundamentalist extremists who would want to use such weapons? Is not that combination ready made in Iran? Is he as worried as I am by the statement over the weekend that Israel is actively planning military action, and can he inject his sorrowful and concerned tone, with which we all concur, with greater urgency? The matter should be at the top of the international agenda.

John Reid: Yes, I believe that it should be at the top of the international agenda. I am sorry if my tone today is emollient and sorrowful rather than aggressive. I am trying to find my sorrowful side on the matter after advice from so many Conservative colleagues.

Notwithstanding that, the problem is serious for the reasons that I outlined. They include not only our concern about the link with the attempts to kill our troops in Iraq but the statements threatening to wipe Israel off the map, the history of clandestine attempts to develop nuclear weapons and the possibility of long-range missile delivery systems. All that is difficult, but solving the problem diplomatically would serve the world better. I therefore assure the hon. Gentleman that the greatest urgency and priority has been given to the matter and I simply ask him to witness the efforts, energies and time-consuming dedication that the Foreign Secretary has shown on it. It is our profound wish that this matter be solved quickly and diplomatically, and the way for that to happen expeditiously is for Iran to return to the suspension of the facilities and the conversion, as it promised to do earlier, and to enter into serious negotiations in an attempt to resolve the issue.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I hear what my right hon. Friend says about diplomacy. Does he agree, however, that the role of Pakistan is important in this regard, particularly the role that A.Q. Khan played in supposedly giving information on nuclear weaponry to the Government of Iran? Would it not be a good idea if that information were shared more widely, and if, rather than keeping A.Q. Khan under house arrest in Islamabad, he were made available to those who know what has happened, so that we can really see what information the Iranians have?

John Reid: It certainly seems to me—as it presumably does to most objective observers of these events—that the proliferation of information, advice, tuition and details from the A.Q. Khan network has been one of the most dangerous examples of proliferation in recent years. If my hon. Friend's comment was an implicit criticism of President Musharraf, however, I will not join him in that. The President of Pakistan is making a serious effort in attempting to resolve the crisis with India in Kashmir, to restrain the excesses of the madrassahs, and to ensure a diminution of the entry of terrorism into Afghanistan. However, Iran itself has now declared that it has received offers of information on developing nuclear weaponry, and the proliferation of such information is very worrying indeed. As I said, the way to resolve this issue is for Iran to come back to the negotiating table and to respond to the efforts being made by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and by France and Germany to engage diplomatically on these matters.

Bowman

9. Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): How many military vehicles were programmed to be converted for Bowman; and how many have been converted. [36103]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): More than 20,156 land mobile platforms were in the original Bowman contract for conversion and, as of 7 December 2005, some 3,845 have been converted.

Mr. Heath: Bowman represents a huge improvement in potential capability. Is the Minister aware, however, of the frustrations being expressed to me by many serving officers and NCOs—non-commissioned officers—that vehicles are going for refitting and simply not coming back to their units, sometimes because of delays in the workshops and sometimes because of nonsense in the specifications, such as leads being provided that are too short for anything other than standard vehicles? The result of these problems is frustration in the operational units, and expensively acquired training decaying while people wait for the vehicles on which they can put their skills into use. Most importantly, perhaps, essential units are not in the state of readiness that they ought to be. Can anything be done to remove the logjam?

Mr. Ingram: Bowman represents an important step change and a considerable improvement. I was recently on HMS Bulwark with 40 Commando Royal Marines, who were extolling the virtues of what they had been trained to provide, saying that it would give them greater punch as an expeditionary force. Bowman is, however, a very complex system, and we have unquestionably encountered difficulties as we have gone along. A lot of that has been to do with the age of some of the vehicles, and with the non-availability of some essential pieces of equipment, which we are trying to source. We are discovering aspects of the vehicles that are presenting difficulties because their original specification included individual fits, which have to be worked round. We are fully conscious of the fact that there is a crying demand out there for the conversion programme to be advanced so as to bring those vehicles into service, and we are doing all that we can to achieve that. We know that this is a very important piece of equipment that will provide a tremendous step change, and we shall continue to try to meet the deadline of the end of 2007 as best we can.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): The roll-out of the Bowman radio system must be one of the more embarrassing procurement projects that the Army has had to endure. Our armed forces have rightly been praised, and all Members share in that, but such praise is often not matched by our encouragement and support for the procurement process. Does the Minister agree that waiting 40 years for the replacement of a radio system is far too long?

Mr. Ingram: I know that the hon. Gentleman is new to the House, but had he been around at the time he would have remembered the criticisms of the previous contract, which was probably best described as a disaster on legs—or, more appropriately, a disaster on wheels and tracked vehicles. It was not well designed and managed, and had to be renegotiated under this Government. We have faced difficulties and we now have an incredibly potent piece of kit, both in terms of the voice system and, as we roll it out, the data system. That will provide a step change and a new way of communicating between command centres, the front line and back again. It will lift the capability of the armed forces to a first-class level, and that is what is wanted. Everywhere that it has been implemented, it has been warmly received, and people say, "Give us more and move to the next phase." We are doing all of that. It has been difficult, but much of that history rests with the previous Tory Government.

Relief Effort (Pakistan)

11. Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): What role UK Chinooks have played in disaster relief in Pakistan. [36106]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): UK armed forces have provided significant and wide-ranging assistance to the Pakistan earthquake relief effort. That has included three heavy-lift Chinook helicopters, a specialist 86-man light engineering team, a four-person mobile medical team, four logistics planners, three C130 transport aircraft as part of the NATO air bridge, and 24,000 vegetarian and halal ration packs.

Mr. Khan: My right hon. Friend might be aware that I recently visited the areas affected by the earthquake in Pakistan, and I had the pleasure of meeting the Chinook teams working there around the clock. One of the contributions that he did not list was that our men and women can load and unload a Chinook faster than the Americans—we are doing three sorties a day. First, will he join me in congratulating our men and women? Secondly, will he consider speaking to our European colleagues, who, unfortunately, have been less generous than we have been? He will be aware that in that part of the world, at this time of the year, the help that we can give through our helicopters is much appreciated and needed.

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend has seen this activity at first hand. I met the Chinook crews when they returned, and I was amazed at the amount of effort that they had put in. He is right about the capacity of our people, which is better than that of not just the Americans but everyone, to lift heavy quantities and to do more sorties than anyone else. As I understand it, the Americans cottoned on to what we are doing and have introduced the same lift techniques, and other allies are examining what we are doing, including the UN efforts. We have helped considerably in that specific area.

I also saw off 59 Commando Royal Engineers and 42 Commando Royal Marines, who have gone to provide light engineering support. We have seen some of the playback of what they are doing. All the teams that we have sent out there are doing truly amazing work, all hours of the day, delivering essential humanitarian aid and support. Others should study what we are doing to see what more can be done. This is a critical area, and lives can be saved on the back of that effort. That is what our people are doing, and I will pass on my hon. Friend's warm words, which, I know, are echoed across this country.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): Does the Minister agree that the activities of those Chinook teams from the UK is a source of pride not only to Britain, but to RAF Odiham in my constituency. I know that the Minister visited RAF Odiham on Monday. Does he agree, however, that there is serious worry about the availability of heavy-lift helicopters once we deploy to Afghanistan next year? Is he convinced that we have enough heavy-lift helicopters, and support helicopters in general, to do the very necessary work that they do?

Mr. Ingram: There is an issue to be dealt with. We are looking at the servicing of the whole support helicopter fleet, but particularly the Chinooks, and considering new cycle times for maintenance. If that proves feasible in safety terms, more helicopters may be available at any given time, and pressures may be eased.

We should view the position across the board. We should not simply say "Let us purchase more"; we should ask whether there is a better way of making certain platforms available. Our action is part of our overall logistic support effort. It does not apply just to support helicopters, fast jets and so on. The Defence Committee, which the right hon. Gentleman chairs, is examining the whole issue, and I await the outcome of its report.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): I am sure that the whole House is very proud of the part played by the Royal Air Force in dealing with the terrible disaster in Pakistan. It is even more notable that we have been able to make that contribution despite the enormous pressure under which our helicopter fleets are operating.

May I return to the question asked by my right hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hampshire (Mr. Arbuthnot)? The fact is that we are short of heavy lift. We do not require it just for military purposes; we need it for precisely the kind of situation that we see in Kashmir, where the United Kingdom can make a serious contribution. Unless the Government are prepared to devote the necessary resources to defence, however, we shall not have that capability. In Iraq, as the Minister knows perfectly well, our helicopters are under enormous pressure. Can he not do more to ensure that the country has the heavy lift that it needs?

Mr. Ingram: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman heard what I said. We are paying a great deal of attention to the problem, and there are ways in which we can ameliorate it. We can ensure that more platforms are available at any one time, which constitutes best use of our defence resources. I do not propose to enter into a debate, but I shall mention in passing that defence has received the largest sustained increase in funds for 20 years. It received £3.7 billion in the Budget—a real-terms increase of 1.4 per cent.—over the current spending review period from this Government, which contrasts with the cuts made by the last Tory Government.

Oil Depot Explosion (Hemel Hempstead)

3.32 pm

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the explosion yesterday morning at the oil depot near Hemel Hempstead.

I am sure that all Members will join me in thanking the emergency services, the voluntary services, local authority staff, Government officials and local people for the magnificent way in which they responded to the event—with speed, efficiency and dedication. I visited the site yesterday afternoon on my way down from Hull and spoke to the chief constable, Frank Whitely, and the chief fire officer, Roy Wilsher. I also met staff from the other agencies involved in the incident. I was impressed by how well organised they were, and how they were getting on with a very difficult job. I stressed that the Government would provide the support and assistance needed to tackle the fire, and I reported back to the Prime Minister last night.

The scale of the situation is obvious from the powerful images that we have seen on television. The emergency services and other agencies are working together to tackle the fire. The facts are these. At about five past six yesterday morning, there was a huge explosion at the Buncefield fuel depot, on the outskirts of Hemel Hempstead. The site is about 1 km from junction 8 of the M1. The cause of the explosion is not yet known. It is thought to have been an accident, but we shall need a full investigation by the Health and Safety Executive in due course.

The explosion and the fire have totally destroyed the north side of the oil storage terminal. Twenty oil tanks have been destroyed, but the remaining tanks on the southern part of the terminal have been protected from fire. There has been considerable structural damage to the buildings on the surrounding industrial estate, and some homes up to three miles away have been damaged. Casualties have fortunately been remarkably light, largely because the explosion happened early on a Sunday morning. Yesterday, 43 people were treated in hospital; only two of them were seriously injured and only one now remains in hospital, in a stable condition.

As in all major incidents, the police established a "gold" command to bring together the emergency services and other key agencies. It is in Welwyn Garden City. In addition, the Government's eastern regional resilience team has provided a direct link with central Government, local authorities and voluntary agencies.

The initial focus was to secure the area and stop the blaze from spreading. About 100 police officers and 100 firefighters were at the scene yesterday, and about 150 firefighters from 12 different fire and rescue services are tackling the blaze today. They are succeeding in putting out fires in 10 of the 20 fuel tanks. About 250,000 litres of foam were used this morning, and more supplies are on the way. The fire services believe that they have enough foam to smother the fire and prevent it from starting again.

The scale of the incident was such that local resources were not sufficient, so the House will be grateful to fire brigades across the country that responded so quickly to calls for help. I also want to thank the people who are co-ordinating the response across the country so effectively.

I am pleased to tell the House that the high-volume pumping equipment, which was used so effectively in the Carlisle floods in January, has again proved vital. Just one of those high-volume pumps does the work of 18 traditional fire engines and it can pump water over a distance of some three miles. The new equipment was provided by my Department under the New Dimension programme for precisely those kinds of major emergencies.

The fire has had a number of wider consequences—in particular, health issues, the impact on fuel supplies and the provision of other public services. It has generated a large plume of smoke, which has spread widely. The plume is largely made up of carbon dioxide, carbon monoxide and hydrocarbons. As the fire comes under control and as the heat reduces, there may be an increase in smoke locally. While I am advised that the plume is not toxic, the smoke is certainly unpleasant and may affect people with lung conditions.

The Department of Health is working closely with the Environment Agency, the Health Protection Agency and the Met Office so that we can give up-to-date information about the plume and any implications for public health. Anyone concerned about the impact of the incident on their health should contact NHS Direct. Residents in the affected areas should stay in, close their windows and watch the news. As a precaution, a number of schools in the area have been closed today and employees of companies in the cordon have been advised not to go to work today.

The movement of the plume was unpredictable, so officials have also been in contact with the European Union to keep other countries updated. Prior to the fire service's assault on the fire today, there were detailed discussions with the Environment Agency to ensure that the foam and water cannot reach the drinking water supply.

The oil industry and the Department of Trade and Industry are working to overcome any impact that the incident may have on supplies of aviation fuel to Heathrow and Gatwick. A number of local services have also been affected and some precautionary measures have been taken. In the immediate aftermath of the explosion, some local people were evacuated from their homes to two rest centres provided by Dacorum district council, but only a few people took advantage of that.

The whole House will, I am sure, wish to pay tribute to the way in which the local council, voluntary agencies and the whole community responded to the emergency. I understand that a few people cannot return to their homes yet, but most are expected to do so within the next 24 hours.

Road transport was seriously disrupted yesterday as a result of the fire. The M1, M10 and local roads were all closed. I am pleased to be able to tell the House that the M1 has now reopened, although entry and exit at junctions 7 and 8 will be restricted in order to allow easier access for the emergency services.

As I said at the start of my statement, the response to the Hemel Hempstead explosion is a great tribute to all the emergency and other services involved and it is also a testament to the benefit of effective emergency planning. In the world in which we now live—with increased risks of both terrorism and accidents—multi-agency, cross-government contingency planning is vital.

Day in, day out, this type of preparation takes place behind the scenes and away from the glare of the media, yet it is for events such as yesterday's that we plan.

I can tell the House that, only three months ago, the emergency services in Hertfordshire conducted a successful exercise, covering just such an eventuality as occurred yesterday. The speed and efficiency of their response is testament to their foresight. Through the Civil Contingencies Act 2004, we put in place the legislative framework that set the foundation for that sort of multi-agency planning. The Government's investment in the New Dimension programme has also provided the equipment that worked so successfully in Carlisle and now in Hemel Hempstead.

It is through the bravery, commitment and professionalism of our emergency services that we can respond so effectively to events such as this. Last night, I witnessed a group of firefighters who were about to enter the inferno. We admire the courage and abilities of those firefighters, who work hard and willingly for the safety of the community. The House will want to record its admiration for their courage and dedication in working on behalf of the community. Not only the firefighters but the police and the ambulance workers deserve our great praise and admiration. I am sure that the House will join me in recording our thanks and gratitude for the courage and hard work of our emergency services.

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden) (Con): I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for giving me an advance copy of his statement. My colleagues and I certainly join him in paying tribute to the emergency services' skill and courage in tackling what is possibly the largest industrial fire since world war two, and in paying tribute to all those who have mobilised around the community to help. Our thoughts and prayers are with the workers and families affected by the blast, particularly in the run-up to Christmas.

In November 2001, the Health and Safety Executive prosecuted the British Pipeline Agency Ltd. for safety breaches at the Hemel Hempstead depot on account of inadequate containment around flammable aviation fuel tanks. Given that we have not heard from the Deputy Prime Minister what he thinks went wrong, could he tell the House when the HSE last inspected the oil depot? Does this latest incident prove that proper safety procedures were still not in place? Will he place in the Library of the House a copy of the compliance reports produced by the HSE in response to those earlier breaches? Is there any connection between the previous prosecution for inadequate containment around the aviation fuel tanks and eyewitnesses reporting fumes at the depot before the explosion?

Does the Deputy Prime Minister agree that this incident raises concerns about possible lack of safety training at the depot? Can he state when—once it is safe to gain access to the site—he expects the HSE to publish its interim report? Do the HSE and the fire services ever expect to find out the true causes, given the intensity of the explosion and the heat? Does the Deputy Prime Minister's recognition of the need for a full investigation extend to a public inquiry, in order that the full implications of this incident for other depots can be considered? Does his undertaking to provide support and assistance mean that Hertfordshire's local authorities, including the police and the fire authority, will be eligible for emergency funding under the Bellwin scheme? Does he agree that the costs that will have to be faced—of temporary accommodation, repairs to highways and special overtime for emergency services' staff—clearly fall under eligible expenditure for Bellwin? Does he also agree that at a time of acute pressures on local authorities, including the threat of capping, it would be wrong to charge local taxpayers for this unexpected emergency, the implications of which go far beyond the locality?

My hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mike Penning) has done an excellent job in articulating his constituents' concerns, and I hope that he may catch your eye, Mr. Speaker, not least because he has let the Deputy Prime Minister know of his concerns in advance. Given the worldwide reporting of this incident, does the Deputy Prime Minister agree that it has raised awareness—for good or ill—of the vulnerability of fuel depots? Will his Department now review security at oil depots throughout the country, and will that review include a risk assessment of any new house-building programmes near those sites? Does he agree that consideration should be given to reconstructing the Buncefield facility at a site further away from the residential community?

I compliment the Deputy Prime Minister on his prompt visit to the site, but as I know from preparing this response to his statement, this incident cuts across the work of several Departments—including his own, the Department of Trade and Industry, the Department for Work and Pensions, the Department of Health and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs—and a plethora of other agencies, such as the Health Protection Agency, the Environment Agency and the Met Office. Can we assume from this statement that the Deputy Prime Minister will be in charge, and what measures are in place to ensure maximum cross-departmental co-operation?

What are the longer-term environmental and health considerations of the pollution, which is being dispersed over a wide area? Will any guidance be produced by DEFRA on the possible implications for local livestock if the smoke cloud falls down to earth as contaminated rain? What is the risk of contamination to the water supply?

The United Kingdom is close to not having enough gas supplies for the winter, largely because of lack of storage capacity. What assurances can the Deputy Prime Minister give us that this incident has not further compromised energy security? What reassurance can be given to local people that panic buying is unnecessary?

The disaster has caused only limited human casualties, because—by the grace of God—it happened at 6 o'clock on a Sunday morning, but that miracle should not engender complacency in any agency. As so many departments and agencies are involved, I urge them all to face up to the reality that this could have been so much worse.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I thank the hon. Lady for her supportive remarks, which I think will be appreciated by all those who have been involved in this terrible incident. Of course there are many lessons to be learned, and many of the questions that she has asked today cannot be answered until later, but full inquiries will be made right across Government, in the bodies responsible for health and safety and for the environment, the Department of Trade and Industry and all other appropriate bodies.

The Environment Agency has been very much involved from the beginning. Indeed, tackling the fire was delayed for a while until we knew the full environmental consequences of the foam and the water passing into the water supply—and, of course, because of the heat of the fire. We have to make a judgment when we intervene, and that was a difficult judgment for the fire authorities. As they have said, the incident is probably unique in size and scale; that has caused them great concern, and our hearts are with them in their efforts to deal with this difficult problem.

It is proper to ask all those questions, and we will do all that we can to answer them. If the hon. Lady would like a meeting with me in a few days' time, when we have a little more information, I would be delighted to arrange one.

I shall indeed take the co-ordinating role across Government, to ensure that Departments work together to find the answers to deal with the problem. The fire certainly has not been defeated yet; people are still bravely fighting it, and it will continue for a time yet.

The hon. Lady asked about panic buying. The various authorities and the oil companies have made it clear that it is not necessary to get involved in panic buying, because the proportion of ordinary fuel used from this depot is much smaller than that used for aviation. There is a special problem with aviation fuel, which the DTI is looking into.

I do not think that we are complacent. The point that I made was that the New Dimension programme was bringing all the agencies together and providing the proper equipment. Nearly £2 million has been invested over the past two years to assemble the equipment and get the agencies to work together. It was quite comforting to hear from the police, the fire authorities and the agencies how the multi-agency approach had worked this time, because they are properly exercised and had the equipment to deal with the fire. As I said, if we had not provided the special pumps that can pump water from three miles away—indeed, water is now having to be provided from as much as a mile away—about 18 fire engines would have been needed. We are all grateful to see that the proper equipment is there to deal with this difficult problem.

As for the damages and the Bellwin scheme, to which the hon. Lady referred, she knows as well as I do that if the local authority spends more than £2 million, extra expenses under the Bellwin scheme can be considered. For the police authority, that figure is something like £319,000. As in all local authority budgets, a certain amount of money is made available for such contingencies. We shall consider all the circumstances.

Stringent conditions are laid down about siting such plants near housing, but the plant in question originated about 40 years ago and has been there ever since. Any lessons that we have to learn from that will certainly be taken into account.

The hon. Lady raised a number of very proper questions to which I cannot give adequate answers yet, because we must wait until the fire has been defeated for proper investigations to take place. As I have said, however, if she would like to come and talk to me about that in the next few days, I shall give her any further information that we have by then.

Sarah Teather (Brent, East) (LD): First, may I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for coming to the House to make his statement so promptly, and for giving me notice of what he intended to say. I echo his comments, and those of the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) from the Conservative Front Bench, in commending the police and fire services and all the other agencies for the extraordinary way in which they have responded to this unprecedented emergency. I have spoken with colleagues on Hertfordshire county council, and they have nothing but praise for the exemplary way in which the local services have handled the disaster.

The Deputy Prime Minister is indeed correct to say that we have been lucky in terms of casualty figures and, obviously, a police investigation into the cause is ongoing. However, does the Deputy Prime Minister believe that any lessons can be learned at this stage in terms of future planning policy about the siting of such depots close to residential and commercial areas? Can the Deputy Prime Minister confirm that any early information gained about the cause of the accident will be passed on to other depots, four of which are much larger than the one in Hemel Hempstead, and that safety checks will be carried out at other depots as a matter of urgency?

Will the Deputy Prime Minister acknowledge that Hertfordshire has had to deal with four major national incidents in the past 10 years, including the Hatfield rail crash, so will he be flexible about the arrangements for an application for extra funding under the Bellwin scheme? In terms of the environmental and health impacts of the incident, what assessment has been made of the consequences of burning large quantities of oil at a temperature different from that of a combustion engine? For example, has any assessment been made of the likely profile of polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons, produced as a result of incomplete combustion, and what would be the likely consequences of those in the food chain?

In terms of the particular soot solution and the impact on people with respiratory illness, what discussions have taken place with the primary care trust to ensure that adequate provision will be made should seasonal infections and air pollution co-exist to lead to an increase in acute episodes of illness? I also understand that the hospital episodes statistics unit has been badly damaged by the incident. What implications will that have?

The Deputy Prime Minister has confirmed the statements from the police yesterday that there is no need to panic buy. What actions have the Government taken to ensure that public fears are allayed and that it does not become a reality?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I thank the hon. Lady for her words of support, which will also be much appreciated by those dealing with the fire.

On the issue of planning, we have tough rules about the siting of such plants, which is also covered by the common European rules. They are very different from the situation 40 years ago when the site was originally planned. Any lessons to be learned will not wait until the final result of our inquiries. If information of immediate use, interest or value arises with regard to improving safety, it will be made available so that changes can be made to other sites.

The Bellwin scheme judges individual incidents, not a collective number of incidents. For example, it provided resources for dealing with the Carlisle flooding, based on the criteria that I mentioned earlier.

The questions of chemical reaction and combustion are matters for the Health and Safety Executive and I shall draw them to its attention. The health authorities in the area acted quickly to provide the proper advice and make hospital services available. Thank goodness, they were not greatly used, but they were in place—they were stood down quickly after very few people turned up. As the hon. Lady said, we are grateful that the incident happened early on a Sunday morning. There would have been many people in attendance at the nearby industrial buildings on a Monday morning, and we have all seen the pictures of them. If it had happened at a different time, we could have been dealing with a very different situation.

I hope that the problem of panic buying will be helped by the statement in the House and by the statements made by the chief constable and the fire officers. They are to be congratulated on giving as much information as quickly as they could and on making it clear that panic buying was not necessary. All the signs are that people have taken that advice, but we will continue to make it clear that there is no need for any panic buying.

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware that my constituency is dominated by the Stanlow oil refinery and it will come as no surprise that constituents have expressed concern about whether such incidents could occur locally. May I join my right hon. Friend in praising the fantastic work done by the emergency services over the past 24 hours? It reflects the sort of co-ordinated action that I have seen in previous incidents in the petro-chemical industry. It is important that we learn lessons from this across the whole industry. I agree with my right hon. Friend that it is too early to speculate about what went wrong and whether the location should be moved, but will he assure me that there will be a cross-industry study to determine whether changes are needed and that we ensure that best practice across the sector applies to the distribution terminals? By their nature, they are places where the risk is real, due to the transfer to vehicles. Can we be assured that every possible lesson is learned and put into place?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I thank my hon. Friend for his support for the emergency services, which will be well received by them. I am well aware of the Stanlow refinery as I went to school nearby in Ellesmere Port. I know of the concerns of people who live near such facilities, and of the requirement to ensure their safety. The industry has already made it clear that whatever lessons are to be learned will be passed on. The industry will conduct its own investigation, but the advice of its experts to the firefighting authorities has been valuable and was much appreciated by our firefighters.

We shall certainly ensure that the lessons that are learned become best practice. There is much consultation and negotiation between the Government and various bodies. I recall hearing the explosion at Flixborough on Humberside in the 1970s. Many lessons were learned from that and implemented in the industry with its active co-operation, and I have no reason to doubt that that would not be the same in this case.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for coming to the Chamber so quickly to make a statement. On behalf of my constituents in Hemel Hempstead, I also thank him for visiting us yesterday at a very difficult time for us. I apologise that I was not available in the area that he visited; I was actually with constituents on the other side of the fire.

I praise the professionalism of what is without the shadow of a doubt the best fire service in the world, which has been fighting the fire in Hemel Hempstead for about 30 hours. As a former fireman, I dreaded going to such fires and as the crews were going to the fire I know they were dreading what they might see when they arrived, especially as they knew that people were working at the site. The luckiest men alive are the maintenance workers who walked away with only cuts and bruises even though they were only a few feet away from the initial explosion. I have met those maintenance workers, and the shock has set in as to how lucky they are.

This is a national disaster and the costs of fighting the fire cannot be borne by the taxpayers and the fire authority in Hertfordshire. It is physically impossible. I welcome the extra appliances that were sent from all over the country and, in particular, the other fire authorities that have been working so closely with my crews throughout last night and today. The situation looks promising, as the fire is out in a lot of the tanks, but the costs will be unbearable for the local community. Not only are there firefighting costs but, as the House will be aware, the industrial estate, which is closed to cameras today, is devastated by the blast damage, as are the local residents, and the next part of my question relates to the long-term effects on them.

When the depot was built, there was hardly any residential property around it, but over the last 40 years it has been surrounded by residential accommodation. Forty years ago, the site was probably assumed to be safe; clearly, it is not today. May we have an urgent inquiry into the siting of such depots? Such an inquiry should cover not only the facility itself but the emergency facilities around it. I am sure that the Deputy Prime Minister was informed yesterday that the acute accident and emergency centre where the injured persons were taken is due to close next April, under Government proposals. If the depot remains in the area, my constituents will be worried about the long-term effects of that closure for their community.

This is not about party politics; it is about what is right and wrong for our constituents. I am so proud of my constituency and the way that people pulled together as a community yesterday. I thank them for all the work they did and I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for going there yesterday.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for those remarks. I was well aware that he was actively looking after his constituents' interests during my visit. I hope that he will accept that my intention was not to commit the chief constable or the chief fire officer simply to attend me, but to ask whether they wanted any assistance, so I was in and out quickly. I hope that he understands that that was the reason why I did not contact him when he was seeing to his constituents' needs.

As a former fireman, he will appreciate more than anyone the difficulties facing those firemen at present. I have referred to them waiting to go into the inferno, and we all admire the extraordinary courage of firefighters in those circumstances. Of course, the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Jim Fitzpatrick), is also a former fireman—so I have got them to the front of me and to the back of me. I felt that during the last dispute, but I will not go into that situation. Nevertheless, I have never doubted the courage of those people who, as workers, are willing to face danger in such a way. No other person is faced with that, and we are grateful to them for doing so on behalf of the community.

The hon. Gentleman referred to this as a national disaster. Again, the resources that we make available under the Bellwin scheme for such circumstances will be judged against the incident. Clearly, terrible and extensive damage was done to the industrial estate, and the insurers have already told those companies, as well as householders, that they are prepared to consider all those claimants. We will see what we can do in that regard.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the residential properties near to the site. Obviously, planning permission was given for them, but I will certainly look into that and see whether any lesson can be learned.

In regard to the emergency services at the hospital, that was certainly not expressed as a concern, but I readily take on board what the hon. Gentleman said. However, I give him the same offer as I gave to the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman): if he desires to see me in a few days when the position is a little clearer, we can discuss exactly his fears and whether we can do any more to assist his constituents.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): I thank my right hon. Friend for the statement, and I associate myself with the remarks that he has made about the professionalism of the emergency services involved. Does he agree that this incident is almost unique in its significance and that the range of public services and organisations involved clearly demonstrates the importance of the recent legislation on civil contingencies and the changes in emergency planning? Will he undertake to assess the outcomes of the incident against the legislation and the changes that have taken place, with a view to finding out whether any further strengthening is needed because of the incident?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind remarks about the emergency services. They expressed to me very strongly their gratitude for the new organisation, which brings together the various public agencies. They recently carried out an exercise in that respect. Indeed, one of the points made to me by the chief constable was that people from outside the area were already involved. People trained to do some of this work were sent in from other regions, although none was called in at that time. That also brings home to us the fact that the resources needed in this kind of incident are greater than those available, for example, to county organisations. Hence the importance of organising contingency funds and equipment on a regional basis, as in the legislation to which my hon. Friend referred. New equipment, new organisation and new ways to approach exercises to prepare for such events certainly played their part. We will take on board the lessons that we must learn and then discuss with the authorities how we may implement them.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): As my constituency borders the Buncefield storage depot, may I endorse, and associate my constituents and myself with, the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mike Penning) and the Deputy Prime Minister, in which they expressed gratitude and praise for the emergency services for their exemplary courage, dedication and commitment over the past 30 hours? I visited the burning oil fields in Kuwait and never expected to see an equally terrifying inferno so close to a built-up area on the doorstep of my constituency.

May I raise two points that my constituents have put to me that have not been mentioned so far? There is a fear that the partly burned fuel might generate carcinogenic chemicals, so will the Deputy Prime Minister confirm that that is not the case? Constituents whose homes have been damaged need to know as soon as possible whether they will be able to claim for those damages from the owners of the depot, or their insurance policies. I end by expressing my gratitude to the Deputy Prime Minister for the action that he has taken in response to these events.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his remarks and for indicating that our emergency forces acted with exemplary courage. They certainly played their part with tremendous dedication in what he rightly called an inferno. The chief fire officer told me yesterday that he had never seen anything on such a scale. We are dealing with a situation on a scale that is quite unique in Europe. Indeed, we are in uncharted waters with the problems that come from the chemicals produced by burning oil and petrol, and it is thus difficult for me to give proper answers to such questions. I am advised that the chemicals are not toxic, but let us wait and see. Discussions are going on at the moment and investigations are under way. When we have further information, we will report to the House as soon as possible.

The insurance companies have made it clear that any claims for damage to homes will be properly entertained. However, if we find that there are any difficulties, which is sometimes the case when such terrible and tragic incidents occur, the Government can play a part in encouraging parties to come together so that people are properly compensated. The right hon. Gentleman can be sure that we will do all that we can to ensure that that happens.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): What are the implications for grazing animals in the areas in which the plume descends? Can I take it that milk production in those areas will cease?

The Deputy Prime Minister: My hon. Friend makes an important point, but I cannot give him an effective answer about whether milk production will cease. We will have to make proper assessments and judgments on what the damage due to the fall-out from the plume might be. Of course, people are worried that as we successfully begin to defeat the fire and put it out, the thermal draughts that send the plume so high will be removed and thus the effects of the plume will come much closer to home. We are carefully monitoring the situation to find out what is happening and we are making assessments. However, I cannot say what action will be taken until we properly know what the threat is.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): I pass on my condolences and those of my constituents to the people of Hemel Hempstead, which is a constituency that borders my own. I know that they will be as pleased as I am that support from Bedfordshire's fire and rescue service, police services and local authorities was so readily forthcoming. However, my constituents have expressed concern about the delay in putting out the fire, at the request of the Environment Agency, although I am sure that we all understand the reasons for that because we would not want our water supplies to be contaminated. Will the Deputy Prime Minister examine that matter so that when such fires happen in the future, they can be put out as quickly as possible to minimise the damage to the environment?

The Deputy Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman raises a fair point. I think that more than 14 fire authorities sent fire vehicles and firefighters to assist. Indeed, I think that they do so automatically under the procedures that we have set up. When there is such an incident, there is no question about timing or assistance because people all act together, even if they are not called upon to appear at the site.

On the environmental costs, it is true that the Environment Agency was concerned—as, indeed, were the fire authorities—about the effect on the national water supply of applying foam and water on such a scale. It was not satisfied that there would not have been consequential damage, so there was a little delay. However, the delay certainly did not occur only because of the environmental advice. Given the heat, the chief fire officer had to make difficult decisions about when to apply foam and the mix of the water and the foam, which is concentrated. The combination of those two matters meant that the fire services did not immediately go into the fire. The other factor that would have delayed entry is that some tanks that had not exploded then exploded later. I heard one go up when I was there. It was one of the last two. It is difficult for firemen to deal with a fire when they do not know whether the tank that they are trying to keep cool will explode. All those factors may have added to the delay, but that delay was necessary for safety and for proper treatment in response to the situation.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): I join my hon. Friends and the Deputy Prime Minister in their praise for the emergency services and for the work that they are doing in the neighbouring constituency to mine, Hemel Hempstead. I acknowledge my constituency water company, Three Valleys Water, which has been working with the Environment Agency and the emergency services to ensure that every effort is made to assist the fire service in limiting damage to the environment. However, I am very concerned about the longer-term impact on the environment, and especially the potential pollution of ground water supplies.

The right hon. Gentleman will know that Three Valleys Water loses about one water source a year due to pollution, and I would like his assurance that a comprehensive clean-up operation will continue to be a high priority for the Government in the longer term.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I can assure the hon. Lady that there is concern about undertaking a comprehensive review and a proper check of what is occurring. I am assured by the Environment Agency that it does not think that there will be an effect on the water supply. It undertook rigorous testing on that basis.

The hon. Lady may know that one of the requirements of many of these plants is to build a trench around them so that any spillages go into the trench areas. Those spillages can then be pumped out and put into reservoirs. The Environment Agency had to ensure that that provision was secure. We will continue to monitor the situation and I will be ready to pass on to the House any information that we receive.

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): May I also pay tribute to the emergency services, whose courage and professionalism have impressed us all? I pay tribute in particular to the Bovingdon fire crew from my constituency, which was one of the first crews on the scene on Sunday morning. Unfortunately, Bovingdon fire station is due to close next year because of cuts in fire services as a result of additional responsibilities that have been placed on the service in Hertfordshire, but without any additional funding. Will the Deputy Prime Minister assure us that future reorganisations of the fire service will not mean cuts to front-line services, which unfortunately Hertfordshire faces over the next few months?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware, particularly given the tone of his remarks, that such decisions are made by the local fire authority, which had to find a balance. Account is now taken of the regional implications of changes, and we are pleased that that brought in the necessary fire pumps. There are adjustments and changes, but no area will suffer from a lack of proper safety cover. That is the responsibility of the local authority area, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is well aware of that.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere) (Con): May I join with the Deputy Prime Minister and with hon. Friends in paying tribute to the emergency services, including, of course, the firefighters of the Hertfordshire fire service, which includes firefighters in Radlett in my constituency, who have been playing a full supporting role since early yesterday? They have demonstrated once again the vital role that they play.

[Mr. James Clappison]

I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for the role that he has played so far. However, in the aftermath, I urge him, together with my colleagues, to do what he can to ensure that the burden of this event does not fall disproportionately upon Hertfordshire.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I can give the hon. Gentleman that assurance.

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): I join in paying tribute to the fire services and the other emergency services that are involved in the incident. Once the issues in this immediate incident have been resolved, I hope satisfactorily, will any of the lessons that will undoubtedly be learned from the incident be shared throughout the United Kingdom to prevent any recurring incident?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his remarks. I can assure him that, as in all these incidents, there are lessons to be learned, and they will be shared throughout the United Kingdom.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): Last week, we heard about the crash of a C-130J aircraft in Afghanistan. One factor that contributed to the crash was the lack of a fuel tank inerting system. Does the Deputy Prime Minister know whether there was an inerting system in the fuel tanks at the depot, and is it something that will be included in the investigation to see whether the introduction of such systems would valuable?

The Deputy Prime Minister: To be honest, I do not know. I will try to find a proper answer for the right hon. Gentleman, and write to him.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I wish to be associated with the Deputy Prime Minister's remarks about the emergency services. In the past few years, the number of whole-time professional firefighters in the United Kingdom has fallen. As a result of the incident and the review, will the Deputy Prime Minister undertake to look at that and see whether we should reverse that trend by starting to increase the number of whole-time firefighters in the UK?

The Deputy Prime Minister: The House will know of the recent Bain report on manpower in the fire services and the demands that we make of them. Considerable changes are under way, but a combination of full-time and part-time firefighters is used, depending on the circumstances. I am quite satisfied at this stage that we have sufficient manpower to be able to deal with all the risks and assessments, and to meet the changes that are necessary.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): May I join the Deputy Prime Minister in paying great tribute to all the emergency services, whose members put themselves in harm's way when the rest of us cannot escape quickly enough? He will be aware of the emergency planning college at Hawkhills in Easingwold in the Vale of York, so will he ensure that the work that it does to prepare for such emergencies is well known? Will he ensure that any future scenarios for which it plans training sessions will encompass the incident and take on board any lessons from the inquiry?

The Deputy Prime Minister: The hon. Lady is well aware of the work of the emergency services, given the flooding in her constituency. We both have great admiration for them—whatever part of the country they are in, they always do an excellent job. I can assure her that all the lessons to be learned will be discussed in the various forums available.

Former Far East Prisoners of War and Civilian Internees (Ex Gratia Scheme)

4.17 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement on the Government's ex gratia payment scheme for former far east prisoners of war and civilian internees.

On 1 December, I gave evidence to the Select Committee on Public Administration on the operation of the scheme. It was introduced on 7 November 2000 and the first payments were made in February 2001. The birth-link criterion was clarified internally in March 2001, and clarified publicly on 11 July 2001—each successful claimant would receive £10,000. I explained to the Committee that I had commissioned a review into whether consistent eligibility criteria had been used throughout for civilian internees, and I undertook to make a statement to the House before the recess.

The review now under way requires the Veterans Agency to look at a large number of claim files, and the House will understand that it is not yet complete. As I said to the Committee, there was a desire on all sides to introduce the scheme as quickly as possible because of the age of some of the former POWs and civilian detainees. It is clear that we did too much in haste when introducing the scheme and it is important that we now take sufficient time to get it right. None the less, many individuals who may be affected are elderly and I recognise the importance of resolving the issue as quickly as possible.

The scheme at present offers compensation to British internees born in the UK, or internees who had a parent or grandparent who was born here—the so-called birth-link criterion. The work under way confirms that claims decided before March [illegible] were not decided on the basis of the birth-link criterion or on eligibility rules that were fully consistent with it. Of those early claims so far examined for which payments were made, there is clear evidence that the majority were decided by reference to an earlier scheme in the 1950s, which used liquidated Japanese assets to compensate far east prisoners of war and civilian internees. Those eligibility rules for the scheme were based on the question of whether the individual was a British national, was normally resident in the UK before internment, and had resumed residence after the war. Evidence so far examined strongly suggests that the birth-link criterion was introduced in part because it was found that eligibility based on the earlier Japanese asset scheme excluded many claimants with a close link to the United Kingdom.

The introduction of the birth-link criterion in March 2001 allowed large numbers of additional civilian internees to be paid. The overall effect was to widen the number of people who met the qualifying criteria. However, this change of criteria had two other specific effects. First, we have identified some 240 claims that were paid in the first period which, on the evidence available when the claim was decided, could not be identified as meeting the birth-link criterion. Though these claims were not decided on the birth-link criterion, it is probable that a number of them would have satisfied it, had we sought further evidence on whether any of the claimants' grandparents were born in the UK. I emphasise that we do not intend to ask for any repayment in these cases.

Secondly, there may be some claimants who would have qualified before the birth-link criterion was introduced because they had benefited under the Japanese asset scheme, but who were rejected because they applied after March 2001 when they were assessed against the birth-link criterion. We do not know the numbers of this latter group, but we think they are small.

We still have some way to go in examining claim files and I cannot at this stage say that there are no other issues concerning the application of eligibility criteria. What I can say is that we are determined to undertake a thorough review to ensure that we expose any difficulties that there may have been with the eligibility rules. It is also too early to say what effect our findings might have on the scheme's eligibility criteria. I can, however, again confirm that there is no question of seeking to recover payments already made to claimants who would not have met the birth-link criterion. I can also assure the House that no claimant will be disadvantaged if he or she would have qualified under the criteria based on the Japanese asset scheme but failed because the claim was considered under the birth-link criterion.

There is a separate question about how the use of inconsistent criteria before and after March 2001 was not exposed earlier, in spite of the fact that there have been a number of court cases, ministerial statements and an inquiry by the parliamentary ombudsman. I have decided that this should be the subject of a separate investigation, and I have asked the permanent secretary at the Ministry of Defence to identify a retired senior official or comparable person from outside the Departments involved who could appropriately lead the investigation. The work will be put in hand as a matter of priority and I will report its findings to the House when it is complete.

The House will be aware that there have been two claims for judicial review of the scheme which have focused on the eligibility criteria applied to former civilian internees. It is too early to say what effects the review that we have been undertaking may have on these, but I can assure the House that we will disclose to claimants in those cases and to the courts the results of our review when these are known. I will also share this information with the parliamentary ombudsman.

In addition, Members on both sides will want me to tell them that a number of claimants for whom strong support has been expressed in the House and more widely will become eligible for payment. I know that the case of Professor Hayward is a particular concern for a number of hon. Members who raised it with me. I understand their wish to see the position resolved for those individuals, but I have to make it clear that, until our review is complete, I cannot give any assurances about how the criteria might need to be changed or what the effect might be on individual cases. At this stage I can say only that we fully appreciate the difficulties that we have brought on these individuals as a result of uncertainties about the scheme criteria, and that we will be seeking to resolve them as quickly as we possibly can.

I have said a number of times that we recognise that mistakes were made as a result of the speed of the introduction of the scheme. All those involved wished to see the payments made as quickly as possible, given the age of many of the former civilian internees and prisoners of war. It is now clear that the scheme's eligibility criteria were not applied consistently through the scheme's life and that we did not identify that that was the case over an extended period. That resulted in inaccurate statements, including by Ministers to Parliament and to the parliamentary ombudsman, for which I apologise unreservedly, Mr. Speaker. I also express my apologies and deep regret to those individual claimants who have been adversely affected.

We will complete our review of the application of eligibility rules as quickly as possible, but with the overriding requirement that we must ensure that we have bottomed out any problems that there may have been with those rules. At that point, we will also consider what changes are required to our current criteria to ensure that no claimant was disadvantaged if they would have qualified under the criteria based on the Japanese asset scheme, but failed in their claim because it was considered under the birth-link criterion. Our objective will be to remedy any shortcomings in the decisions on claims as quickly as possible, and I hope that we will complete that work by early February, at which point I will make a further statement to the House.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): I fear that this statement will come as a severe disappointment to members of the Association of British Civilian Internees Far East Region. Today's statement was anticipated by the Minister's testimony to the Public Administration Committee on 1 December, and it was hoped that something substantive would be announced. Instead, we have had a typically gracious apology, which is only the latest in a line of apologies—there was an apology in a written ministerial statement on 13 July, and there was another apology, and the offer of £500 compensation for the mistakes made, in a further written ministerial statement on 11 October.

In reality, the veterans and civilian internees are not looking for more apologies; they are looking for the Government to honour the pledge that they gave on 7 November 2000. Does the Minister recall what Lord Moonie, as he now is, said when he held his post? He said:

"I am very pleased to be able to inform the House that, as a result of the review, the Government have decided to make a single ex gratia payment of £10,000 to each of the surviving members of the British groups who were held prisoner by the Japanese during the Second World War, in recognition of the unique circumstances of their captivity."—[Official Report, 7 November 2000; Vol. 356, c. 159.]

Does the Minister recognise that there has been a humiliating confrontation with the courts and a humiliating confrontation with the ombudsman? An adjustment was made to the criteria that narrowed them to exclude some people who had been in the camps, but that also widened them to include some people who had not been in the camps. Does the Minister accept that some people who were never in a Japanese camp, such as those who were evacuated in 1942 or those who sheltered in Red Cross and Church homes, have been paid, which has inflated the number of claims and is delaying the process even further?

In discussing the need to act with haste, does the Minister accept that the announcement on 7 November 2000 was the culmination of cross-party efforts in support of the campaign for compensation to be paid, which was waged by veterans and civilian detainees for many a long year? What is it about the issue that makes it such a poisoned chalice for Ministers who are compassionate and considerate in all their other actions? Why is it such a struggle to get the compensation for people who were in the camps?

Does the Minister accept that what has happened has been a dishonouring of the people who, in this 60th anniversary year of the ending of the war, most deserve our consideration and respect? Has he ever read, as I did as a youngster, the tales of what happened to those people? Many of us read the accounts in "The Naked Island" by Russell Braddon and "The Knights of the Bushido" by Lord Russell of Liverpool when we were, frankly, far too young to read of such horrors.

Does the Minister accept that this process, this ordeal, this revisiting time and again of issues that should be settled on an ex gratia payment, has gone on far too long, and will he now use his best efforts to bring it to an end once and for all?

Mr. Touhig: I would have liked nothing better than to come here today and say that the whole matter is resolved and that we have found a solution that everybody will cheer to the rafters, but that is not the position. We have to get it right. We have not succeeded in getting it right in the past. That was not because of any bad intention. When the scheme was announced, Members on both sides of the House welcomed it as a positive and proper recognition of the suffering that these people had gone through.

I take the hon. Gentleman's point about the stories that he read. I did not read them, but I have friends who went through that time and have told me, difficult as it was for them, about the horrors that they endured.

I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman, for whom I have a great deal of respect, would be doing anything different in my position. We have to ensure that we get it right this time. In the past, too many people were led to believe that they qualify under the scheme although they do not. The scheme was intended for those British civilian internees who had a close link to the United Kingdom at the time and for whom the UK might therefore be regarded as being responsible. At the time of world war two, all those born in the British empire were British nationals. Most far east prisoners of war and civilian internees who did not have a close link to the UK are now citizens of countries that have been given their independence. It is right that those countries, which have also benefited from the defeat of Japan, should have responsibility for the enduring problems that people have had to suffer as a result of being interned in the war.

I have issued an apology and we have offered a £500 payment to those people who thought that they qualified under the scheme but do not. To give the hon. Gentleman and the House the facts, three quarters of the letters that I have signed—I am signing personal letters—are to people who do not live and have never lived in the United Kingdom. I fully understand that that in no way diminishes the suffering that they went through at the time. Nevertheless, it is my clear understanding that, when we agreed the scheme, it was intended to benefit those who had the closest possible links with the United Kingdom.

I cannot say at this stage whether there will be a need to review the scheme, but we will do so if necessary. I cannot say, in answer to the questions that I am sure will come both sides of the House, whether we can widen the criteria. We have to get it right first. If there is a need for change, we will make it. We are not shutting our eyes to that. We recognise that we have a duty and a responsibility to our people and we will certainly respond in the best possible way.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): I thank the Minister for advance notice of his statement and for his gracious apology. I commend the Government for introducing the scheme five years ago, but does he accept that the wait that many people have had since then is longer than the period for which they were prisoners of war in the captivity of the imperial Japanese army?

Is the Minister aware of any occasion on which the imperial Japanese army inquired into the status of those whom they were incarcerating? Can he confirm that the imperial Japanese army regarded those who served under the British flag or who looked to the British flag for protection as being British? Where has it all gone wrong in the past five years? Does he agree that the simple test is that, if the Japanese believed that those people were British, and if they felt that they were British at the time and feel that they are British now, why cannot they have the compensation?

Mr. Touhig: I appreciate that it has taken a long time to bring the scheme to fruition, but that does not detract from the fact that 25,000 claimants out of 29,000 applicants have already been paid, and have received £10,000 each. That is right and proper. There has been progress.

I understand the problem of delay. Colleagues may know that I have been involved in another matter that was delayed—miners' compensation. The problem went on for much longer than that with the scheme that we are considering. We all know about the pain and suffering of those who had to endure difficult working conditions and difficult conditions through being prisoners of war. In all the cases with which I have dealt, whether miners' compensation cases or applications for the scheme that we are discussing, the people involved do not talk about the money but about recognition of the suffering that they endured at a difficult time. We are trying to tackle that.

I take the hon. Gentleman's point about those who were interned by the Japanese because they were considered British or served the British interest. That is generally accepted. However, I hope that he acknowledges that I cannot act on my own. I need the support and help of hon. Members of all parties if we are to get the matter right. I do not want another Minister to come back here in a year or so and say, "Sorry we got it wrong again", or that there is some problem with the scheme because we did it too quickly. All parties desired the introduction of the payment. We did that with the best intentions and as speedily as we could. It is already clear from the review that the criteria were not properly defined and refined and that people were led to believe that they would be compensated. Many thousands of members of the Indian army applied under the scheme because they believed at that time that they were British citizens and they served the British empire.

There is a host of questions to ask if the scheme is to be extended. I acknowledge that hopes will be raised and I do not want to raise them unduly. Let us complete the review. If there is a need to change the criteria, we will examine that.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): The only disappointment in my hon. Friend's statement is that Ministers often do not apologise, yet he has come to the House and apologised when he should not have done so. He should stick his chest out and be proud that the Government introduced the scheme. Even if it is not absolutely correct, it came 60 years late and was not introduced by previous Labour or Tory Governments. He should not apologise but be proud of the scheme of which he has stewardship. I am proud, as a Labour Member, of voting for it.

I want to ask about those people who live in what is now the Irish Republic. Many would have been born before 1922, while others might not have been but served in the British Army—not the Canadian, Australian or Indian but the United Kingdom armed forces—and every single one was a volunteer. My hon. Friend's predecessor overlooked that but rectified the matter for the heroes return scheme. Will my hon. Friend give an undertaking to discuss with the United Kingdom ambassador in Dublin how we can reach those in the Irish Republic who are eligible?

Mr. Touhig: I cannot say that I will discuss the matter with the ambassador, although I see him from time to time. However, let us complete the review into how we did not apply consistent criteria throughout. When that is done, I hope that we will be in a position to ascertain whether there is ground to change the scheme. At that time, I shall ensure that Hansard is at hand and that the question that my hon. Friend raised—I am sure that I will get questions and letters from him in the meantime—is part of our consideration.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): The House bears a burden of shame for the fact that successive Governments for so long short-changed people who should have been compensated. That is not a party political statement because it was true under successive Governments. I am grateful to the Minister for coming to the House, offering an apology and offering to try to resolve the problems once and for all.

The Minister said that the number was diminishing. Any settlement will be too late for my constituent, Maurice Ezekiel, who died in Israel earlier this year. He has many friends who also live in Israel who feel strongly that they were British enough to hold a British passport, British enough to serve their country overseas and British enough to be detained, interned and tortured by the Japanese and are bitter that they—and now Maurice Ezekiel's widow—were not British enough to be compensated. I know that the Minister wants to resolve the problem honourably and amicably and I hope that he will take to those who are considering the matter that message from somebody for whom compensation is too late.

Mr. Touhig: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is not alone in knowing examples of people who are no longer here to receive the recognition that they believed they deserved, and that the country believes that they deserved, whichever way the scheme is finally resolved. I will certainly take on board his point. This is a difficult and emotive issue. It is a cross-party matter, although I take the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) about the Government's decision to take this action, and I am proud that we have done so.

We made it clear from the beginning that, as a country, we believe that there is a responsibility on us all to respond to the suffering that people went through at that difficult time. We have sought to introduce criteria that we believe underpin the closeness of their links to the United Kingdom. That is under challenge as a result of court cases, but we hope that the matter will be resolved early in the new year. If there are grounds to review the scheme, we will review the scheme. We are not closing our eyes or shutting the door to the idea of reviewing it, but I do not want to raise any false hopes that I will not come back and tell the House that there are no grounds for a review. If there are no such grounds, I shall come to the House and tell hon. Members that, but I ask for time and patience to get this right.

Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that the people who were interned in such difficult circumstances were distressed when the rules were changed and that the £500 that was offered as a solution to that distress was itself a cause of further distress? When he considers the possibility of a review, will he seek not to over-involve himself in the minutiae of the differences between one scheme and another? I hope that he will try to arrive at a generous and equitable scheme that will provide people such as my constituent, Peter Hall, with a sense that the debt of honour that they feel has been owed to them for a long time is at last going to be satisfied.

Mr. Touhig: We received a critical report from the ombudsman into the way in which we had operated the scheme. The ombudsman said that the Government should offer an apology to the people who believed that they would be compensated under the scheme but were not, and that we should make that a tangible apology. I have issued written and verbal apologies, and we are introducing a scheme whereby those who did not qualify for compensation will receive the sum of £500. We believe that that was an appropriate amount in the circumstances that prevailed. I want that payment to continue, because, as I said in my statement, it might bring closure for some people, although I have no doubt that it will not do so for others. These people are getting older and it is important that they see some recognition at the earliest opportunity, so I intend to continue with the apologies and with the payments of £500, because I think that that is appropriate. When we have completed the review into how we got into the situation whereby we used different criteria throughout the scheme, we can decide whether there are grounds to change it. At that stage, I will review the whole matter of further compensation.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Is the Minister aware that many thousands of Royal Norfolks were captured in Singapore when the garrison there capitulated? Many were imprisoned in the most appalling circumstances, and many worked and died on the River Kwai railway crossing. There is a large Far East Prisoners of War—FEPOW—group in Norfolk, and its members feel very strongly about these issues. Obviously, the scheme was a start, but does the Minister agree that, until the Japanese Government start to contribute to the financial arrangements, there will never be enough money available? Why should not the Japanese Government honour their moral obligations? What discussions have Ministers had with them?

Mr. Touhig: The House and the hon. Gentleman will be aware that such prisoners of war have generally been covered by the compensation of this scheme, and their cases are not, in the main, in dispute. There is an issue in relation to civilian internees, however, which we have yet to resolve. On the decision of the Japanese not to contribute, the issue has been exhausted over a number of years by all Governments who have sought to obtain compensation from the Japanese. In the 1950s, the asset scheme was introduced, under which, as a result of the defeat of Japan, we acquired a number of its assets, which we disposed of to fund a small scheme of compensation. In truth, I do not believe that the Japanese will be persuaded to do anything more at this time. As things stand, we believe that it is our responsibility as a Government to deal with this matter and that is why we introduced the scheme in the first place.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I sympathise with my hon. Friend and thank him for his statement. I do not doubt his good faith in this matter, but he has inherited a situation not of his making that is a mess and that is unacceptable to many hon. Members and particularly to members of the Public Administration Committee, to which I belong, and which questioned him a short time ago. There is a defined group of people who feel outraged that they were to be described as somehow second-class British citizens and were not to be treated the same as those who suffered exactly as they did who were British citizens at the time. When I saw his statement listed today, my hopes rose that we would get a final resolution of the problem. Obviously, that has not happened. I urge him to come forward with the positive answer that we want, as urged strongly at the Public Administration Committee meeting only a few days ago.

Over Christmas, my constituent, Dr. Mark Erooga, will be waiting for the Minister's statement. He was a doctor in a military hospital in Hong Kong before the war, treating British servicemen and was interned. He was then let out and came to Britain, where he spent the whole of his working life in the national health service. He is now retired and lives in my constituency, and he resents not so much the £10,000 but that, in some way, his citizenship is being said to be not quite as sound as others'. That is the point that my hon. Friend should address. I hope that he will come forward with the positive answer that we want in the new year.

Mr. Touhig: I hope that my hon. Friend and Members on both sides of the House will accept that there has been no suggestion by the Government that anyone who does not qualify under the scheme is somehow not truly British or a second-class British citizen. We have never said that and have never sought to imply that. I fully understand, as I talked to Professor Hayward after I appeared before the PAC, that that is the feeling that he has got from the way in which this issue has unfolded.

I will take on board my hon. Friend's remarks and I am still trying to urge the House not to think that I can come out with a scheme that everybody will be happy with or cheer at the end of the day. In truth, we might decide that there are no grounds to change the scheme—I have to be honest about that—but I must consider the issue when the report is completed on how we got into the difficulty of having two sets of criteria when we thought that we only had one. When the impact of that report on the operation of the scheme is resolved, I can judge whether any changes are needed in the scheme. I will then return to the House to make a further statement.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Will the Minister tell the House what the administrative costs of the scheme have been since its implementation and how much these extra complications are likely to add to its overall budget?

Mr. Touhig: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman precise figures. Such schemes, of course, never come without a cost. I note his question and will write to him.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): The scheme was inspired by a sense of justice and magnanimity to put right this ancient wrong. It has been carried out by the Ministry of Defence with mulish obstinacy and pettifogging bureaucracy. Why on earth did it not fully accept the ombudsman's report? It is only the third time in 30 years that the ombudsman has published such a report under section 10(3) of the rules. Instead of accepting it in full, the MOD tried to restrict the powers of the ombudsman and challenge those.

Why has the Minister not mentioned the statement made by Mr. Burnham, the acting chief executive of the War Pensions Agency, who said:

"we are . . . firmly of the belief that the evidence of individual cases suggests that the present stance will be impossible to defend on grounds of fairness and logic. It does not seem that rejection of these cases will be in keeping with the original intent and spirit of the scheme"?

That timely warning was made not in 2005 but on 10 April 2001.

Mr. Touhig: When I have the answer to that last question, I will share it with my hon. Friend, but I do not have it now. He may think that the MOD has been mulish, but, on the contrary, it is because of a desire to get the compensation scheme up and running as quickly as possible that we introduced it without clearly defining the criteria according to which people would be eligible. There was a wish to compensate people in the speediest possible way.

We did not accept the ombudsman's report at the time because—as my hon. Friend knows, because I gave evidence to his Committee—we did not believe that the ombudsman's assertions in the report were correct. Since then, my doubts about the operation of the scheme have been confirmed. That is why I am instituting an investigation and asking the permanent secretary to recommend an appropriate person to conduct it. I talked to the ombudsman after the hearing of the Committee of which my hon. Friend is a member, and I talked to her this morning, so she is fully apprised of what I am doing, and I hope that she will be fully supportive. She, I and everyone else want to get to the bottom of the matter and ensure that the scheme is resolved, and that is what I am determined to do.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): Of the outstanding claims, about 700 are for civilians who were in the camps. I do not think that the Minister dealt adequately with the question from my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis), who asked whether those specific claims would be a priority for the MOD.

Mr. Touhig: If there are grounds for the scheme to be changed, obviously priorities will enter into the process. On the basis of my experience in dealing with the miners' compensation scheme, I think that priority should be given to the oldest, the most infirm and so on, so that they can gain some recognition.

I shall consider the point made by the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis), and if we review the scheme we may decide that it should be taken on board. I shall want to get the priorities right, and it may well form part of my considerations.

Orders of the Day

Armed Forces Bill

[Relevant documents: The First Report from the Defence Committee, Session 2005-06 (HC 747) on the Armed Forces Bill and the Second Report of the Constitutional Affairs Committee, Session 2005-06 (HC 731) on the Office of the Judge Advocate General.]

Order for Second Reading read.

4.52 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill results from a comprehensive review of service law, the first comprehensive review since, I believe, the 1950s—about half a century.

I served on the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill in both 1991 and 1996, so long ago that there was a Conservative Government—[Interruption.] At that time, they were the future. We identified the need for a comprehensive review of the Service Discipline Acts, but nothing happened. In the 1998 strategic defence review, over which I had the pleasure of presiding under the tutelage of the then Secretary of State, George Robertson—now Lord Robertson—the Government recognised that a single system of service law would better serve today's armed forces, which increasingly train and operate together on both the practical and the theoretical sides of combat and warfare, and in many other tasks. I believe that the Bill will deliver just that. It represents four years' work, at the centre of which have been the armed forces themselves. I commend the work that has been done since his appointment by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, who has had to master the detail of a four-year summary of half a century of consideration of laws, some of which date back to centuries ago. It is a Bill that has at its centre the armed forces themselves. In that sense, it is a Bill for the armed forces and it has their full support, primarily because it meets their needs in a way that has been absent for decades.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): As my right hon. Friend will be aware, a statement was made on Friday about the decision not to prosecute the soldiers involved in the fake pictures that appeared in the Daily Mirror, which put at risk the lives of all armed forces personnel serving around the world. How does that fit with the changes in the Bill? The Crown Prosecution Service said that there was no case to answer, although we know that people abused their positions and used Army equipment to stage faked photographs that put so many lives at risk? Lives will continue to be at risk, as no one is going to have to face a court for what they did.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. That sounds suspiciously like a failed urgent question to me. The hon. Gentleman should make briefer interventions.

John Reid: I shall have to give a briefer answer than is merited by the seriousness of the question. Prosecutions taken under military law by the armed forces prosecution services or investigations conducted by the special investigations branch are independent of Defence Ministers and the chain of command. That applies even more, if it were possible, to the Crown Prosecution Service. Decisions on whether to prosecute a case or not to proceed with it are quite properly taken independently of any responsibility, authority or power of Defence Ministers. It is therefore not possible for me to comment in practical terms on the reasoning behind the decision that my hon. Friend mentions and it would be quite improper for me to comment on it in judicial terms. I hope that my reluctance to answer does not in any way suggest to my hon. Friend that I underestimate the seriousness of the issue that he raises.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): Before the intervention of the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle), the Secretary of State was saying that the armed forces support the Bill. Whatever the service boards may say, does he not recognise the dismay of many in the chain of command, particularly in the middle ranks, at the fact that for serious non-summary offences, commanding officers are to be taken out of the loop? They are the very people who most understand the pressures that their men face, yet they are to be taken completely out of the decision on whether to prosecute.

John Reid: I shall return to the specific point that the hon. Gentleman makes, but I ask him to accept that—however gallant, committed and sympathetic to the armed forces either he or, indeed, the officers with whom he may have discourse from time to time may be—the chain of command has to be preserved. Incidentally, that is one of the main purposes of the Bill—to protect the military service system.

The chain of command is represented by the chiefs of staff and those immediately under them, and when I say that the armed forces support the Bill, I mean it. They do: they operate their support through the chain of command, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman did not mean to impute that the case was anything other than as I described it. I am sure that he did not mean to question the truth of my statement about the representations that were made to me by the chiefs of staff and those who work with them or that the armed forces do not fully support what they said. I will turn my attention to the point that the hon. Gentleman raised, as I acknowledge that it is an important one and I agree with him about its seriousness and import.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): Conservative Members are concerned about the challenge to the absolute authority of commanding officers. That is what affects discipline and morale and there is real concern that such authority is being challenged.

John Reid: I will attempt to explain as I go through my opening speech that the measures that have been taken are intended specifically to protect the system of military justice, which is self-sufficient and separate from civilian justice. In a democracy, there is sometimes the mistaken belief that military justice has to be exactly the same as that in civilian society. That is not the case, but wherever possible it is right—and, indeed, self-protecting—to ensure that the military system of justice approximates to the norms of civilian society, so far as is commensurate with operational effectiveness. The more that it does so, the more that we will protect the existence of the separate military system on which all of us in this House place importance.

I hope that, as I go through my speech, the hon. Members for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood) and for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) will see exactly why we are proffering these suggestions and proposals. Among other things, we want to avoid a repeat of the circumstances that led to the Trooper Williams case being dismissed before the trial finished and it being tried outside, in a civilian court. The intention is to prevent a recurrence of that situation, as I hope the hon. Gentlemen will see as I go through the argument.

Given the comments that have already been made, I should point out that, like every person participating in this debate, I am immensely proud of the British armed forces. I am second to none in my admiration of them, and the whole House will share such admiration. We owe them our respect and gratitude, but we also owe them an effective system of military justice because they deserve it. I will shortly set out some of the Bill's key provisions, but given the issues raised and the suggestions made in interventions—indeed, some of them have also been made in the press—let me deal directly and head-on with what the Bill is not about and lay some myths to rest.

This Bill is not about political correctness—one of the few offences, gladly, with which I have never been charged up to this point. It is not about creating a civilian system and, fundamentally, it is not about undermining the role of the commanding officer. It is about protecting and modernising our justice system and its relationship with the chain of command.

No one, least of all those in the services, thinks that service personnel should be above the law; indeed, it is central to the degree of respect with which our forces are regarded throughout the world that they operate within the law. But plenty of nonsense has been written and spoken about police investigations and the risk of prosecutions in respect of operations. There seems to be the almost muddle-headed notion in some quarters that service personnel are reluctant to open fire because they fear that they will be prosecuted if they kill or seriously injure someone. That notion is utterly wrong and potentially dangerous.

We train our forces to operate effectively and within the law that we lay down.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

John Reid: I will give way in a second.

We have robust rules of engagement and if our people use lethal force in conflict, of course it will not automatically result in a police investigation, still less a criminal prosecution. Equally, where there is a credible allegation or suspicion of a serious offence, there will be an investigation, almost certainly by the service police—not civilian police but service police—but an investigation does not mean that a prosecution will follow. Therefore, the maintenance of standards and the investigation of credible allegations—carried out by independent investigation and independent prosecuting authorities, both of which exist within the military system—are a necessary part of maintaining the standards for which we are so proud of our armed forces.

This is not a case of one side arguing that no standards should be maintained and no allegations, however serious, investigated, and the other side saying that every allegation should be investigated—or even that every credible allegation should be investigated, leading to a prosecution. If someone wants evidence of that fact they need only look at the example of our latest theatre of operations, in Iraq. From memory, I think that some 80,000 soldiers and other servicemen and women have gone through Iraq in the various deployments, and among those some 183 cases have been investigated as involving allegations above the threshold of credibility. Of those cases, 20-odd have been pursued, and some five, I think, have come to trial. That is a commendation not only of the probity with which we conduct such matters, but of the high standards maintained by the British armed forces, even in the most difficult circumstances.

I understand how much more difficult that is now, in what we call an asymmetrical battlefield. Those standards were difficult enough to maintain when the enemy whom we were fighting had some respect for international conventions such as the Geneva convention, for the norms of warfare that civilised countries have adopted, and for the moral conventions and constraints on action, especially action against innocent civilians. How much more difficult it is for our servicemen and women to maintain them when the enemy does not respect those conventions, or feel constrained by any degree of morality. I understand that, and I hope that everyone in the House, and all those who write commentaries outside, do too—but it is not a reason for abandoning the standards, the probity and the discipline of British forces, which have made them famous. Even in such circumstances, we will maintain those standards as well as we have always done.

Several hon. Members rose—

John Reid: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), because he indicated that he wanted to intervene some time ago, but was courteous enough to let me finish my point.

Mr. Howarth: I am grateful to the Secretary of State, and I am sure that everybody appreciates the assurances with which he is trying to soothe our concerns. However, he has been visiting our forces all around the world, and I have visited a number of them, both in my own constituency and elsewhere. Surely troops have mentioned to him that there is now a real fear that there is a possibility of men being second-guessed in the most difficult circumstances that they can face—or has he come away with the impression that there are no genuine concerns out there?

John Reid: Those issues have been raised with me, but I must tell the hon. Gentleman honestly that they have been raised mainly by soldiers asking me about press reports in which commentators, many of whom have never been near a battlefield, or even gone two rounds with a revolving door, far less been involved in combat, have pompously sounded off on that subject—although I am not, of course, saying that the Opposition Members here today are in that position. Such commentators accuse chiefs of staff with impeccable courageous credentials of being other than courageous. Of course those reports are read by soldiers and other servicemen and women, and of course I regret that.

Incidentally, I have also seen that when the picture is painted here of the battlefield in places such as Iraq, and of the consequences and the outcomes of what our servicemen and women are struggling for, it is an unbalanced picture. This morning the BBC said that the fact that 69 per cent. of people in Iraq were looking forward to a better future appeared to suggest that some of the reporting and descriptions of what was going on there had been wide of the mark. I notice that the BBC did not add to the words "reporting and descriptions" the words "by the BBC".

Of course I regret the comments that have been mentioned, and of course they are important; I do not blame hon. Gentlemen for raising them. However, the intention of the Bill is to strengthen and protect our military justice system by modernising and rendering it more effective in difficult circumstances, in relation to the chain of command. The intention is not to hand it over to civilian judgment. Indeed, the case of Trooper Williams, which I cited and which has caused concern in both Houses of Parliament and outside, would be far less likely to occur after these changes.

Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): With regard to certain serious offences committed within the United Kingdom—for instance, manslaughter—the civilian authorities have primacy in investigation and exclusive jurisdiction over prosecution and trial in civilian courts. Will the Bill change that?

John Reid: No, it will make no difference. It is possible at the moment for manslaughter to be laid as a charge under military law, and that will not change.

Legitimate concern is different from some of the over-dramatised reports that we read about the very few trials arising from operations in Iraq. We have not had wholesale investigations leading to wholesale prosecutions. As I said earlier, Defence Ministers have no power over, authority in, responsibility for or even oversight of the laying of charges or the prosecution of cases. Those are matters for the independent service prosecuting authorities, which decide whether a prosecution is warranted in any case referred to them. Hon. Members can form their own opinions about whether we share some of the same frustrations that people who are not in government feel as we regard certain developments, but it is proper—in a civilised, democratic society—for there be a separation between the ministerial code for running the armed forces, in conjunction with the chain of command, and the investigatory and prosecution authorities, which are naturally and properly independent. That is one of the factors that separate a democracy from a dictatorship.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): My right hon. Friend mentions the proper independence of the armed forces investigatory authorities. Will he re-examine the recommendation from the Defence Committee to introduce a system of independent oversight of investigations by the armed forces, because many families—and not only the Deepcut families, but those from other barracks—are concerned about the way in which the investigations were undertaken?

John Reid: In the case of Deepcut, we have appointed an independent inquiry and investigation, headed by the well known and well qualified QC, Nicholas Blake. In general, we have given serious consideration to the idea of an external, independent—by which, I take it, my hon. Friend means mostly civilian—complaints tribunal. I do not believe that that is appropriate, but I will have something to say about an independent element for the complaints procedure, which will go some way towards meeting the requests of the Defence Committee.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD) rose—

John Reid: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, but then I must make some headway.

Lembit Öpik: My question relates directly to Deepcut. The Bill is the perfect opportunity to try to ensure that the legion errors made in investigating the still mysterious deaths of four young recruits at Deepcut barracks between 1995 and 2002 cannot happen again. I would have expected the Government to ensure that the concerns of parents and relatives and concern for the truth had been considered in phrasing the Bill. Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that there has been enormous resistance to sharing information about the deaths at Deepcut army barracks, and will he outline how the Bill might help to ensure that parents such as Des and Doreen James will never have to face a decade of uncertainty about what happened to their children while they were being trained for Army service?

John Reid: Yes, of course I understand the deep trauma and the tragedy and difficulties faced by parents and loved ones in this case. During the passage of the Bill we will try to introduce a degree of independent element to the complaints procedure. In respect of the insistence on an independent inquiry, without prejudicing anything that may come from the Blake inquiry into Deepcut, it is as well to remember that in the case of Deepcut, with all the difficulties we faced, the investigations were not carried out only by the armed forces. There was an independent element, from first one police force and then a second police force, and now there is a further independent element—a QC. Whatever systems and structures we set up, they cannot inevitably guarantee that such tragedies will have an explanation that is readily identifiable and readily acceptable to everyone. I know that not only from Deepcut, but, as the hon. Gentleman will know, from long experience in Northern Ireland. I fully and genuinely understand the deep feelings of the families involved and the terrible frustration and trauma, added to the tragedy of the loss of life, of searching for the unknown. I am aware of how difficult that is, but we have to await the outcome of the inquiry.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP) rose—

John Reid: I will take one more question, but then I shall go for a long time without interventions.

Pete Wishart: I thank the Secretary of State for giving way again on this important issue. Will he describe in a little more detail what he means by independence in relation to the complaints commission? There is an expectation among not only the families but the general public that there should be the fullest possible public scrutiny of public bodies, so does the Secretary of State accept that the best way to resolve the issue would be through an independent military ombudsman? The public would then be satisfied that the complaints are dealt with properly.

John Reid: If the hon. Gentleman can indulge me by letting me get beyond page two of my speech I might reach some of the points that are being raised.

I return to the point about the independent service prosecuting authorities who decide whether a prosecution is warranted in any case referred to them. They use the standard evidential test, based on a realistic prospect of a conviction, and the public interest test before they proceed. Another misconception is that military cases may arbitrarily be handed to civilian jurisdiction. That is not true, and I am sorry that the hon. and gallant Member for Canterbury, who raised that issue earlier, is no longer in the Chamber, as it sounded as though he believed it.

In relation to offences committed in the United Kingdom over which both our civilian and service courts have jurisdiction, protocols between the service and civilian police forces apply at the start of investigations. There are also a few offences for which our civilian courts have jurisdiction when the offence is committed by UK citizens abroad—a point to which reference was made earlier. The Attorney-General made it clear in another place that in exceptional cases he has a role in deciding between prosecuting authorities with overlapping jurisdictions, but in no case—no case—has he exercised that role without the agreement of the relevant service prosecuting authority. Therefore, the apparently widespread myth that the Attorney-General or anyone else would intervene contrary to the views of the service authorities, or without consultation or agreement with them, to allocate a case to the civilian authorities is just not true.

Let us be perfectly clear that the Government are committed to retaining a separate system of service law. In our view, and in my view, that is essential to underpin operational effectiveness. The integrity of the system is essential if we are to retain the confidence of those who are subject to it, as well as those who are not. That involves professional and independent investigations into alleged serious offences and decisions on whether to prosecute being taken by an independent prosecutor with an understanding of the service context—the one that I was speaking about earlier—but, moreover, there must be proper safeguards and support for those who face investigation and prosecution in the military system.

Against that background on the major questions, let me turn now to the Bill itself, which is primarily about service discipline. It establishes for the very first time a modern, single system of service law. It defines offences, provides for the investigation of alleged offences and the arrest, holding in custody and charging of individuals accused of committing an offence. It makes provision for service personnel to be dealt with summarily by their commanding officer or tried by courts martial. It will retain the right of service personnel to elect trial by court martial and to appeal to the summary appeal court or the courts-martial appeal court as appropriate. That is all familiar. It is not revolution; it is, if anything, evolution.

The most significant change in the Bill is that there will be one system, not three. In future, under the Bill, armed forces personnel of whatever service will be subject to the same system wherever in the world they are serving and in whatever unit or formation. That will enable the proper alignment of discipline and command, and it will do so across all three services, instead of relying on ad hoc arrangements for joint operations, as we must do at present. Moreover, all service personnel will be subject to the same rights, powers and duties when they are charged with an offence. That is not only clearer but fairer to all those who serve in the armed forces.

Mr. Alan Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): Will the Secretary of State give way?

John Reid: Let me make a little progress, and then I will allow some more colleagues to intervene.

I want to say a word or two about the offences under part 1. All offences under the Bill are service offences. They are divided into two types. First, as now, service personnel will remain subject to the ordinary criminal law of England and Wales wherever they are serving. Secondly, the disciplinary offences that are unique to service law—many of which will be familiar, such as going absent without leave or looting—have been reviewed and brought up to date. We have removed certain offences because they are no longer appropriate or no one is ever charged with them, or because they are more properly charged under other provisions or dealt with administratively. It is not just the offence of scandalous conduct of officers that has gone. Other examples include "allowing sequestration of aircraft or ship by a neutral state in time of war" and billeting and requisitioning offences.

I want to say something now about the role of the commanding officer, which has featured in many interventions, before giving way to hon. Members. In our armed forces, commanding officers are responsible for the discipline of those under their command. A large part of the exercise of that discipline is done by example and leadership. Their authority is critical to the delivery of unit cohesion and operational effectiveness. As I said, that authority is primarily exhibited through their qualities of leadership and by inspiring the confidence, loyalty and trust of those who serve under them. Those qualities have long distinguished the British armed forces from many others throughout the world.

Ultimately, commanding officers must have the power to enforce discipline throughout the military criminal justice system. The Bill provides commanding officers for the first time with harmonised powers to deal with all people under the command of whatever service. To create such harmonised powers, we are reducing the theoretical extensive summary jurisdiction of commanding officers in the Royal Navy. I use the word "theoretical" because in reality those commanding officers do not exercise their powers over very serious matters, not least because their powers of punishment are far too limited. That might address points that hon. Members raised earlier. We are, however, increasing the powers of Army and Air Force commanding officers to deal with the small number of additional criminal offences that are set out in part 2 of schedule 1 with which, in straightforward cases, Navy commanding officers already deal summarily. There is thus some diminution of powers for the Navy, but a big increase within the armed forces.

The summary powers of commanding officers recognise the importance of not only giving authority to COs but being able to deal with such matters expeditiously. As part of that recognition, we are also harmonising the powers of commanding officers to deal summarily with officers up to the rank of lieutenant-colonel and equivalent, subject to certain conditions.

Part 5 of the Bill sets out the duties of commanding officers in respect of allegations that a serious offence has been committed. Clause 113 provides that a commanding officer will be required to inform the service police as soon as practicable in the event of an allegation of a specified inherently serious offence, or an offence for which certain prescribed circumstances apply. The service police, who may already be investigating the matter, are in turn required to refer the case to the independent director of service prosecutions if they think there is sufficient evidence to charge a person with one of the inherently serious offences. It is the director of service prosecutions who will decide whether to bring charges on the basis of proper tests and a real understanding of the military context. That is the kernel of the relationship among the commanding officer, the investigating officers and the director of service prosecutions.

I stress that the offences that we are talking about are those that are inherently serious; they are ones of which there cannot be a minor example. They include civilian criminal offences such as murder and rape, other serious sexual offences, robbery, terrorism offences and so on. They also include some disciplinary offences that I am sure the whole House would agree are inherently serious, such as assisting the enemy and mutiny. The maximum sentence for those disciplinary offences is life imprisonment.

I want to explain why we are making the changes, so that hon. Members can perhaps understand the way in which they are meant to protect the integrity and independence of the military system. At present, if a person is charged, the commanding officer has the power to dismiss a charge—whether the offence is serious, such as those that I have mentioned, or not—without any form of hearing or evidence. Under existing law the result of such action means that even in extremely serious matters, such as those that I have just mentioned, dismissal excludes any further proceedings in the military system. Thus, the evidence is never heard and no decision in the case is ever taken by any independent service prosecuting authority. The case is dismissed by a commanding officer, no matter how serious, without any hearing, as I have said. That is theoretically possible. It has happened in practice. The case cannot then be tried at any other stage, whatever the misgivings, whatever the feelings thereafter or whatever the decision in the military system.

That, however, is not necessarily the end of the matter. Where civilian courts also have jurisdiction, civilian authorities may take action. The jurisdiction of the civilian courts may come into play as a result of the services being prevented from taking any further action on the matter even if there is afterthought through just such a technicality. That is what I wanted to address and we wanted to address. It is the problem that gave rise to so much dissatisfaction over one particular case.

The Bill will ensure that the director of service prosecutions will decide on serious cases, and that on serious cases a commanding officer's action cannot prevent further action by the services themselves. Some people have attacked the proposal as interfering with hallowed historical powers of commanding officers. It is simply wrong, however, that commanding officers alone must be able to decide whether to charge those under their command with serious offences such as rape or murder, and to do so without any hearing, or to dismiss a charge that has been brought without any form of hearing.

Even if that were not wrong, which I believe it is, it gives rise to allocation afterwards to the civilian courts as the matter is prevented from any further consideration under the military system. I do not think that commanding officers should be placed in that position and have that responsibility placed on them for such offences—and nor do they. As long as they have such responsibility, the services will be open to recourse to civilian law as in the Trooper Williams case, which gave rise to so much antagonism and unease throughout the House, the other place and outside.

I have explained to the House that we have taken these steps to prevent something of the sort from happening again.

Mr. Beith: The Secretary of State has explained well why he has brought the Bill to this point, and I accept his reason. However, does he recognise, as the Constitutional Affairs Committee report indicates, that a problem has arisen? It is that a soldier could be tried for a murder that is alleged to have been committed in the United Kingdom, and convicted by three votes to two. That would not have happened to him if he had gone to the civilian court.

John Reid: I have not given that serious consideration. I understand that that issue has only recently arisen in the light of the report. The matter will certainly be given serious consideration in the course of our deliberations. One of the great strengths of the manner of investigating as well as debating the Bill is the hybrid nature of the Committee, which compensates for the length of time that is often taken. I am sure that that question will be considered during the course of our deliberations.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring) (Con): It is worth pointing out that a court martial already has the ability to deal with charges such as murder on a 5:2 verdict if they occur overseas, so the position is not entirely inconsistent. Now that there is to be concomitant civil and military jurisdictions, and following further discussions between the Secretary of State and the Attorney-General, where exactly will the priority lie, when there is a choice, in deciding whether a case should be heard by a court martial or a Crown court?

John Reid: That is not a new problem. Joint jurisdiction already operates in such cases. In response to my inquiries, I can tell the House that cases that could be tried under military law have not be allocated to the civilian law courts without the agreement of the service authorities.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I appreciate the Secretary of State's intention in introducing the Bill, but is there not a danger in complicated cases such as those following incidents in Northern Ireland? In retrospect, Her Majesty's armed forces who were engaged in ambushes on terrorists fleeing the scene could be prosecuted more easily for murder, although they were following the rules of engagement laid down by their commanding officer.

John Reid: I do not think that the situation has changed. Indeed, we want to try to make sure that there is not a blockage with summary dismissal in the military system that prevents it from being considered at any other stage and therefore compels such cases to go to the civilian system. We want to remove that blockage to ensure that, as far as is humanly possible, the person who looks at the evidence with a view to prosecution—the director of service prosecutions—not only considers the evidential test and the public interest but has experience of a military or combat situation. That is more important than ever, given, as I mentioned earlier, the asymmetric nature of warfare. Things that were regarded as unreasonable 20 or 30 years ago may, given the advent of suicide bombers who pretend to be prisoners and given other developments, now be considered reasonable. Actions that were considered beyond the bounds some time ago may now be considered reasonable, because of changed circumstances, not because of changes in the actions themselves. The person who is best placed to weigh the evidence of offence against mitigating circumstances is the director of service prosecutions, which is why I am trying to ensure that, as far as humanly possible, they make those decisions, independent of the chain of command, the Secretary of State and the civilian system.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab) rose—

John Reid: May I make some progress before giving way?

As long as we fail to tackle the problem, cases such as the Trooper Williams case could reoccur. I want to try to avoid that, and it is my strong belief that it can be avoided. All offences can be dealt with properly under service law. The court martial is, and will remain, a court that complies with the European convention on human rights. It is right that even the most serious cases should be resolved within the service system once proceedings have begun. As we told the Defence Committee more than a year ago in a proposal that it described as "sensible", the Bill will remove the power of commanding officers to dismiss such serious offences in the manner described, thus protecting the whole military system from gradual encroachment by the civilian system.

Mr. Prentice: Can soldiers who are charged with a serious offence such as murder opt for civilian jurisdiction rather than for court martial?

John Reid: No. They can apply for a court martial on a range of offences, but they cannot opt out in favour of the civilian system. They are members of the armed forces, and are subject to military discipline. We are trying to make sure that that military discipline and the military system itself can, as far as possible, deal with the most serious offences.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: I understand the right hon. Gentleman's desire to keep matters within the military family, so to speak. He said that as a result of the dismissal of the case of Trooper Williams by the commanding officer no further military action could be taken and the case could therefore be handled only by the civilian courts. The Secretary of State wants to interpose the military court instead of the civilian court, but that does not justify taking away from the commanding officer the power, particularly in the heat of battle and in the circumstances that we face in Iraq, to dismiss a case there and then. The right hon. Gentleman is in danger of eliding the two issues, but they are separate. Will he address that?

John Reid: In the heat of battle, the commanding officer would wish to reflect. That, I take it, is accepted. He would wish, presumably, to take advice, to consult, to have a hearing on an offence committed in the heat of battle such as murder or rape or another sexual offence. The problem is that summarily dismissing an offence of such seriousness without a hearing, which is what happens under the present system, creates a situation where, no matter who else in the military may feel that that decision was wrong, it cannot be dealt with further in the military. That is precisely the situation that arose in the case of Trooper Williams, which was the route whereby the matter was referred to the civilian court.

If we contain such serious offences within the military, so that they have to be decided by the director of public prosecutions—[Interruption.] Yes, I beg the House's pardon. If we ensure that the director of service prosecutions is the responsible body, we prevent another Trooper Williams case. Incidentally, although this was not the primary reason, the commanding officer is then freed up for the responsibility of giving suceour, support, assistance and advice to his man or woman who is accused of the crime. There is no conflict of interest then between the commanding officer's duty of care to the individual concerned and the director of service prosecutions bringing a prosecution. By taking away the summary right to dismiss cases as serious as those described, without even a hearing, we are protecting the system from the course of events that caused the civilian system to intervene.

Mr. Gerald Howarth rose—

John Reid: I will allow the hon. Gentleman to intervene, but that is the last time, or there will be complaints that I have taken too long.

Mr. Howarth: I am extremely grateful to the Secretary of State. If, in the heat of battle, the commanding officer dismisses a case—he knows the man, he knows the circumstances and he can see that there is no case to answer—and if subsequently it is perceived that that was a wrong decision which was entirely without foundation, in the present circumstances the case would have to be dealt with by the civilian courts. Why not leave it to the director of service prosecutions, on the basis of information laid by authority, to deal with the matter within the service, still leaving the commanding officer with the latitude to deal summarily with a difficult case?

John Reid: The hon. Gentleman is asking me to square a circle, which cannot be done. One cannot give absolute authority to the commanding officer summarily to dismiss a case and then say that the director of service prosecutions may overrule that authority—one cannot have both things. The ultimate arbiter on serious offences must be either within the armed forces or the commanding officer. If one chooses the commanding officer, problems arise in circumstances such as the Trooper Williams case, because there is no other place in the military where such a case can be tried by virtue of the fact that the absolute powers on summary dismissal lie with the commanding officer.

When the Trooper Williams case was referred to the Attorney-General, the Attorney-General had no recourse other than the civilian courts, and I am protecting us against that occurring again. I accept that in the real world there is no ideal solution that would give the absolute power of decision both to the director of service prosecutions and to the commanding officer. I understand that any decision will have a downside, but I contend that for the armed forces as a whole, including the chain of command, which will be free to give succour and support to an individual accused by the director of service prosecutions under the commanding officer's care of duty, the upside far outweighs the downside. In the Trooper Williams case, the downside was the furore caused by its referral outside the services.

I hope that I have spent sufficient time trying to answer that question.

Mr. Brazier: Will the Secretary of State give way?

John Reid: No. The hon. Gentleman raised the matter, but then he was not present—no doubt for very important reasons—during 20 minutes of my explanation. It is not fair to other hon. Members for him to return and ignore everything that I have said—if he had sat here, he would still have ignored me, but it would at least have given me a degree of generosity towards him, which I do not feel compelled to extend tonight.

I have made it clear that prosecutions will be independent from the chain of command and from Ministers. The investigators in the special investigation branch and the service prosecutors do a professional job, sometimes in the most demanding, difficult and dangerous circumstances—they conduct investigations in conditions in which civilian police would not operate, and they have my admiration and support. The Bill reinforces their relationship with the director of service prosecutions in a similar way to the relationship between their civilian counterparts and the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Where the commanding officer is considering what action to take on offences over which he has powers—the hon. Member for Aldershot has raised this point—legal advice will, as now, be available. Under the Bill, he may choose to deal with an offence summarily, or he may decide to refer the matter to the prosecuting authorities, because he does not want to exercise his summary powers and believes that a court martial would be more appropriate. He may discontinue proceedings, but that would not prevent further action by the services at a later stage, if it were justified.

If the commanding officer deals with the matter summarily and finds it proved, he will go on to award a punishment. Where he refers the matter to the director of service prosecutions, the director will decide whether to bring a prosecution and what the charge shall be. In all cases tried by court martial, the director of service prosecutions will determine the charge, but the commanding officer will bring it formally by notifying the individual concerned, which, as I have said, will free up and reinforce his role in implementing the CO's duty of care in ensuring that someone under his command who is subject to proceedings under service law is properly supported and advised.

I have spent so much time on that aspect of the Bill because it is central to the military criminal justice system. I want briefly to turn to other matters in the Bill that involve further changes to the current system.

Lembit Öpik rose—

John Reid: I shall give way one last time, and that is it.

Lembit Öpik: I do not want to start a major debate about Deepcut, but the Secretary of State will be aware that one of the findings in that case involved the question of mindset—the police had a questionable mindset in that they were willing to accept an explanation of suicide on relatively superficial evidence. Will the Secretary of State assure me that he intends the Bill to address the question of mindset? Will he ensure that an objective analysis is made of any accusations with regard to impropriety within, in particular, the training element of the armed forces?

John Reid: I understand the hon. Gentleman's concentrating on Deepcut and its importance. He will understand, however, that the essence of an independent review; which people constantly demand in such circumstances, is that I do not decide what I am going to do before it reports. Let us wait for that report. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will pay attention in the course of the debate to the general matters that the hon. Gentleman raises.

The Bill creates two military courts—the court martial and the summary appeal court—to replace existing courts provided for under the Service Discipline Acts. The court martial will be a standing court and replace courts martial convened on an ad-hoc basis to deal with individual trials. Like the Crown court, this standing court will be able to sit in more than one place at a time and to deal with different cases. It is not a single court in permanent session. The main advantages of a standing court are that it will be more efficient by reducing some administrative arrangements and making it easier to arrange for preliminary matters to be dealt with.

In addition, the Bill creates a service civilian court to replace the standing civilian court that was established in 1976. Like its predecessor, this court may only sit overseas. It has powers equivalent to those of a magistrates court when dealing with offences committed by those civilians who are described in the Bill as subject to service discipline. For the court martial and the service civilian court, the Bill creates a more modern and appropriate sentencing regime which primarily reflects changes introduced by the Criminal Justice Act 2003.

Importantly, we believe that improvements in speed and efficiency will come from the changes I have described. At the moment, every single case charged must first go to the commanding officer. He looks into the matter. If he thinks that it should go to court martial, he refers it to higher authority in the chain of command. In turn, higher authority refers the case to the prosecuting authority. However, in serious cases the service police will, while keeping the commanding officer informed—that is important—send the case straight to the director of service prosecutions, who will determine any charge to be brought.

Finally, I turn briefly to two other key areas in the Bill that deal with non-disciplinary matters. The first is the redress of grievance system, which some hon. Members have mentioned. Service personnel will retain a right to complain about any matter where they think themselves wronged. However, the current system takes too long and involves consideration through successive layers in the command chain. We want to improve that. We shall introduce a more streamlined system that will reduce the bureaucracy and provide for the majority of matters that cannot be resolved by the commanding officer to pass quickly to a panel outside the chain of command with powers delegated to it by the Defence Council. Moreover, we have provided in certain cases for a person who is independent of the chain of command, not a civil servant, to sit on the panel.

The second area is that of harmonised provision for service inquiries. We think it essential that the services retain the ability to hold internal investigations to establish the facts of a matter and to make recommendations to prevent a recurrence. That is what boards of inquiry, as they are currently known, are for. As now, much of the detailed procedure and powers of such inquiries will be made in subordinate legislation.

I have spent a considerable amount of time introducing the Bill because I am aware of its importance to the House and to the armed forces. The armed forces deserve nothing less than a fair and modern criminal justice system with all the appropriate safeguards. That is why, on becoming Secretary of State, I ordered a review of the support we give to those accused under service law. Those who serve their country are entitled to be sure that we will carry out the duty of care as seriously as they would wish us to. I have seen the outcome of that review. I am satisfied at present that the support that we give them is of a high order and in the tradition of the responsibility that commanding officers have to those under their command. That level of support must and will continue under a single system of service law.

I believe that the reforms in the Bill should be welcome to those who serve in today's forces. The Bill recognises the special circumstances, risks, dangers and demands that we place on service personnel. Its key purpose is to provide them with a fair, modern system of criminal justice that will underpin their operational effectiveness, of which every Member of this House is justly proud. I hope that the Bill will serve them well into the future. If it serves them as well as they serve their country, it will have been the accomplishment that we set out to achieve. I commend the Bill to the House.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring) (Con): This major new Bill will have far-reaching consequences for all members of Her Majesty's armed forces. Conservative Members will judge it against the essential criterion that it must reinforce operational effectiveness and reinforce, not undermine, military ethos.

As the Secretary of State pointed out, the Ministry of Defence has been working on the Bill for some five years. It is therefore a little regrettable that we received the explanatory notes only last Wednesday. However, as we will have the opportunity to consider the Bill in some considerable detail in a special Select Committee, taking evidence from witnesses, we shall not oppose its Second Reading, although we reserve our position as regards Third Reading. There are grounds for supporting the Bill's objectives, if not all of its detail—not least where it brings disciplinary procedures into line with operational procedures.

As the Secretary of State pointed out, it is a much-valued tradition in the House that at the outset of each defence debate, whatever the specific topic, we pay sincere and deserved tribute to the courage and professionalism of all the men and women of our armed services, in whom this country can and does take pride.

I have long had an interest in defence matters. Indeed, one of the reasons why I was drawn into politics was the campaign against the unilateralists in the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament—a battle that I look forward to rejoining in the coming months. I had the pleasure of serving for five years as a medical officer, albeit as a civilian, in the Royal Army Educational Corps tri-service centre at Beaconsfield. That gave me a useful insight into the Army medical services as well as issues relating to welfare provision for service families.

The pride in our armed forces that has already been expressed in this debate rests in part upon how officers and servicemen and women deliver military power with self-restraint and discipline. It is greatly to be regretted that there are increasing misgivings among the armed forces about the rules of engagement and the extent to which soldiers, in particular, are being held to account for their actions in extremely difficult circumstances. While we deliberate in this air-conditioned House of Commons, several thousand miles away in Iraq soldiers have to make life and death decisions—a situation made even more challenging, as the Secretary of State acknowledged, by the phenomenon of the suicide bomber. If they hesitate, they may be killed; if they are too hasty, they know that they may face a court martial.

Mr. Hoyle: What is the hon. Gentleman's view on the George Mendonca case?

Dr. Fox: I shall come to that issue later, when it is appropriate for me to do so.

Perhaps the most graphic example of the situation was described in an article in The Sunday Times on 6 November, which reported a senior Royal Army Medical Corps doctor saying that in Basra he and his colleagues had been counselling young soldiers who "feared a military investigation as much they did the insurgents".

Even more alarming is the assertion that

"There doesn't appear to be any overt consideration or understanding of the pressures that our soldiers are under. The unpopularity of the war at home and a belief that firing their rifles in virtually any circumstances is likely to see them end up in court are sapping morale."

The reality of that would undoubtedly be contested but the perception exists, and perception affects behaviour. We must take that into account in our debate.

One corporal said that troops arriving in Basra were confronted with warnings from the Royal Military Police that every incident would be investigated and that, if they shot someone, they would face an inquiry that could take up to a year. Hon. Members of all parties accept that to achieve the goal of maximum operational effectiveness, discipline must be maintained and that, therefore, an effective system of military justice must be in place. The system must support commanding officers and the rights of those serving at every level. That is a difficult balance, but it must be struck.

No hon. Member believes that members of the armed forces should be above the law. Indeed, according to the manual of military law, those in our armed forces are not only subject to the law of the land, but the disciplinary environment is maintained by supplementing the ordinary criminal law and judicial system with a special code of discipline and a special system for enforcing it.

For all our servicemen and women, it is essential that justice is done and seen to be done. That is important not only for the standing of our armed forces at home and abroad, but for their morale. Discipline must be clear, coherent, transparent, efficient and fair. Perhaps above all, there must be a clear link between discipline and command, as several of my hon. Friends have said. If the link is broken, it means that those who have to make life or death decisions on the spur of the moment may worry as much about the legal consequence of their actions as about the actions. That is potentially catastrophic for our operational capabilities. What a tragedy if our serving men and women were to become as afraid of lawyers as of insurgents.

We must always remember that the armed forces are different and need to be different. They are asked, in the name of our national security, to take lives and, at times, to give lives in a way that ordinary civilians are never required to do. The system of discipline that is applied to them and the considerations around it need to take fully into account that those involved are in potentially lethal situations. The position is unique and must be tackled as such.

Ministers have often stated that servicemen and women should reflect or be representative of British society. Although I agree that our forces should reflect the make-up of society at large, I put it to the House that the outstanding success of our armed forces derives from their adherence to a set of values which is, all too often, in short supply in society. Furthermore, when soldiers undertake operations, they operate under a different set of circumstances, which must be acknowledged by the law, and for which the wholesale adoption of civilian legal procedures is not appropriate. The Secretary of State made that point in his opening speech.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, not least because I have not been present for the whole debate, for which I apologise.

The hon. Gentleman said that servicemen and women operate in different circumstances. Today, in marked contrast to 30 or 40 years ago, those circumstances include the fact that they nearly always work alongside nationals of other countries and with armed forces of other nationalities. Sometimes, when there is a difference in perception of the disciplinary structure and systems of different nationalities, it may cause distress and further complications. How does he believe that we can reconcile that?

Dr. Fox: Far be it from me to attempt to put words into the Secretary of State's mouth, but it is difficult enough to reconcile the disciplinary position between the three services in this country without trying to reconcile it with the disciplinary procedures for other forces serving abroad. In any case, in some details, for example, in the Falklands and Iraq, our soldiers often operate by themselves and have to be subject to a British disciplinary code that is based on British law. Surely that is the correct position for British armed forces.

The correspondence between the Attorney-General and the Secretary of State's predecessor, which was discovered during a recent legal action, is extremely revealing. An article in The Observer on 27 February reported that the Attorney-General wanted to replace the Army prosecuting authority with criminal lawyers from outside the Army, an intervention about which, I am pleased to say, the former Secretary of State said that it "did indeed cause me concern".

Such a move would be a grave mistake.

Ministers need to understand that, in many parts of the services, there is a general anxiety about the increasing threat to the disciplinary traditions of the armed forces. Perhaps it was best put by the former Chief of the Defence Staff, Lord Boyce, when he spoke in a debate in the other place on 14 July. He said:

"The Armed Forces are under legal siege and are being pushed in a direction that will see such an order being deemed as improper or legally unsound. They are being pushed by people not schooled in operations but only in political correctness. They are being pushed to a time when they will fail in an operation because the commanding officer's authority and his command chain has been compromised with tortuous rules not relevant to fighting and where his instinct to be daring and innovative is being buried under the threat of liabilities and hounded out by those who have no concept of what is required to fight and win."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 July 2005; Vol. 673, c. 1236.]

There will undoubtedly be a debate on how true that perception is. However, its existence is debilitating. There is a particular anxiety about the operation of the European convention on human rights and the Human Rights Act 1998 and its impact on service law, of which we had several recent examples. The basic problem is that no set-aside was made for the military. When debating the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court, my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude), who was then shadow Foreign Secretary, called for us to do as the French had done and exercise a seven-year opt-out. He also called for a watertight opt-out, which would enable Ministers who were confident that a case was vexatious to ensure that a warrant was not executed against a member of Her Majesty's armed forces. Neither proposal was heeded.

Several cases that involve the Human Rights Act or the ICC are causing considerable anxiety, for example, that involving Colonel Mendonca and six other members of the Queen's Lancashire Regiment and the Intelligence Corps—the first brought against British personnel under the ICC. We heard today about the case of Trooper Williams. That raises suspicions in some quarters that the prosecuting authority behaved in a way more compatible with political than judicial priorities.

John Reid: I want to make a small technical, but important point. As the hon. Gentleman knows, I do not make decisions about how to prosecute. I have neither authority nor accountability for them. Nevertheless, we should be accurate. The charges have not been brought against the soldiers whom the hon. Gentleman named or referred to under the ICC. The two pre-existing charges in English law have been brought under the International Criminal Court Act 2001, which is different. The two charges, which are inhumane treatment and manslaughter, already existed. They are English law charges that have merely been incorporated in the ICC Act as the latest relevant measure under which they could be brought.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. I am sure that hon. Members are well aware of the position with regard to some cases. Some of them are under consideration and I am sure that both hon. Gentlemen appreciate that it would not do to be too precise in those matters.

Dr. Fox: Indeed, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Before you took the Chair, I was careful to say that I would answer a question that a Labour Member asked me but within the scope that I would be allowed in the Chamber.

Perhaps the clash between the legal and judicial purists and the pragmatists is at its clearest in the abolition of the reviewing authority. There, the purist interpretation of judicial function comes into conflict with the traditional way in which service discipline has been upheld. On the one hand, it could be clearly understood that involving the reviewing authority in a purely judicial process could be perceived as anomalous. Indeed, that view has been presented on several occasions—certainly, the European Court holds it.

On the other hand, the Select Committee drew attention to the fact that the reviewing process contributes to the efficient running of service disciplinary procedures, and acts in the interests of promoting justice. There is certainly no case for believing that the reviewing authority is detrimental to the interests of service personnel; it can reduce sentences but not increase them, so there is no concept of double jeopardy. The Government must decide whether to pander to the judicial purists or to maintain a system that has worked particularly effectively in the past.

I shall now come to other aspects of the Bill. The fact that there has been an increase in the number of joint units commends itself to a unified disciplinary code and a tri-service Act. This is the greatest justification for the Bill. Frankly, the alternative—the appointment of separate commanding officers for the different services—could lead to inconsistency and disparity in the treatment of individuals, although it is also worth pointing out that when that happened in the Falklands, for example, commanders in the field were able to work in a constructive and practical way to resolve the issues.

On commanding officers' powers, there clearly has to be a compromise between the Army and the RAF on the one hand and the Royal Navy on the other. That will mean a change in the operational conditions for all concerned. As the Secretary of State pointed out, it will mean a reduction in the summary powers of naval commanding officers, and a concomitant increase in those powers for commanding officers in the Army and the RAF. We are concerned, as was the Select Committee, to ensure that those commanding officers are given the appropriate training to ensure that they make responsible use of their new powers. A system of revision must be undertaken to ensure that discrepancies do not arise in the execution of the new powers.

It is important that, as far as is possible, the commanding officer has ultimate authority over the unit, and sufficient latitude to enable him to deliver operational effectiveness. The commanding officer is at the centre of the system of discipline and is responsible for the behaviour of those under his or her command. It is the knowledge that the CO has the power to dispense summary justice that helps to mould a unit, as well as the leadership to which the Secretary of State referred. The CO's dispensation of justice is a key means of commanding respect, which is part of that leadership. Given the increased number of cases facing the Royal Navy, it is also important, in a practical sense, that expeditious processes result in minimal disruption as a result of the increased number of courts martial that will inevitably happen, especially when witnesses are required who are currently serving on one of Her Majesty's ships. I hope that the Minister will be able to deal with that point in his reply this evening.

[Dr. Fox]

The introduction of a single prosecuting authority is a sensible move in the interests of efficiency, as it will bring the structures of authority in line with the changes in tri-services rules. Likewise, a unified courts martial system is appropriate, with the support authorities also being brought into alignment. We have one concern, however, about the unified courts martial system, and perhaps the Secretary of State could deal with it now. It relates to the Government's almost baffling refusal to allow randomly selected panels.

Most of us in this country believe that randomly selected juries underpin our judicial system and guarantee independence in the operation of the court system. The panel for a court martial being chosen rather than selected on a random basis will create an unnecessary hostage to fortune for those who wish to portray military discipline as having the potential to be influenced by other interests. A randomly selected panel would be a strong bulwark against that false charge being made by those who want to see further interference in military disciplinary procedures. I hope that the Government will consider this matter constructively, and an early answer would be greatly appreciated.

Mr. Brazier: Is my hon. Friend aware that a recent letter from the Adjutant-General, revealed in another place, stated:

"With current legal, political and ginger group interest in the deaths of Iraqi civilians during operation telic: our investigation and subsequent failure to offer for prosecution could become a cause celebre for pressure groups, and a significant threat to the military justice system".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 July 2005; Vol. 673, c. 1222.]

How right my hon. Friend is.

Dr. Fox: I thank my hon. Friend for making that point. As I said at the outset, the system must be transparent and fair. That means that we must consider all the elements of our civil system that could be transposed on to the military system without in any way debilitating military justice. We must also recognise the elements of military justice that are unique and must be retained, in order for the vital link between command and discipline to be maintained.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman made an interesting point about randomly selected panels. Did he look at the points raised by the Judge Advocate General in front of the Constitutional Affairs Committee, including the suggestion that the panels should be larger, particularly for cases involving more serious offences? He also questioned whether it made sense for the panels to be involved in sentencing.

Dr. Fox: The right hon. Gentleman raises important issues. One of the advantages of the Select Committee is that so much evidence can be considered and so many weighty issues can be taken into account. That was the correct procedure to use in relation to the Bill, and I hope that the Government will ensure that there is sufficient time to consider this and subsequent parts of the Bill so that the House can fully take into account the breadth of detailed knowledge available on many of these subjects.

The Bill's bringing together the procedures of the boards of inquiry also makes sense, although, unlike the Select Committee, we believe that they should be conducted in a similar manner to the present one, and that there should be no automatic right for any individual, including next of kin, to attend the inquiry at board level. We would continue with the present arrangements, which have served well the interests of the services, of individuals and of justice.

On the question of issuing contracts for armed forces personnel similar to those for civilians, I have already noted that the position of the armed forces is different. Those who are required to operate in exceptional circumstances need to do so on a basis of contractual law that reflects those operational requirements, but which also reflects the fact that they fall within an augmentation of civil law rather than a substitute for it. Those who put their lives on the line cannot be treated in the same way, in terms of contractual law, as those who stack the shelves of our supermarkets.

An important question that the House must consider relates to the timetable for review of this legislation. It has been the practice to carry out five-yearly renewal of primary legislation relating to the armed forces disciplinary code, with an annual order to keep the matter under constant review. The case has been made that the annual review does not give adequate time for the bedding down and assessment of new arrangements. However, the annual review mechanism gives the House a chance to maintain constant surveillance over what is happening. At a time when domestic and short-term issues often crowd the political agenda, the annual review at least affords the House a regular opportunity to discuss what is happening in relation to service disciplinary procedures, and to introduce further primary legislation if required. Recent cases of primary legislation in response to European Court of Human Rights judgments demonstrate why it is necessary to consider this difficult and ever-changing subject far more frequently than every five years. We hope that this issue will be considered in Committee.

This is an important and complex Bill. Many of its measures depend on a complicated balance of judgments, and we shall consider that balance in detail during the passage of the Bill. We need a system of justice that recognises the unique position of those serving in our armed forces, and that gives them the full confidence to do what they need to do in our name. Reform in this field is justified, but it must not be used as an excuse fundamentally to alter the culture of our armed forces disciplinary codes. The armed forces are different, and they must be treated as such. The link between command and discipline is utterly fundamental. Let us have reform, yes, but let us not put the purists before the pragmatists. As we carry out these reforms, let us keep a sense of proportion and of natural justice, and an understanding of just how much we ourselves owe.

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): I welcome this Bill for the reasons that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence set out. It is evolutionary, not revolutionary, despite some of the earlier comments of the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox). It enhances at least to a modest degree the provisions for independence, although not to anything like a sufficient degree, a point to which I want to refer later. In many respects, it builds on the qualities to which my right hon. Friend rightly referred as distinguishing leadership in our armed forces. It also harmonises the law in a way that I think that we all agree is essential in a world in which there are so many joint operations, and in which our armed services face great dangers in the many theatres of operations in which they put their lives on the line for us. In some ways, the Bill maintains and enhances the commanding officer's ability to enforce discipline where that proves necessary. Listening to my right hon. Friend, it also brings clarity to the role of, and relationship between, the service and civilian courts, thereby addressing the problem of cases such as that of Trooper Williams where clarity has been lacking and that has gone on to foster angst and antagonism.

For all those reasons, I welcome the fact that we have at last arrived at Second Reading of a Bill that has been a long time in the making. As a new member of the Defence Committee, I do not want to pretend that I can yet begin to offer a well-informed view on all the 375 clauses and 15 schedules. However, I want first to deal with some issues in the later clauses that were raised by the Defence Committee in relation to the importance of independence in the system. Several hon. Members referred to them in interventions. Specifically, I want to deal with proposals about redress for individual grievances in clauses 330 to 333. Secondly, I want to comment on the issue raised by the Defence Committee most recently in its report to the House on 8 December in relation to clause 371 dealing with the duration of legislation and the provision—or lack of it, to which the hon. Member for Woodspring just referred—for annual renewal of legislation by Order in Council.

On the first of those matters, my right hon. Friend's remarks about the grievance and disciplinary procedure and the explanatory notes are clear. The explanatory notes rightly state:

"the terms of service of service personnel are not governed by domestic employment law" and that the

"statutory redress system has therefore always been of importance if a service person is to be allowed to complain about any matter where he thinks himself wronged in relation to his service."

Currently, that complaint

"proceeds through a service person's commanding officer, through various layers of the command chain, to the Defence Council. In those circumstances the Service Board of the complainant's Service act for the Defence Council ... These procedures have been found, in practice, to be slow. Service Boards have been overloaded with cases which has led to delay in cases being resolved. The clauses in the Bill are designed to speed up the process."

I welcome the potential offered by clauses 330 to 333 for doing that, because all hon. Members recognise that delay in dealing with individual grievances is one of the most common causes of distress to constituents, not just in relation to complaints in the armed services but to all the many complaints that Members receive in the course of our duties. Those clauses are to be welcomed, especially if, as I understand it, they are to be accompanied by the greater availability of mediation through the welfare services.

Those clauses are perhaps less to be welcomed in their very limited introduction of an independent voice. That is referred to in clause 332(6), which states that the regulations "may"—only "may"— "require, in the case of any service complaint of a prescribed description, a service complaint panel to include one independent member".

Even with an understanding of the very different culture of the armed services, that seems to be a minimalist and inadequate response to the recommendation of the Defence Committee, repeated in our report to the House of 8 December. We referred to the duty of care report of the previous Defence Committee, which recommended the establishment of an independent complaints commission and set out the general responsibilities and powers that such a commission should have. It should have powers independent of the armed forces, its recommendations should be binding, it should have the power to consider past cases and it should have access rights to all documentation and persons. In their response, the Government stated that they would consider introducing an independent element and the detailed implications of that.

The Bill as introduced to the House provides for the establishment of that service complaints panel, but from the information in the Bill, it appears that the independent element in the complaints system consists only of that single voice on the panel. I hope that that will be reflected on in the scrutiny of the provision in the special Select Committee. Even with an understanding of the very different culture of the armed forces, there is much more scope for bringing an independent voice to such considerations. I hope that my right hon. Friend will reflect on his thinking on the matter and on whether the mechanisms that he will need to put in place for decisions in relation to the independent panel member, even in such a limited, minimalist complaints panel, might turn out to be a sledgehammer to crack a nut. He will have to consider the sort of decision making that will have to be involved, which might become an unnecessary focal point for the continuing concern about the fairness of the grievance procedure.

To some extent, that consideration depends on the numbers and types of complaints that can be expected to be dealt with through such panels. The explanatory notes refer specifically to bullying and harassment as appropriate types of complaints. I wonder how many other types of complaints there will be and whether, if the number is small, the cake will be worth the candle of setting up a process to decide which types of complaint fall into the non-independent category, especially, if it opens up yet another avenue for dispute and delay. It might be simpler just to bite the bullet and ensure that, if there is an independent dimension to the service complaints procedure even to that modest extent, it is at least truly independent.

Certainly, there is no shortage of people with the tools of objectivity and skills in dispute resolution and arbitration. Professional training and accreditation for those who practise in those areas have progressed a great deal in recent years, and the Chartered Institute of Arbitrators and Centre for Effective Dispute Resolution are among a number of good sources. Those are also good sources of knowledge on how a strong framework of mediation can be built into the whole system. Mediation, at its best, is strong, not wishy-washy as some people would characterise it. It can add value to any organisation and can mean a win-win outcome achieved more often. If there is the knowledge that there is an automatic independent dimension further down the line for those cases that reach the complaints panels and mediation is worked into the welfare package, that is likely to help to resolve more cases earlier. That is surely desirable. It might head off difficult situations such as those that arose during investigation of the events at Deepcut. We do not want to resolve such cases when they have gone so far down the line. If the clause in its present form is as far as the Government will go, calls for more rather than less are likely to continue. As the hon. Member for Woodspring said, we need a system under which justice is not only done but seen to be done.

Clause 371 provides for a quinquennial review of the legislation. It is silent, as are the explanatory notes, on the current annual renewal of SDAs in intervening years by Order in Council, approved in draft by both Houses. For the reasons given in the Select Committee report, I see no case for dropping the annual renewal. It is a long-standing constitutional convention. Moreover, as a glance at the Hansard record of the annual debates will reveal, it allows for discussion of constituency experience of how the present legislation is working, of Members' experience of the armed services and of their experience of the parliamentary scheme. Matters raised in Defence Committee reports are often brought up during the annual debates, as is progress towards producing legislation. Arguably, after the Bill is passed, it will make even more sense for us to have such an annual opportunity and I do not think that the requirement for delegated legislation is likely to cause much concern to the business managers.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): Does the hon. Lady have any idea who is asking for the annual review to be dropped?

Linda Gilroy: As I said a moment ago, the explanatory notes are silent on that. Perhaps when he sums up, my hon. Friend the Minister will give us some indication of how strongly the Government feel about a matter that I am sure will be closely scrutinised by the special Select Committee. Perhaps at that stage some arguments will be advanced in its favour or perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to tell us tonight that the Government have an open mind and may table a modest amendment at either the Select or Standing Committee stage.

Along with my colleagues on the Defence Committee, I shall follow closely the progress of this long-awaited and very important Bill.

6.33 pm

Mr. Michael Moore (Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk) (LD): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy), both because of the issues that she raised, to some of which I shall return, and because of her work on the Defence Committee. The Committee's work is very important to the quality of our debate. The right hon. Member for North-East Hampshire (Mr. Arbuthnot) is present and he may wish to speak later.

Let me also belatedly congratulate the new shadow Secretary of State for Defence, the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox). As ever, he has brought his energy and intellectual sharpness to the debate and I look forward to what will happen over the next few months. At the very least, he maintains the Scottish stranglehold on the defence portfolio on both sides of the House. I apologise for having missed his debut last week when he responded to a statement on a very serious matter, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester (Bob Russell) responded on behalf of my party. It was a reminder to all of us of the seriousness of the context in which today's debate takes place.

All of us rightly pay tribute to the professionalism, dedication and bravery of our armed forces time and again. As was pointed out earlier, as we debate in the safety of the Chamber, they put their lives at risk in many parts of the world. We must never forget that.

The importance of the Bill is obvious from the difficult demands placed on servicemen and women day in, day out. The Secretary of State highlighted that when he spoke of the terrible growth in asymmetric warfare in recent years and the difficulties involved in dealing with enemies and others who do not operate according to the value systems and rules that we observe and expect others to observe. Recent court cases have drawn attention to issues that have been raised here today. I am sure that they will bring some of the Bill's proposals into sharp relief and make our scrutiny all the closer.

Proper service discipline is fundamental to our operational effectiveness and it is fundamental to our role in the world that our armed forces operate within the law and not above it. In considering appropriate legislation for the armed forces, we must try to balance complex and sometimes competing priorities. As others have said, the Bill represents a significant overhaul and modernisation of service legislation and we broadly support it. Given the changing nature of warfare and peacekeeping, which demand interoperability and joint operations, it makes sense to consolidate the Service Discipline Acts and to harmonise legislation with civilian justice where that is appropriate. We support the objective of ensuring consistency and fairness across all the services.

Today marks the start of the long process of passing the new legislation, but the process of scrutiny has been under way for some time. The House is indebted to the work of the Defence Committee, whose first report of the Session on the Bill draws the House's attention to key issues to which I, like others, will return. The Committee's work builds on that of its predecessor in the last Parliament, whose report on the Tri-Service Armed Forces Bill and duty of care report have made invaluable contributions to our considerations. The same can be said of the report from the Constitutional Affairs Committee, chaired by my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), which was published today. We should also express our gratitude to the Library for its rapidly produced briefing paper, which is important to our debate today and to the detailed consideration that will follow.

The one disappointment—here I echo the hon. Member for Woodspring—is the delay in the publication of the official explanatory notes. I join others in paying tribute to the quality and hard work of those responsible for that complex task, but parliamentary scrutiny is not assisted when explanatory notes are not available for several days after the publication of a Bill.

The unique status and importance of the Armed Forces Bill is reflected in the special procedures allowing its consideration by a Select Committee. The details of the timing and the balance between the Select and Standing Committee aspects are still to be established, but we support the broad thrust of what has been said about the time that will be available between now and the end of April. A single day for recommittal to the whole House for the Committee stage and Third Reading seems barely adequate, but on balance we support the programme motion.

Let me turn to the proposals in the Bill. As past White Papers and recent experience show, joint operations are an increasingly common feature of service life. Training for such missions, and the operations themselves, throw up critical issues. Commanding officers do not have disciplinary powers over all whom they command, and naval commanding officers in particular enjoy different powers from those of their Army and Air Force counterparts. That is unacceptable in this day and age and clearly needs to be changed. We welcome the proposals that have been put forward to do so. The existence of separate Service Discipline Acts makes the use, interpretation and amendment of legislation more complicated than it need be and perpetuates inconsistencies. In that context, harmonisation makes sense.

The Bill is intended to equalise the scope of offences that can be heard summarily by commanding officers and the sentences that can be imposed. At the same time, the CO's ability to dismiss charges for offences for which he or she has no summary powers is to be taken away and investigative responsibility is to be handed to the police, independent of the chain of command. Those are large changes, already the subject of much discussion and debate this afternoon, but we believe that they are right and proper. Like others, however, we will want to look carefully into the detail.

We need to ensure that the operational effectiveness of commanding officers is not compromised by the changes to their roles. As others have highlighted, they will require appropriate training in due course. On a broader plain, we must not overburden any of our armed forces with legal constraints that undermine their ability or confidence to take appropriate action, not least in hostile circumstances in which lives are at risk. However, we also have a duty to those same armed forces to ensure that they are treated in a manner consistent with domestic and international law and a wider duty to observe our international obligations and equip the services with the procedures and disciplines that ensure that they can carry them out. The detail of the Bill will be considered in Committee so that it can be assessed against those tests, but we support its underlying principles in that respect.

The report of the Constitutional Affairs Committee, following evidence from the Judge Advocate General, raises a number of important issues for the House to consider in respect of the administration of justice, which changes significantly under the Bill. It highlights the military court service—currently run by the Ministry of Defence, but recommended to be brought under and resourced by the Department for Constitutional Affairs. The appropriate type of court martial should be chosen, it is argued, by judge advocates, not by the prosecution. Another issue, already debated this afternoon, is for more serious offences to be put through the court martial, which surely creates a strong argument for larger panels, not least for offences punishable by imprisonment of 14 years or more. The Secretary of State's willingness to revisit that issue should be welcomed on both sides of the House. These are serious matters that require close scrutiny and we will listen carefully to the Government's response.

The Judge Advocate General also made observations about the length of time that trials take. In his evidence to the Select Committee, he specifically raised his concern that "the end to end time taken to dispose of cases remains a serious concern . . . both in major and minor cases."

He recognised that specific issues and unique circumstances affect the timing and length of inquiries, but he identified at least one area that could be improved—the quality of the papers and evidence supplied by investigators to the prosecuting authority. That is partly about procedure and expertise and partly about resources. The Bill should provide us with the opportunity to examine those matters in more detail, but we will surely also have to examine the way in which resources are allocated within the armed forces justice system to ensure that investigations are carried out appropriately and in good time. The Minister of State's written statement last week on the recent 3 Para trial was welcome.

Deepcut, in particular, and bullying and harassment more widely in the armed forces have become a growing cause of concern for us all. In our most recent debate on "Defence in the UK", that was an important area of focus. The latest available Army "Armed Forces Continuous Attitude Survey" to April this year is striking in that regard. As I mentioned in that debate, one key set of findings highlighted that 25 per cent. of soldiers had cause to complain about unfair treatment, discrimination, harassment and/or bullying—and more than half of them were dissatisfied or very dissatisfied with the objectivity and fairness with which the complaint was handled. If ever there were a time to reform the system of redress and grievances, it is now.

The Bill takes steps in the right direction with the creation of the service complaints panel and other measures, but as the Defence Committee stated in its new report—and as highlighted by the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton—the proposals fall some way short of the independent complaints authority that the Defence Committee's predecessor Committee advocated in the "Duty of Care" report in the last Parliament. It specifically recommended that the commission should have independence from the armed forces and the MOD, power to look into past cases, access to all papers and relevant people and that its recommendations should be binding. Those tests are not met by the Bill as it stands. Much will depend on the secondary legislation to define what exactly a "service complaint" is and to clarify the time limits and the circumstances under which an independent member of the panel will be appointed.

The new Committee's report argues that

"it remains very difficult to judge at this stage the full effect of the Government's proposals. But it is clear that the Government has rejected the main principles of our predecessor Committee's recommendations—the Bill does not provide for a mechanism to deal with complaints that is truly independent of the chain of command."

The Government must, at the very least, publish the draft regulations that will govern this aspect of the Bill. Otherwise, I hope that we will all want to amend the legislation in Committee.

Having set out some specific areas of concern about the Bill, which we will hope to explore further in Committee, I want finally to raise a couple of issues that relate to our role as legislators in this place and Parliament's duties to scrutinise the Executive. The Bill runs to more than 240 pages with 375 clauses and 15 schedules. Notwithstanding its bulk, much detail is absent from the provisions—on the service complaints panel, for example. That leaves us having to take a great deal on trust. Beyond that, there is perhaps a more fundamental issue.

This legislation, as the Select Committee points out, will no longer be subjected to annual renewal or the appropriate consideration by Parliament that goes with it. That represents a major change in the powers of the House and one that we do not believe is right. For centuries, Parliament has placed limits on the Executive's rights in regarding the Army and other armed forces in respect of total numbers and the expenditure that goes with it. We appreciate that, these days, the debate often centres on whether or not we have enough soldiers, but the notion of placing limits on the Executive is still extremely important. In this of all eras, the principle of accountability has surely not become an anachronism.

Other than administrative convenience, the change seems to offer no advantage and there are no new safeguards to give effect to the principles of parliamentary scrutiny and accountability. We will listen carefully to the Minister's response in the wind-up, but hope that the proposal will be rethought in Committee and annual renewal reinstated.

We demand much of the military personnel who serve this country, face dangers that we can barely understand and take risks with their lives that we can hardly imagine. We have a vast duty of care towards them, which, as a minimum, requires that the service discipline and laws under which they operate are clear and take account of the extraordinary things expected of them. The Bill is the starting point for that process. While there is much in the detail that we will want to scrutinise further and amend in Committee, we support its aims and will support its passage in the House tonight.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): May I begin by saying how pleased I am to be called to speak on this important Bill for the men and women of our armed forces?

As has been said, the current military justice system, although effective, dates back to the 1950s. This is a good opportunity not only to modernise the law relating to it but to combine the three services' disciplinary legislation into one. I want to concentrate on just two aspects of this very lengthy Bill: the proposed introduction of a complaints panel, and clause 371—it has already been referred to—which deals with renewal of service disciplinary legislation.

During the last Parliament, I was honoured to be a member of the Defence Select Committee, and I am honoured to be a member of it in this one. My hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy) has already pointed out that, during the previous Parliament, our Committee undertook a lengthy inquiry into the duty of care of trainees in all three of our services. The inquiry was prompted by serious concerns about the deaths of recruits and trainees in initial training establishments, especially those of four young soldiers at the Princess Royal barracks at Deepcut, Surrey, between 1995 and 2002.

Following the publication of Surrey police's final report, our Select Committee thought it right not only to undertake an inquiry that could make a significant contribution to the debate on how to improve Ministry of Defence policy on the duty of care of trainees, but to see what we could do to restore public confidence in military training, especially that given by the Army. We took evidence from Deepcut families and from the families of individuals who had died at the Catterick garrison's infantry training centre.

Mrs. Humble: The Defence Select Committee did indeed produce an excellent report and call for evidence from families beyond Deepcut. Evidence was also taken from the families of those other than trainees, and, given that it was not just trainees who died, does my hon. Friend agree that the duty of care extends beyond the initial training period and throughout the entire time that an individual spends in the armed forces?

Mr. Jones: I agree totally with my hon. Friend, and we did indeed take evidence from those who were no longer trainees, and from the relatives of those who had died and had got past initial training. Although the scope of our inquiry related to the duty of care of trainees, it was evident from the way in which it developed that we also had to examine other areas, and doing so proved invaluable to the final report.

We also took evidence from the Minister of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for East Kilbride, Strathaven and Lesmahagow (Mr. Ingram); from Colonel David Eccles, chief of staff; and from Martin Fuller, director of service personnel policy, service conditions at the Ministry of Defence. It was a long inquiry—it took more than a year—and we visited some 15 different training establishments and took evidence from a variety of individuals in all three services.

The inquiry's recommendations were clear, one of which—the establishment of an independent military complaints commission—is very important and central to this debate. It was worked on in some detail by my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell and Wishaw (Mr. Roy). He was a member of the Defence Committee at the time but is now in the purdah of the Whips Office, so he cannot take part in this debate. He was keen on this recommendation because a number of his constituents had died while serving in the armed forces, and their families, along with others, led a campaign to highlight the problem of bullying and harassment in the armed forces.

We envisage a commission that would have the authority not only to investigate complaints but to make recommendations that would be binding on the armed forces. It would be for the commission to decide whether to undertake an investigation, but it would take into account only serious allegations. Importantly, its findings and structure would be independent of the MOD and the chain of command. However, we are not suggesting that it should in any way be a substitute for the chain of command. I should stress, as other Members have stressed, that it should be seen as an independent body that people can approach to ensure that serious grievances are dealt with. I came to the view that establishing an independent commission is important because our armed forces, particularly the Army, have suffered terribly in the past few years as a result not just of the Deepcut allegations, but of other deaths in military service. A truly independent scrutinising mechanism would certainly bolster the public's confidence in the armed forces.

Not everyone who came before our Select Committee was in favour of such a commission. General Palmer said:

> "I think that that is a step too far because there is a chain of command. The Armed Forces are a unique set of people—there is no doubt or question about that. They are asked to do things that no one else is asked to do. That respect of the chain of command is vital."

I agree, but the Defence Committee's proposal would in no way cut across the chain of command. The MOD and the military are by their nature very conservative with a small "c"—in some cases, with a big one—but having such an independent commission could do no harm. Without one, there will be serious question marks over isolated but horrific cases such as those that have led to bullying and, sadly, to young recruits taking their own lives. We have heard about many such cases in the media in the past few years. As my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) pointed out in an intervention, some people have got through initial training, only to take their own lives because of the way in which they were treated in the armed forces.

I accept that people are criticising me and others for introducing this proposal, but I should point to the example of the UK police force, which, until 2002, was criticised for investigating itself. Since then, the Independent Police Complaints Commission has been created. Importantly, it reports to Parliament, so it is publicly accountable. It is not linked to any Government Department, so its decisions cannot be overruled by politicians; they can be overruled only by a court of law.

Initial reactions to the IPCC's creation were that it would impact on operational effectiveness and impose an additional bureaucratic burden, and that busy-bodies who knew nothing about day-to-day policing would be telling chief constables what to do. Throughout our inquiry, similar arguments were advanced against having an independent commission in the armed forces. By way of contrast, the senior police officers to whom we spoke during our inquiry expressed the view that the IPCC has benefited the police's working practices and led to greater transparency. The most important thing that the IPCC has done is to bolster the public's confidence that the police are not a law unto themselves, and that if complaints are made by individual members of the public, they will be investigated thoroughly and—crucially—independently.

The Government's response to our report—my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton mentioned it earlier—said the following about the creation of an independent commission:

> "We accept that there is a case for introducing an independent element to the complaints system: there are different models for this, in this country and abroad, and their implications need detailed examination. We will carry out this work ahead of the introduction of the Armed Forces Bill planned for later this year."

I was a little disappointed to discover what the Bill says about the establishment of a service complaints panel. The panel would consider a service complaint—although, as has already been said, nobody knows what the definition of a service complaint would be.

I am also disappointed that the independence of the body is still a little sketchy. As I understand it, the panel would be set up by the Defence Council, which would appoint the panel members, but in exceptional circumstances the Secretary of State could appoint an independent panel member.

Linda Gilroy: My hon. Friend has said how important it is that the public should see the system as independent. Does he agree that we too, when we refer our constituents to such a process, want to be confident that it has an appropriate degree of independence, so that we can assure them that they can have faith in it?

Mr. Jones: I totally agree. The Ministry of Defence and the military have to realise that society has moved on. The idea that, in this day and age, people can investigate themselves and still have credibility, not only with parliamentarians but with the general public, is not acceptable. Unless the system is seen as independent, it will not help to put some of the accusations aside. Some wild accusations have been made against the armed forces, but some of the accusations are right, and some very serious accusations of assault and bullying have not been properly investigated.

As I read the Bill, the main duties of the panel would be to investigate service complaints, but we have not yet seen the definition of a service complaint, what time limits would apply to such a complaint, or the circumstances in which an independent panel member would be appointed. However, it is clear that the Government have rejected the Defence Committee's recommendation of independence. That saddens me. The Bill does not provide a mechanism or a method for dealing with complaints in what I—and, I think, most people—would call truly independent from the chain of command.

Before the Bill goes any further, it is important that the definitions and other details should be published. That would be useful for the scrutiny that will take place over the coming months. That is important, because it would be helpful to try to put the issues related to Deepcut to bed. We called for retrospection in our report, because that is necessary to ensure that those issues are taken care of.

More cases involving accusations about bullying leading to suicide are emerging. My hon. Friends may have seen this week's Sunday Mirror, in which, under the headline "Deepcut II", there is an article that gives a real sense of questions to be asked about the case of two young recruits, Krystle Cookson and Michael Williams, both of whom committed suicide at the Royal School of Signals base in Blandford. Using the emotive term "Deepcut II" helps to make it clear that if we are to get satisfactory answers to some of the questions, the idea of the military investigating itself will not be acceptable to those young people's parents, or to the many others who have already been mentioned.

I hope that the Government will listen to the criticism, because I approach the idea of independence from the point of view that it would improve the Bill. It is also important to secure the public confidence that the system needs. If we go ahead as is now outlined in the Bill, an opportunity will have been missed, and there will not be the added confidence that the public need.

Clause 371, which relates to the duration and renewal of service discipline legislation, has been mentioned by several Members. It restates the requirement for a five-yearly renewal of the Acts by primary legislation, but does not continue the current practice—already mentioned by the hon. Member for Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk (Mr. Moore), who speaks on behalf of the Liberal Democrats—of annual renewal by an Order in Council approved by Parliament.

It is important that we be given an explanation of why the Government want to move to a five-yearly review. As my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton said, I cannot for the life of me think why that would be advantageous to the Government, or why Parliament should give up a historic right that has its roots way back in the 17th century.

For the sake of public confidence in the scrutiny of disciplinary issues relating to our armed forces, this Parliament must have a say, and an opportunity at least once a year to examine the regulations and raise any concerns that it may have. I do not accept that the business managers are so cramped that that has to be dropped off the agenda through lack of parliamentary time. It is so important that parliamentary time should be made for it.

I welcome the Bill, but I hope that the Government do not miss the great opportunity that they now have to put back the confidence and pride in our armed forces that we should all have. I hope that we can ensure that if cases similar to Deepcut and others arise in future, the independent process that would investigate them would not leave us in the terrible situation that we are in now, with slurs being made against our armed forces, parents and loved ones feeling that they do not have answers to their questions and the general idea that there is something to hide. If we had a proper independent process, a lot of those issues could have been raised within it, rather than having a dripping tap of allegations being made—weekly, it seems—about other horrendous cases affecting our armed forces.

7.6 pm

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): The hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) has thought deeply about these matters, and over several years he has contributed to the Select Committee along the lines that we have just heard—and he has got it right. I am exceedingly grateful to the members of the Select Committee for the power of the argument that they bring. The hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy), who has also spoken, has been a powerful advocate on the Committee, and I feel very lucky to be the Chairman of a group of people who work so hard on these difficult issues.

It is not an overstatement to say that we have the best armed forces in the world. One of the reasons that is so is that they are not awash with money, and have to think their way through some of the problems that they face. They are also extremely brave and hard-working, highly intelligent and disciplined. They are so disciplined partly because service discipline, which is essential for the success of the armed forces both in peace and in war, is underpinned by the sort of legislation that we have had in this country over many years.

The system of military law is, however, 50 years old. There is nothing wrong with being 50 years old—I am a little older than that myself. None the less, the services are now very different from what they were like when the system of military law was introduced. In particular, they now participate in joint working, joint planning and joint operations, so to have a system of military discipline that is not joint is no longer justifiable.

The Bill brings together the systems across the services, which is wholly to be welcomed. I wish, if I may, to embarrass the ministerial team and the Bill team who have put the Bill together by congratulating them on a profoundly necessary, if possibly overdue, Bill. The amount of work that they have put into it over four years has been immense, and they have come up with a good result.

The Defence Select Committee produced a report last week that built on the report that our predecessor Committee produced earlier. We highlighted two particular issues. We have already heard from two members of the Committee and I hope that at least two others will catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The first matter that our report highlighted was that of an independent complaints mechanism. The Bill will establish a service complaints panel, which modernises the redress of grievance systems.

Several points have already been made about the Bill's proposals. Although I wish to make one or two pernickety points about the independent complaints mechanism, I do not want to undermine the welcome that I give to the Bill as a whole. Some of the points that have been made about the independence of the tribunal that the Bill will set up bear repeating. The hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton has asked already why the Secretary of State "may" appoint an independent person to the service complaints panel, rather than "must" appoint. Independence has much value, and the hon. Member for Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk (Mr. Moore) articulately encapsulated the arguments for an independent element to the complaints. There is too little detail in the Bill about when the Secretary of State would make a decision about appointing an independent person to the tribunal. We have to rely on the good faith of the Secretary of State. I have no difficulty with that, but it is essential that before the House makes a final decision on the Bill's progress we should have much more detail about the regulations that the Secretary of State intends to introduce on when an independent person is appointed.

The whole process does not go far enough. The hon. Lady and the hon. Member for North Durham were right to express their disappointment that we do not have a wholly independent system. A previous Defence Committee called for a proactive body that could, for example, commission research into trends that might cause difficulties for the armed services and then proactively examine those trends. The proposal for a service complaints panel makes no allowance for that to happen.

The previous Committee also raised the issue of retrospection and past cases. We have to face the fact that there are boils to be lanced. The Deepcut boil has not been lanced and will not be lanced by the proposals in the Bill, but it is essential that people have confidence in the reputation of the Ministry of Defence. The hon. Member for North Durham spoke about the need to have confidence in the Ministry of Defence and he pointed out how now that the police had the Independent Police Complaints Commission they were no longer seen as a law unto themselves. The Ministry of Defence is seen that way at the moment. Everybody knows that my view of the decisions on the Mull of Kintyre Chinook crash leads me to believe that the Ministry of Defence is seen to be a law unto itself. There is much to be said for the introduction of a degree of openness and independence, which would build up the Ministry's reputation and self-confidence. The Ministry of Defence would have nothing to lose from that and everything to gain.

Another issue that has been raised by the Defence Committee was that of annual renewal. The quinquennial review will be retained, and that is good, but under the Bill the annual secondary legislation will go. I sense that Ministers are open-minded about that. The Secretary of State for Defence has written to the Committee to say that it is not the sort of ditch in which he would wish to die. I was also delighted by what my hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) and the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton said about this issue. An annual consideration of the legislation that underpins the discipline of our armed forces is an essential part of parliamentary scrutiny. The Defence Committee calls on the Minister not to press that change and I hope that he will be able to give us some indication later this evening on that point.

I wish to touch on one or two other issues briefly. The Ministry of Defence does not accept the previous Committee's recommendations about boards of inquiry and, for example, the parents of dead servicemen and women having the right to attend them. The Ministry of Defence says that it is worried that the candour of the evidence could be compromised if a witness sees the deceased person's parents in the room. I understand that argument, but it is one that has to be faced in civilian courts, week in and week out. It does not seem to have a serious impact on the quality of the evidence or the behaviour of the judiciary in civilian courts. Perhaps the parents of dead servicemen or women should not have the right to attend boards of inquiry. I know that tribunals may allow the relations or other people with an interest to attend, and I hope that the possibility is exercised with great humanity. I ask the Minister to put himself in the position of a parent whose child has been killed in an accident but who is not allowed to attend the inquiry into the accident.

Mr. Kevan Jones: When the previous Committee took evidence on that point from parents, the problem was not only that they were not allowed to attend. In many cases, they were not notified of the outcome of, or given notes from, the inquiries. If we are to shine the spotlight on the darker crevices of the MOD, it is vital that parents are allowed the dignity of trying to find out what happened to their children.

Mr. Arbuthnot: That is unarguable.

My next and rather different point concerns offences at sea. The Minister may be able to confirm the point when he winds up, but I understand that harmonisation of the disciplinary procedures will lead to a 50 per cent. increase in the number of naval cases being heard by court martial, as opposed to being dealt with summarily. Is that the case, and will it cause difficulties to the armed forces in terms of operational effectiveness? Is it right that the Bill does not cover administrative action, which is the lowest level of disciplinary process? If that is right, is that also to be harmonised across the services?

I have spoken for long enough, but I have a few points about the procedures that the House will follow when examining the Bill. When the Secretary of State opened the debate he said that one of the great strengths of the Bill was its hybrid nature. He was right. The ad hoc Select Committee will be able to take evidence and examine the Bill line by line, for the first time in public. That follows the recommendation of the previous Defence Committee.

It is right that the detailed wording of the Bill should be examined in public. In fact, all legislation should be examined in that way. Committees should be able to take evidence about the legislation on the wording of which they are about to decide. It is not simply a good method of doing business; it should be a role model for the way we do business in the rest of the legislative process.

I very much hope that there will be a good representation of members of the Defence Committee on the ad hoc Select Committee, and I look to the Committee of Selection to achieve that. That will mean that the Select Committee is very strong indeed.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): I am especially pleased to follow so many considered contributions from colleagues on both sides of the House. This is an important debate. Although I am not a member of the Defence Committee, I, like other Members, want to refer to its excellent reports, which should underpin much of our debate.

I welcome the Secretary of State's intention to modernise the law on the armed forces and to bring it into line with the requirements of the Human Rights Act 1998. The Bill is built on the key principle of fairness—to be fair and to be seen to be fair. It is sensible to update our procedures. As has already been said, our armed forces do difficult tasks in increasingly difficult circumstances and I hope that the Bill will give them some reassurance as they undertake those tasks.

[Mrs. Joan Humble]

We all agree that our armed forces do excellent work and are highly regarded. They need the proper investigative procedures outlined in the Bill. The role of the commanding officer is important. Under the Bill, commanding officers have a duty to ensure that matters drawn to their attention are properly investigated. We need to extend that role in other elements of the Bill.

I want to speak from the standpoint of parents whose children have died in peacetime while serving in the armed forces. When my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence sums up, will he clarify how the concerns of those parents can be addressed in the legislation?

My constituent, Lance Corporal Derek McGregor, died in July 2003 at Catterick barracks. His family are waiting for a date to be set for the coroner's inquest, so I cannot comment on the circumstances of his death. I can say only that when I met Derek's father, Joe McGregor, and the parents of children who lost their lives at Deepcut and at other barracks in England, Northern Ireland and overseas, the same phrases cropped up time and time again:

"You have to understand—the Army is a law unto itself" and

"You have to understand the Army is so arrogant—they think they can get away with murder."

Those are not my words, but those of parents who buried their children in tragic circumstances.

Pete Wishart: I congratulate the hon. Lady on the assiduous way in which she chairs the Deepcut and Beyond families group. I represent the Collinson family whose son was also killed at Deepcut barracks. Does she agree that it is not only families and those of us interested in the issue but the public who are concerned? The general public expect that public services such as the Army are given the closest possible scrutiny. That is why there is great public concern about things such as the events at the marine camp reported recently. The public are owed proper scrutiny of what is happening in the armed forces.

Mrs. Humble: The hon. Gentleman is right. My hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) also drew attention to recent newspaper articles. When we are recruiting young people to serve in our armed forces in difficult circumstances, they and their parents need assurances about that essential duty of care. If they do not receive them, it will, without a shadow of doubt, affect recruitment and morale. We need to address that issue and the Bill is the ideal opportunity.

Modernisation of the armed forces means removing the stain of Deepcut. It was once a rural location in leafy Surrey—I have been there—but is now a byword for bullying and cover-up. We must stop that. Modernisation means openness and accountability. Modernisation means that when a fatal incident occurs the bereaved family are entitled to learn the truth. They are entitled to expect justice and to believe that lessons will be learned, to avoid such deaths in the future.

I listened with interest to the remarks of the new Chairman of the Select Committee about informing families. They should be involved in inquiries, because all they experience is secrecy. Only limited information is given to them and they often feel that even that has to be dragged out, and the process goes on for months. When my constituent Joe McGregor and members of other families gave evidence to the previous Select Committee, they described how the visiting officer who came to tell them of the death of their child was often oblivious to their needs. The officer did not discuss with the families what had happened. They often had to ask for the return of personal possessions, which were often returned in a way that caused them even greater distress. Such issues should be addressed by the Committee.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Does my hon. Friend agree that, even when accidents occur or when individuals die tragically in accidents, the culture of secrecy that she describes leads to parents and loved ones thinking that the MOD is covering something up?

Mrs. Humble: My hon. Friend is right. That is why the Deepcut and Beyond group is still asking for a public inquiry. Having tried and tried—for many years, in some cases—to get answers from the Army and the armed forces in general, the families feel that an independent inquiry is the only way to meet their calls for truth, justice and change.

There have been at least five internal military inquiries, as well as two police investigations costing at least £1 million, another police force investigating the integrity of the first, a Select Committee inquiry, a review conducted behind closed doors by Nicholas Blake QC and another inquest by the Queen's coroner. How many more investigations are we to have? To date, every inquiry has been limited by its terms of reference. None had powers sufficient to fulfil the requirements for the necessary public investigation of non-combat deaths. None had the weight and stature to make recommendations for lasting change and none had the authority to restore public confidence.

Linda Gilroy: On the subject of public confidence, does my hon. Friend agree that families want not only to see justice done, but to be sure that things are put right for the future—no doubt, other people who have lost loved ones want that as well—and that only by greater openness and independence can they be sure of that?

Mrs. Humble: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. I believe that the Bill, as drafted, will miss a valuable opportunity to address the vital issue of accountability. I hope that special attention will be given to accountability in the discussions that will take place after the debate.

I will certainly listen very carefully to the Minister's response to hear whether he has reflected further on Surrey police's recommendation that the armed services should consider the value of establishing a mechanism for independent oversight, which was developed and advanced by the Defence Committee in its inquiry into the duty of care. The model advanced by the Select Committee was that of the Office of the Police Ombudsman for Northern Ireland—a model that, thanks to the skill and leadership of the ombudsman, Mrs. Nuala O'Loan, is regarded universally as a world leader in police accountability.

The Deepcut and Beyond families group supports the proposal for an ombudsman or independent complaints commissioner. The group especially welcomes the Defence Committee's recommendation that any such ombudsman should have the power retrospectively to look at cases on which many families did not get answers—they still have not had answers. The group can also see the merit of an independent inspectorate along the lines of Her Majesty's inspectorates of police and prisons.

Another proposal, which is particularly relevant while the Army continues to recruit under-18s to military service, is to create a system of lay visitors panels, which could carry out announced or unannounced visits to barracks to interview and monitor the well-being of service personnel.

Another issue that I wish to raise is impunity for armed service personnel. We rightly deplore those dictatorial regimes in which security personnel can do no wrong, where brutality, rape and murder during an armed conflict or behind the closed doors of the military barracks goes unpunished. In such regimes, even a conviction in a civilian court may be regarded as a technical matter and temporary inconvenience. The soldier concerned may be welcomed back into the army and even promoted.

It has, as far as I am aware, always been the case for the British Army—this is set out in the Queen's regulations—that in the event of a serious misdemeanour resulting in conviction and sentence to imprisonment by a civil court, the soldier would be automatically discharged. When discussing the Bill with some members of the Deepcut and Beyond group, they drew to my attention two cases in which the Army has sought exemption from that rule on the grounds that the conviction did not bring into doubt "the integrity" of the soldiers concerned. I am informed that one case involved the conviction of two soldiers for murder. Another case involved the conviction of a soldier for manslaughter by gross negligence. If soldiers can be routinely dismissed for the possession of class B drugs, I can find no rationale to allow those who are found responsible for the death of civilians or their fellow soldiers to remain.

Mr. Brazier: The second case relates to Corporal Clegg. The hon. Lady appears not to take account of the fact that, from time to time, it is the soldier's job to kill people. The court ruled in that case—this was eventually quashed a long time later by a second appeal—that in a split-second decision he had wrongfully killed someone. That does not impinge on his integrity.

Mrs. Humble: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point. Of course, we are discussing the armed forces, but similar things can be said about the police. In no way do I underestimate the split-second decisions that soldiers must make. Nevertheless, on one hand some of the families whose children have died in the armed forces see action that is veiled in secrecy—they cannot get answers about their children from the Army—and on the other they see the Army defending soldiers in circumstances where they may have doubts about the action that was taken. I am not making any remark about the particulars of individual cases; I am simply drawing to the attention of the House the concerns of families about what might be seen as two rules—one for them and one for other people—and we must have accountability, consistency, fairness and openness in all those decisions.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a big difference between actions on the battlefield or, for example, in Northern Ireland, and the actions of individuals who are in charge of soldiers that relate to bullying that subsequently, in some very tragic cases, leads to those individuals taking their own lives?

Mrs. Humble: My hon. Friend is right, but I should like to ask the Minister whether, if the Bill is passed, a soldier convicted of the abuse of power, of bullying, of rape or of murder will no longer be subject to automatic discharge. Will they maintain their rank and position in the armed services throughout their prison sentence? If that is the case, it would certainly cause a lot of concern to many of the families whose children have died—often, they believe, as a result of bullying in the armed forces.

The purpose of the Bill is to update and streamline legislation. It must therefore be fair and it must offer transparency. Without that, the good work that so many of our soldiers do could be undermined. I regularly meet current and former members of the King's Own Royal Border Regiment and the Queen's Lancashire Regiment. Some time ago, I met representatives of the Royal Green Jackets, who are based not too far from Blackpool, and they told me about the excellent work that they had done as peacekeepers in Sierra Leone.

I know of the very good work that is undertaken, but the Bill is an opportunity to reassure military personnel, their families and the general public that, when things go wrong, they will be investigated. Usually, things go right. Members of Parliament do not get people queuing up at our advice surgeries to tell us that everything is going swimmingly; they queue up to tell us when things go wrong. Our responsibility is to ensure that we have an appropriate response when things go wrong. The Bill is our opportunity to do that, so I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will reconsider the Defence Committee's reports on independent oversight, because that will give many of the reassurances that many families need.

7.38 pm

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): I congratulate the Secretary of State on winning the game of musical chairs that has been running for about 20 years. He is the final Secretary of State to sit on the chair when all his predecessors have been denied one. It falls to him to win the elusive prize of achieving a tri-service Act. That is purple prose in any language. I also congratulate the Bill team at the Ministry of Defence and the parliamentary draftsmen and Treasury counsel on what has been a mammoth operation. With previous Armed Forces Bills, we have heard some quite extraordinary reasons—or should I say excuses?—wheeled out about why progress has not been made. That has never been the fault of the Ministry of Defence, which has always seen the merit of updating service law. So I am absolutely delighted that the Bill has appeared before the House, and I warmly support it.

[Robert Key]

I also support the legislative process that we are about to use. I believe strongly in the value of pre-legislative scrutiny, for the reasons that Members on both sides of the House have already mentioned. I have argued for 15 years that we should use such a process for other legislation because it has enormous advantages, not least because it empowers the citizens of this country to have a direct input in the way in which policy making becomes law. That must be good for democracy, and it might even encourage people to vote.

There is no part of my constituency that is not directed affected by the Ministry of Defence and the military and civilian people whom it employs. It contains Land Command, Larkhill, Bulford, Porton Down, Winterbourne Gunner, Boscombe Down, Salisbury plain training area, Westdown camp and Rollestone camp. There are low-flying zones and artillery ranges, and more than 11,000 Ministry of Defence employees. The Bill is thus important to many of my constituents.

I agree with the conclusions of the Defence Committee in its first report of the current Session. It is important that the Bill establishes "an independent voice in the consideration of complaints", but that is not in itself sufficient. I agree with the Committee, of which I have the honour to be a member a second time around, that we should

"urge the Government to table amendments to strengthen the degree of independence" of the complaints system in the Army—I shall come back to that in a moment.

I agree with the Committee's recommendation that we should encourage the Ministry of Defence to publish "secondary legislation relating to the Armed Forces Bill, in draft"—

if that is all that can be achieved—to inform our scrutiny of the Bill. We are told throughout the Bill that the Secretary of State will make regulations on almost all matters of detail. We need sight of such regulations, and so do the public.

I also endorse what every person who has mentioned the matter has said so far: there is a need for annual review of service discipline legislation. I understand Ministers being persuaded—probably by the Treasury—that it would save a bob or two if we did not need to have this performance. I can understand the Whips Office saying, "You don't really need yet more legislation, do you? Surely once every five years will do." I hope that Defence Ministers will be able to win the day because I suspect that the idea did not come from them. After all, the House of Commons has reviewed the matter every year since 1689. Parliament should not yield willingly such an important check on the power of the Executive.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: May I reinforce the point that my hon. Friend is making? Under the Bill of Rights 1689, no standing Army may be maintained without the authority of Parliament. Is it not the case that this is the modern procedure by which the Bill of Rights is respected by the House, and that removing the provision would thus have serious constitutional implications?

Robert Key: My hon. Friend is entirely right.

John Reid: I agree entirely with the principle under the Bill of Rights that every Parliament should reauthorise that the standing Army should be maintained. That is why we have agreed that there should be a Bill each Parliament. The question is whether we need to legislate every year. The hon. Gentleman is half right because the suggestion did not originate in the Ministry of Defence, but he was wrong to say that it was the responsibility of the Treasury or the Whips Office.

Robert Key: I am grateful to the Secretary of State. In that case, we shall have great fun working out whodunit.

Like the Secretary of State, I served on each of the previous two Armed Forces Bills. He will recall that those Bills turned out to be Christmas-tree Bills, not only because their Second Readings occurred just before Christmas, but because the original Bill became festooned with more and more decorations. I thus wish to ask Defence Ministers to explain several aspects of the Christmas-tree nature of this Bill.

Clause 35 is titled "Annoyance by flying". The military has to undertake low flying and MPs have to be sympathetic about the situation in their constituencies each year. However, neither the clause nor the explanatory notes gives anything like a convincing reason why we need to put yet another obstacle in the way of military pilots. The clause says that it is an offence if a person subject to service law flies an aircraft so as to annoy or be likely to annoy anyone, unless he can reasonably avoid flying in such a way. Come on, Mr. Deputy Speaker—is this a military matter, or is it not? We are talking about not recreational flying from grass strips, but fast jets, Chinooks and other kinds of aircraft and helicopters that are on military business. If I am fortunate enough to be chosen to serve on the Committee that considers the Bill, I shall be pressing Ministers for an answer to why we need clause 35.

Clause 42 is entitled "Criminal conduct". The Secretary of State touched on an important matter in his opening comments. It is important for people to realise that the Bill does not address torture or any other criminal offence that is not necessarily a military offence. Clause 42 points out that anything that is a criminal offence in British law is an offence if it is carried out by members of HM forces, wherever they are in the world—that is my understanding of the clause, but perhaps the Minister will clarify that. That is important because it means that wherever in the world British service personnel are, they will always occupy the moral high ground when it comes to making decisions of life or death. It will also apply to the behaviour of members of HM forces, whether they are in Ayia Napa or elsewhere in Cyprus. We did not cover ourselves in glory in Cyprus 40 or 50 years ago and did not always occupy the moral high ground. I do not think that we did that with internment in Northern Ireland, or that the Americans have done so in Guantanamo Bay. We want to maintain the honour, courage and bravery of Her Majesty's forces and their personnel.

Clause 51 relates to the jurisdiction of the service civilian court. It is important because many people do not realise that the Bill applies to civilians who are subject to service discipline. Indeed, it can apply to the children of serving personnel overseas. It applies to contractors and service families, so the jurisdiction of the service civilian court is important. I will want to probe in Committee to find out exactly how the situation changes under the Bill.

Mr. Arbuthnot: While my hon. Friend is in a gap between clauses, may I take him back to a point that he made about clause 35 and the annoyance caused by low flying? I, too, was worried about the clause when I first read it. I am worried that if the Ministry of Defence receives several complaints about low flying from people in a certain area, that might, owing to criminal offence under the clause, give rise to judicial review. People might thus take the Ministry of Defence to court to prevent low flying, although that is essential, as my hon. Friend said.

Robert Key: The analysis of my right hon. Friend is wholly right.

Clause 83 introduces a strange little power: the power of a judge advocate to authorise entry and search. Clause 84 provides definitions for the purposes of clause 83. The matter is important. A point was raised during the consideration of the last Armed Forces Bill following the experience of journalists who were accused of undertaking various underhand acts in the course of their journalistic activities. I recall that there was a case involving a house that was entered and searched by Ministry of Defence police, although no one seemed to know whether they should have been there. I suspect that the measures are designed to tidy up the situation. It is all very strange.

Subsection (4) refers to the terms

"'items subject to legal privilege', 'excluded material' and 'special procedure material' ".

We are told that these definitions have the same effect as those in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. An example of "excluded material" includes "personal records (such as medical records and journalist's materials) if held in confidence. An example of special procedure material is a journalist's material not held in confidence."

That has got the journalist both ways.

I seek clarification as I want to find out what is going on. I suspect that all sensible journalists will have gone off to bed or down to the pub, so they will not have heard me tonight. However, if they catch up with clause 84, they might have something to say.

I certainly support clause 99(6). It deals with limitations on custody without charge. I wonder whether the Prime Minister knew that the clause would be put into the Bill. There is a 48-hour maximum allowed in the context of limitations on custody without charge. Custody after charge is limited to eight days. That sounds pretty sensible to me and I am happy to support the provision.

I move on to clause 155(4)(d), which is the constitution of the court martial. This is fascinating. A chaplain cannot be a member of a court martial. Does that apply to other faiths—for example, to religious personnel, to Sikhs and to Muslims? We are delighted that the Minister has invited them to perform some of the roles that traditionally the Christian chaplains have carried out. I want to know why chaplains are specifically mentioned and whether that applies also to "chaplains" of other faiths.

The hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) made a passionate speech. I understood so much of what she was getting at. I would like to know one day what she thinks about clause 162, dealing with courts martial rules. An interesting argument arises. I have been to a few courts martial, sometimes to see constituents who have been involved in them. One of the problems is the mumbo-jumbo. For example, there were swords on tables pointing in particular directions and there was the question of whether headgear should be worn. All these things that have grown up over hundreds of years of military tradition are no more than mumbo-jumbo to ordinary people. I suspect that if some of the mumbo-jumbo was taken out of the process, the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood and her constituents would be reassured and their confidence would grow. Perhaps it is a similar argument to whether judges should wear full-bottomed wigs and so on.

Mrs. Humble: The families that I meet would welcome just being present and just being involved. They could probably cope with mumbo-jumbo. They are interested in getting answers and getting the truth.

Robert Key: No one could possibly disagree with that. I am sure that that is an issue that the hon. Lady will pursue whatever happens.

My penultimate question lies with clause 332, that is headed, "Composition and procedure of service complaints panels". Can an independent member—and I generally agree with this, although it has perhaps not gone far enough—be a naval chaplain? We do not know, and it might be thought that it does not matter. We do not know because so much will be introduced by regulation by the Secretary of State. We know that an Army chaplain cannot be an independent member of a complaints panel because that is provided for in the clause. However, clause 361 provides that naval chaplains, as explained in paragraph 849 of the explanatory notes, "have no rank". So if a naval chaplain has no rank, is he a member of the armed forces? So can he or can he not be an independent member of a complaints panel? This is a detail, but the sort of detail that will somewhere rear its head.

Mr. Kevan Jones: The hon. Gentleman raises an interesting point, but the Deepcut families and others are seeking true independence. These are people who have no connection with any of the armed forces.

Robert Key: Up to a point, Lord Copper. There are people in the armed forces who really value the presence of chaplains in the community. Young members of the forces perhaps tend to be vulnerable and think that they may be being bullied, or are being bullied, and they might turn to a chaplain. The role of chaplains is crucial—and I mean chaplains of various faiths. If a naval chaplain is allowed to be a member of an independent tribunal, that might be important for the person involved and as a principle or precedent for the role of chaplaincy in the armed forces.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): I am focusing on the hon. Gentleman's point. Surely clause 361 covers it. Does it not effectively extend to a naval chaplain the rank of officer? That is the way in which I read it. Ipso facto, he or she would have parity of treatment with an Army officer.

Robert Key: There are other circumstances where only certain sorts of non-commissioned officers can perform certain roles, as set out in the Bill. I do not know, and that is why I ask the question in all innocence. However, it is something that we will need to discuss in Committee.

Perhaps we need to look further afield if we are concerned about the true independence of the bodies that we are discussing. There is other experience. For example, there is the inspector general of the Australian defence force. It is an interesting example because his role is to "identify systemic causes of injustice within the military system of justice covering".

not only

"Australian Defence Force discipline and defence inquiries."

We might look further at the complaint resolution agency in the Australian defence force, which has a particular role if the commanding officer

"declines to grant the redress sought or does not have the authority".

He can request that the redress of grievance

"is referred to the relevant service chief"

and then to the CRA. That is an important example. So is the defence force ombudsman of the Australian defence force. The Canadian military police have a complaints commission which really is independent, so perhaps we should consider its role.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I agree with the example that the hon. Gentleman gives of the Australian defence force. Does he agree that when there is a degree of independence from the chain of command that has not affected in any way the operational capabilities of the armed forces?

Robert Key: Of course the hon. Gentleman is right about operational capabilities, but it does give confidence when things go wrong.

My final question relates to clause 343, which is headed "Exemption from tolls and charges". It is an extraordinary provision. I speak as a former Minister who was responsible for roads. The clause exempts from tolls and charges bridges, congestion charges, toll roads, road pricing and so on a vehicle that "belongs to any of Her Majesty's Forces".

Does that mean that Corporal Jones, going into Amesbury for a pint on Saturday night, will be exempt from paying a charge—not that there is a charge between Bullford barracks and Amesbury? If there were, what would be the position? I do not know because the provision is so broad. Neither the explanatory notes nor the terms of the clause help very much. We are told that no charge

"is payable in respect of a vehicle" that is

"in use for the purposes of any of those forces."

There are many loopholes there.

We are talking about the best armed forces in the world. We are talking about a force that is brave and disciplined, based on hundreds of years of tradition and hundreds of years of keeping faith with the people of our islands and the peoples of the Commonwealth and beyond. It is all a matter of trust, and therefore it is a matter of justice. These things work both ways and that is what the Bill is all about. I warmly support it.

7.59 pm

Mr. David S. Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): I am grateful for being called to contribute to this debate. I apologise to the Secretary of State and the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) for missing most of their contributions as a result of parliamentary business. The two statements affected my timetable this afternoon.

I welcome the Bill and the mechanism for scrutinising and eventually debating it. Several Parliaments use a similar mechanism—Select Committee scrutiny takes place first, then the people involved in that process engage in detailed clause-by-clause scrutiny. If we used that mechanism for more legislation, we would achieve more informed debate in Standing Committee than is traditionally the case. I welcome the way in which the Bill brings together the disciplinary activities of all three services. I was interested to see how the three chains of command have been brought together and to learn what will be dealt with by summary action and what by court martial. Different charges will be dovetailed together.

The right hon. Member for North-East Hampshire (Mr. Arbuthnot) pointed out the effect on naval discipline of the introduction of many more courts martial and the subsequent increase in work load. In Committee, we must look in detail at individual offences and how they will be brought together across the services. I do not wish to judge at this stage whether the Bill, as a result of the consultation with the three services, has got it right. Detailed scrutiny will be required in Committee to ensure that punishments and the way in which each offence is dealt are appropriate. One of our major tasks in Committee will be to ensure that the work behind the scenes to pull the three codes together has been done correctly.

The Bill, together with my eight and a half years' experience as an MP, convinces me about the extent to which the armed forces are separate from the rest of us. We accept that they have a different code of discipline and are subject to different mechanisms in the treatment of complaints and grievances. Both concerns are at the heart of the Bill and we must consider whether we are moving from the traditional procedures of the armed forces towards what is acceptable in civvy street. I have spent two periods with the Army as part of the armed forces parliamentary scheme and I have dealt with a great deal of case work that involved the Ministry of Defence. Throughout, I found it incredibly difficult to persuade the armed forces to accept that a complaint is legitimate. My office tells me that the most difficult Department to deal with is the MOD. It is hard to secure any movement at all from it whenever we make a complaint on behalf of a constituent. That ties in with my off-the-cuff chats with service personnel in previous years, so I am worried about whether we have achieved the right balance of independence for the complaints and grievance system.

It is not simply the main issues—the Deepcut inquiry, bullying and so on—that have concerned Members over the past few years, as the problem extends all the way down the line. Service personnel cannot join a trade union, so we cannot expect them to use the normal grievance procedures used by people who go to the office at 9 am and leave it at 5 pm. In civvy street, we can go and have a grumble, and there are ways of dealing with such problems. There is a chain of command for service personnel that means that we cannot expect complaints to be dealt with in the same way. Sometimes, the military go too far the other way, and it is easy for them to ignore legitimate complaints because of the sanctity of the chain of command.

On the major issues, I was not a member of the Select Committee that considered the previous Armed Forces Bill, but its views on the insufficiency of the mechanism that has been put in place for the independent consideration of complaints were reaffirmed by the current Select Committee. We should seriously consider expanding and enlarging that mechanism, but we must not lose sight of the larger issue so that those young men and women who join the services and believe that they are treated unfairly have a mechanism that will ensure that their complaints, even if relatively trivial, are dealt with legitimately. I often have the impression that it is easy to ignore such complaints and hide behind the chain of command.

The same problems that make it difficult to approach the civilian model when dealing with grievances and complaints apply to disciplinary and judicial procedures. It is a different world for someone who is on operations in Iraq or Afghanistan having to make split-second decisions under pressure and being scrutinised after the event for decisions made in stressful situations. Traditionally, people in the armed forces who know those pressures have made the decision about whether to prosecute and what are the appropriate procedures to use. In the past few years, however, military personnel have moved towards civilian standards regarding the acceptability of conduct. The hon. Member for Woodspring referred to that development when he asked whether we should pursue an idealistic or pragmatic approach to discipline.

A couple of incidents involving my local regiment, the Queen's Lancashire Regiment, are of concern. I am not questioning whether the right decisions were made, but in the Mackenzie case, the newspaper publication of fraudulent photographs put our armed forces at risk. The case has been dropped, but it is not clear whether or not anyone else will be pursued. At the same time, Colonel Mendonca of that regiment is being pursued, not under traditional military regulations, but under the International Criminal Court Act 2001. The case will be decided three years after the initial incident. Both cases, together with several others have affected morale in the services and whether service personnel believe that they are treated properly and are subject to a duty of care.

When the Bill is enacted, we should aim to ensure that military personnel have confidence in the process whereby they are judged and in how prosecutions are conducted. Bringing the prosecution services of the three services together, perhaps with additional resources, may result in a better quality process. The morale of the armed forces has taken a knock in recent years because of the confusion about whether they should be subject to civilian or military procedure. We should be clear about which approach we are taking. If we expect discipline to reflect the fact that service personnel are members of the military their complaints and grievance procedure should run parallel to that expectation. In the Bill, we need to achieve a balance between both those tracks, so that both are accepted as being fair and reasonable and adequately reflect the fact that servicemen and women operating in a 21st-century military service may have different standards and expectations from those of a 19th or mid-20th-century military.

If the Bill is supposed to update military disciplinary and grievance procedures from half a century ago, we need to reflect the modern aspirations and expectations of young men and women who serve in our military today. If we can do that, we can do a good job. That is what I hope will come out of the process. I am not an expert and do not know what that will properly involve, but I ask myself whether, at the end of the process, I will be able to sit in front of young servicemen and women and be sure that we have an updated, modern disciplinary, grievance and complaints procedure in which they can have confidence. If we can do that, the House will have done a good job.

My final brief comment is about whether the legislation should be renewed annually. I remain to be convinced—nothing that I have read or heard or that has been said in the Chamber so far this evening has convinced me—that there is any case to move away from annual renewals. I look forward with interest to the debates and contributions from Ministers in the weeks ahead.

8.11 pm

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): In reply to the Secretary of State's justified remark about my absence, may I make it clear that I left the House because I was summoned to the office of my new party leader? There is no announcement resulting from that; I am staying in the same position. I wish to make it clear that no disrespect to the Secretary of State was intended by my leaving a few minutes after an intervention on him.

I take a gloomier view of the Bill than the last few speakers, including two distinguished colleagues of mine. As we debate service discipline, it is important to remember that the grinding overstretch resulting from the four major entanglements into which the Government have taken our armed forces and from cuts in their manpower has led to an exodus of experienced people from the armed services, as well as a rise in the services divorce rate. The men and women who will be subject to the measure that we are debating have seen their pensions attacked when the whole of the rest of the public sector have seen their pensions protected. They have seen the burden of proof raised for compensation claims for injuries incurred on service. They have been infuriated by the Saville inquiry and the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill.

Behind the Armed Forces Bill lies an ugly trend towards civilianising the military world. Military life, with its risks, hardships and requirements for stern discipline simply is not comparable to that of civilians. I listened with interest to the hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Borrow). He will not mind my saying that he ended on the fence. I share many of the concerns that he expressed. The military world is not the same as the civilian world.

[Mr. Julian Brazier]

It would be wrong to disparage the entire Bill. I understand why we are not opposing Second Reading and there are a number of welcome elements. The service complaints panel strikes the right balance in dealing with issues such as Deepcut. We must not have another Deepcut. I agree with my colleagues' comments on the tri-service aspect as servicemen increasingly operate in joint units, although there is a question about some of the special requirements of some naval commanding officers, particularly submarine commanders.

I welcome the modest expansion of powers for the CO in the Army and Air Force regarding summary hearings for lesser offences. It is that aspect that makes other parts of the Bill so hard to understand. Evidently the Government comprehend, at least in part, the importance of the CO and such powers for maintaining not only discipline, but a sense of continuity and community. There is a unique bond between a commanding officer and his men. The strength of that bond underpins the remarkable feats that the House has come to expect of our servicemen and women. As Lord Boyce said on 14 July in the Lords debate on the legality of the chain of command,

"we interfere with the unique linkage between the commanding officer and his men at our peril."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 14 July 2005; Vol. 673, c. 1235.]

Why limit that trust now by removing all the powers relating to more serious crimes? We all know why. The Secretary of State made it clear in his speech—the case of Trooper Williams. It is important to remember that that was at a time when there had been a small number of allegations concerning prisoners. It related to something that had happened not in a prison or in a camp, but at a checkpoint in a dangerous area and involved a member of the enemy who was found to be carrying ammunition. The case was initially dismissed by the CO on advice from the Army legal service because of a lack of evidence. The director of the Army legal service then referred it to the Attorney-General for possible trial in the civil courts. After protracted wrangling, the case was dropped by the Crown Prosecution Service following a long delay because of a lack of evidence.

The provenance of the case is disturbing, to say the least. In his statement on 7 April, the Attorney-General referred to the fact that "the commanding officer had 'dismissed' the charges against Trooper Williams" and continued:

"The matter could not, because of the actions of the commanding officer, be dealt with by way of court martial. It was referred to me to consider further action."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 7 April 2005; Vol. 671, c. WS 92.]

That is in the context of recent remarks by the Under-Secretary of State for Defence, who I see in his place. He stated:

"Discipline is essential, and we depend on service law to enforce it.

A fighting force that cannot obey orders and display self-control in peacetime will not stand up to the much more demanding circumstances of operations."

In a sense, that is platitudinous. We would all agree with that statement. Did the Minister feel that he had to say it? Does he believe that British troops are less disciplined than other armies in any of the theatres in which they have recently operated? There are indeed a very small number of disturbing incidents involving prisoners in Iraq, but overall I believe our forces are the best disciplined in the world. Yet today they face a brutal enemy and an unprecedented blizzard of investigations and prosecutions—prosecutions brought about by Government policy and in which, in a number of cases, the Attorney-General has played a crucial role from the safety of his office in Whitehall.

The Williams case was a protracted, distressing and shameful assault on the reputation of a gallant soldier. It did not happen because his CO had the power to pursue the case but did not do so. It happened because the opinion of the CO was brushed aside in what many in the Army believe—rightly—was a political desire to charge and convict someone amidst all the allegations of human rights abuses in Iraq. Now the Government want to remove the authoritative opinion of the commanding officer, the man on the spot who shares the risks with his soldiers, the man who got it right in the Williams case, and hand that power to the Army legal service.

The Government have learned the wrong lesson. They are keeping the bath water and throwing the baby to the wolves. On 24 March—I quoted this in an intervention on the Secretary of State—the Adjutant-General wrote to the Chief of the General Staff and CIC Land, copying his letter to the brigadier, to inform them that he intended to write to the director of Army legal services to ask him to draw the case to the attention of the Attorney-General for the purpose of having resort to his jurisdiction. In that letter, the reason given was:

"With current legal, political and ginger group interest in the deaths of Iraqi civilians during operation telic: our investigation and subsequent failure to offer for prosecution could become a cause celebre for pressure groups, and a significant threat to the military justice system."

I have no intention of attacking a senior serving officer, but if I were a serving soldier, my blood would run cold if I heard that remark, which was first unearthed by Lord Campbell in July in another place.

The situation is being compounded by the International Criminal Court Act 2001, which my party rightly voted against. All hon. Members oppose war crimes, but the wording of the 2001 Act is so vague that senior officers can be held accountable for actions of which they had no knowledge, simply on the ground that they might have taken steps to prevent them. I do not intend to try your patience, Mr. Deputy Speaker, by repeating my recent speech on the workings of the 2001 Act in relation to the case of Colonel Mendonca, which is now sub judice.

I ask the courts to take into account the point that the 2001 Act works against the chain of command. The long-standing leadership principle in the British Army is that commanders delegate authority to their sub-commanders, let them get on with the job, trust them whenever they can and support them if things go wrong and they believe that their sub-commanders have behaved reasonably, which takes considerable moral courage. The ghastly news that General Peter Wall, who is a fine soldier by any standards, is being investigated for supporting one of his subordinates in such a situation under very difficult circumstances underlines the ghastliness of the 2001 Act.

Turning to the recent case against paratroopers from the 3rd Battalion of the Parachute Regiment, the case against seven members and ex-members was dropped, because the judge had concerns about the adequacy of the evidence and the integrity of the Iraqi witnesses—reportedly, the case cost £10 million of taxpayers' money. In the Lords debate on the legality of the chain of command, Lord Inge highlighted the fact that British lawyers were hawking no-win, no-fee arrangements around Iraq, promising taxpayers' money to those who would bear witness against British soldiers. So much for the deal, which the hon. Member for South Ribble has rightly emphasised, on the duty of care that we owe to our soldiers.

Why would the Government want to create a new legal apparatus and remove the power of responsible commanding officers at the same time as they are putting the Compensation Bill through the House of Lords? The Compensation Bill is a modest response to public concern about the pernicious and corrosive compensation culture, which often originates in the pursuit of money by a small number of lawyers and which destroys risk taking, personal responsibility and community spirit. It suggests to judges that they can—many of us want it to "require" judges to do this—consider the social harm of awards made against those who take responsibility.

The Armed Forces Bill, however, has the power to compromise the ability or willingness of our armed forces to take necessary action in theatres of action by removing their most important safeguard—the role of the commanding officer. For an individual soldier, the CO represents a trusted bulwark of understanding and common sense who takes account of the differences inherent in active service. Instead of being allowed to intervene, he is now threatened with committing a war crime under the 2001 Act, if he does not actively pursue a prosecution.

The Government have lost sight of the fact that a court martial system is an inquisitorial system, not an adversarial system like the civil courts. When a matter goes to court martial, it is easier to get a conviction than would be the case in a civilian court.

Andrew Mackinlay: On the hon. Gentleman's point that it is easier to get a conviction in a court martial, I understand the need for the swift administration of justice in operational battleground situations, but when an incident occurs in a home base, the case should be proven beyond reasonable doubt.

Mr. Brazier: The hon. Gentleman has made his point well. The standard of proof is, of course, supposed to be the same, but the case is decided not by a jury, but by a group of military officers. All the evidence suggests that it is almost impossible to bring a jury case against soldiers in an active theatre, because most members of the jury would not be willing to take the risk of going out there. The system, which is designed to underpin the chain of command, is inquisitorial and makes it easier to get a conviction, but we have removed the safeguard of COs allowing such cases to proceed and introduced the 2001 Act, which means that a CO may become culpable when something, in which he may not have had a hand, takes place, merely because he has allegedly suppressed evidence.

The Bill goes against a basic, underlying principle in English life. Since the Magna Carta, one of the key principles of our jury system has been trial by one's peers. Who are the peers of a man or woman who has been sent into a combat zone, which may involve a hostile land, being outnumbered or, as the Secretary of State has said, the complicated situations created by modern asymmetric warfare? The answer must be, "Other members of the armed forces." The current system involves a random selection of members of the armed forces being put on to a panel, which provides a degree of independence that echoes a jury trial, albeit within an inquisitorial system. The Bill will introduce a standing court martial, which, bluntly, will consist of a group of case-hardened officers who conduct such cases all the time—it may be that such officers have not seen active service for some time, if they have done so at all. It will make it easier to get convictions.

In a statement about the failure of the case against seven members of the Parachute Regiment, the Minister of State, the right hon. Member for East Kilbride, Strathaven and Lesmahagow (Mr. Ingram), said:

> "This case has shown our determination to ensure that justice is done irrespective of the difficulties."—[Official Report, 7 November 2005; Vol. 439, c. 22.]

I think that he meant that justice is being done in a way which will appease left-wing elements in the media, who seem to think that our armed forces are responsible for a chain of atrocities. It is true that there have been a small number of genuine incidents in which there has been genuine public concern, but it should not have led to a situation in which our forces feel under "legal siege"—not my words, but those of a former Chief of the Defence Staff speaking in another place in July.

The Bill includes many measures, some of which are welcome, but three major changes have occurred or are occurring to the balance of probability of a conviction: first, the Bill removes the safeguard of scrutiny by the CO, the man who really understands the situation; secondly, the 2001 Act specifies that if COs do not process the papers on a case, they may be done for war crimes; and thirdly, the Bill contains a ridiculous proposal to move away from a proper selection of officers for a court martial towards the ghastly idea of a kangaroo court, which a standing court martial could easily become, of officers who do nothing else over a long period.

The Government should have heeded the warnings that the six chiefs of staff gave us in July about the pressure that the armed forces feel under from the legal profession at a time when they are being worked extremely hard and facing considerable dangers in Iraq and Afghanistan. It is extraordinary that the Government should introduce a Bill that will increase those pressures and make it much easier for members of the armed forces doing their duty in Iraq to be convicted of offences that in some cases are not even recognised in any previous form of English law.

This is a bad Bill. I hope that we manage to achieve some changes in Committee, but if not, I sincerely hope that we will vote against it on Third Reading.

8.29 pm

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): I congratulate the architects of the Bill, who have brought before Parliament a most interesting measure that is worthy of great study. It is highly appropriate to subject it to the innovative Select Committee procedure for examining legislation. Although the House has had that option for some time, it has not used it very often. I hope that this Bill will be pioneering in the sense that it becomes the usual practice, instead of the exception, in dealing with legislation.

Every speech by colleagues—I use that word deliberately because I want to include Members on both sides of the House—has contained some stimulating thoughts. I cannot recall a debate in which I have agreed substantially with so many aspects of the cases that Members have advanced. Their contributions have been not only cogent but fair and legitimate, and they will be good material for the Select Committee procedure that will follow this Second Reading.

I want to raise an issue that is new to this debate. Parliament is very conservative—in a non-partisan sense—about having a representative body for members of our armed forces. I am not suggesting a trade union or a body like the Police Federation, but a unique representative body that can do several things, including giving advice, counsel and support to individual members of our armed forces when they feel in some difficulty. There is a manifest need for that. I am as certain as night follows day that one day this House will enact such legislation, and that after a short space of time people will look back in amazement and wonder what the fuss was about. Of course, that Bill would have enshrined in it safeguards to protect the operational decisions of commanders in conflict situations. That would be writ large and understood. Such a measure would be modernising and sensible, and it will inevitably come. I regret that the main parties do not see it as an innovation that would put us in front of many other armed forces in ensuring that the interests of our servicemen and women are protected.

Such a body would benefit the Government by being a champion of our armed forces in terms of promoting their function, role, ethos and doctrines within the United Kingdom while helping to project them around the world in the positive way that, mercifully, they have always largely maintained. I wish we could begin to contemplate a representative body in addition to an independent complaints body. Indeed, the former could make representations to the latter.

An area that has been omitted from the Bill and has not been discussed, but which we cannot long avoid discussing in the context of military discipline, is the increasing interface of our armed forces with large numbers of people working for private military companies. Only a few years ago, they were relatively few in number and it would have been considered extraordinary that Her Majesty's Government were hiring private military companies.

When the Labour Government took office, the issue first came up in the context of our support for the Government of Sierra Leone. There was an interface with Sandline and other related companies that had the potential to cause embarrassment not only to the Government but to our armed forces, especially when the Royal Navy helped to repair a Sandline helicopter. The ground rules need to be clearly set out for commanders and those who have to make decisions, especially when they are being coaxed, encouraged or given a nod and a wink by the Ministry of Defence or the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to work alongside—and, I fear, collaborate with—private military companies. I am uncomfortable with that.

A few years ago, the Government produced a Green Paper on private military companies. The Foreign Affairs Committee said that such matters should be regulated and that there should be an equivalent of end-use certificates for private military companies. We expressed our concern about rules of engagement and circumstances in which private military companies work alongside or with our regular armed forces.

The other great fear is that Governments—including our Government, albeit unintentionally—are attracted by private military companies because they give an opportunity of denial if things go wrong, or in the case of what would otherwise be perceived as a military offence, such as bad conduct. Those companies also have a capacity to dissolve themselves so that it is difficult to call anybody to account subsequently.

Newspapers reported in the past month how the United Kingdom Government hire and have contracts with enormous numbers of private military companies—I call them mercenary soldiers but I do not want to be provocative—and the costs involved. As sure as night turns into day, some commanders will soon be greatly embarrassed by the fact that, because it is the will of Her Majesty's Government—namely the Ministry of Defence and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office—they have had to work alongside those people.

Unless and until we start to draw up strict ground rules, there are all the ingredients for at least embarrassment and for decent people facing charges and falling foul of the International Criminal Court Act 2001, with which I shall deal shortly. I did not agree with much that the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) said about it, but there is a danger of people being embarrassed by those whom they have to work alongside, who are unaccountable and not subject to military discipline. That is a matter of grave concern. Perhaps those who serve on the Select Committee that considers the Bill will at least scratch the surface of the subject in their deliberations.

Many hon. Members referred to various clauses. I was interested in clause 25. It is worth drawing the attention of the House—and the royal household—to it. It states:

"A person subject to service law commits an offence if he misapplies or wastes any public or service property."

It refers to

"rows 2 to 12 of the Table in section 163."

That provision sets out all the punishments that would apply if there were an abuse of military material and equipment. That sanction and warning, which is on the face of the Bill, applies to all military personnel from the humblest to those of royal rank.

I listened carefully to the welcome from hon. Members of all parties for bringing together the military law of the three services. It occurs to me that, if and when the Bill is enacted, there will be a compelling case for our reviewing the service police. I am very much a traditionalist. Indeed, I am displaying tonight a small memento of the Essex Regiment. I had to leave the Chamber briefly when the antique badge was presented to me by Mr. Blake Perkins from the United States earlier this evening. I said that I would be proud to wear it during this debate. That regiment is important to me, as I know it is to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I tell the House this story only to emphasise that I am a traditionalist.

I want to maintain the Royal Military Police and the police services of the Royal Air Force and the Navy. However, there are some parallels with the three nursing services of the armed forces, in that the police forces are badged separately but should, operationally, increasingly work together. There would be obvious benefits from economies of scale and from the use of new technologies and the need for specialisms in any police investigatory service. Logically, we should be thinking in terms of an integrated service police force. The police forces should be separately badged, and continue to enjoy the traditions that have endured over the centuries, which should be preserved, but we should bring the separate forces together in much the same way as we have with the nursing services.

I listened carefully to the hon. Member for Canterbury, and I think that his concerns about the International Criminal Court are wrong. He seems to be genuinely confused about the court—an institution that is ever so important—which is embryonic and fragile but which will prove, over the years, to be a great force for good and a sanction against people who are not subject to military law. In relation to our own armed forces, I would remind him that, because we have codified law, both civil and military, it does not apply to us. It provides a catch-all jurisdiction to ensure that some of the bandits around the world, who are not subject to a military code of law, do not get away.

Mr. Brazier: There is an important distinction here. Of course I have no problem with the court; I thought that I had made that clear. My objection is to its introduction into British law. The hon. Gentleman must ask himself whether there is the remotest chance either that Colonel Mendonca would have been charged or that General Peter Wall would be being investigated if it had not been for the enactment of that piece of legislation.

Andrew Mackinlay: On the former case, I am not going to trespass into sub judice. It is inappropriate for us to mention that case, and I do not feel qualified to talk about it in detail anyway. In respect of General Wall or anyone else, the law has not changed. Every commander has an obligation to pursue the conduct of war in accordance with long-established conventions and jurisdictions, and to have due regard to minimising casualties and deaths, civilian or military. That is nothing new. I am worried that the hon. Gentleman is getting exercised about that.

Mr. Brazier: I do not have chapter and verse in front of me, but let me reassure the hon. Gentleman that the provisions of the International Criminal Court Act 2001 produced new offences for commanding officers and senior officers, and they are phrased in such a way that someone can be prosecuted for having failed in principle to do something, by omission. They involve offences that would never have been covered by military law before, which is why they received so much flak in another place.

Andrew Mackinlay: The hon. Gentleman and I can conclude this discussion only by saying that we will have to agree to disagree. I do not accept that there is a new duty. Military commanders have always had to satisfy themselves that they are behaving consistently with United Kingdom law and with international rules. It is interesting that the service commanders sought their own legal advice in relation to the conflict in Iraq. It was sensible of them to do that. As an aside, if the House ever had to return to a similar situation, we should seek our own independent advice, as distinct from that of the Attorney-General, who advises Her Majesty's Government. It seems to me that that is the parallel or the lesson to be learned.

I agree with the concern expressed by the hon. Member for Canterbury and others that there have been prosecutions, or at least investigations, causing great distress to individual service men and women and their colleagues, in circumstances that anyone who stepped back and realised that split-second decisions had to be made would recognise were cruel and unfair. I contrast what happened at a tube station in London, in relation to which no prosecutions, arrests or charges have been made, with what happens to our soldiers, in respect of whom investigations, suspensions and arrests take place. I find the double standard amazing. What happened in a south London tube station has been fudged by the British establishment, the Metropolitan Police and particularly the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, who seems to me to have a disproportionate command and capacity to decide what happens in this country. Individual soldiers, however, who must make immediate decisions where they and their colleagues are clearly under threat—in Northern Ireland, Afghanistan, Iraq or any other area of conflict or peacekeeping—often face arrest. I find the disparity unacceptable and illogical.

I also want to interest the House in one other matter. I have tabled questions during the lifetime of this Labour Government about the Bermuda Regiment. Clauses 359 and 373 contain references to military outfits whose existence arises from the decision or part funding of a legislature of an overseas territory. This is an ambiguous and unsatisfactory area. In essence, the Bill says that where someone in, say, the Royal Gibraltar Regiment or the Bermuda Regiment is alongside, training with or operational with the mainstream British armed forces, he or she is subject to that military discipline. It also indicates that the legislation can be transferred by Order in Council to an organisation such as the Bermuda Regiment. This is unsatisfactory. I think that it suits the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Government of Bermuda—I deliberately distinguish between the Government of Bermuda and the Government of Gibraltar—to have that grey area.

That is extremely relevant, because unless there has been a recent change that has not been drawn to the attention of the House, Bermuda has compulsory national service for men. That immediately flags up to Members of the House the fact that there is gender discrimination. In addition, those who refuse to serve are not just arrested but taken in chains, United States-style, in jumpsuits, and with both their feet and arms in manacles. I find that humiliating, and it is contrary to our obligations, particularly under the European convention on human rights. Before someone points out to me that Bermuda is not in Europe—I do know that—we still have a moral commitment, as we say that we are signed up to that convention, and Bermuda is an overseas territory, not an independent country. It chose not to go for independence. The Governor of Bermuda, who is the commander-in-chief of Bermuda and therefore of the Bermuda Regiment, is appointed by Her Majesty's Foreign Secretary.

I imagine that this is the first time that the dear Minister sitting on the Front Bench has heard this. He is a decent man and I hope that he will go away and say, "Is what Mackinlay says remotely true?" Grudgingly, those whom he asks will have to say yes. I hope that the Minister will respond by saying that the position is unacceptable, and that the Government cannot tolerate a complete ignoring of our obligations under the European convention on human rights. After all, the Bill carries a certificate—dealt with, I would guess, rather routinely and ritualistically by the Lord Chancellor, or whatever he is called now, and the Attorney-General—stating that it complies with the convention, but it does not in respect of Bermuda.

I think it is time that we decided on the status of that regiment. I made a distinction between it and the Gibraltar Regiment because, owing to the sheer nature of Gibraltar, the men and women who serve in the Gibraltar Regiment are daily closely integrated with the rest of the United Kingdom forces. They share training and a key location, and have done all that they can to identify themselves with the British Army.

Robert Key: Where do the Gibraltar defence police fit into the hon. Gentleman's argument?

Andrew Mackinlay: Nowhere. Since the hon. Gentleman asks, however, let me say that I am very interested in Gibraltar. The Gibraltar Services Police are comparable to the Ministry of Defence police, as distinct from the military police. They wear blue uniforms, they are what I call bobbies, and they are badly served by Her Majesty's Government—again, unintentionally, but on another occasion I shall be having chats with the Minister about them. They do not have a police authority, and they should; they do not have federation rights, and they should; but that is not relevant to the Bill, so, as you will note, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am not raising it now. Nevertheless, the hon. Gentleman was right to bring it to our attention.

Under the heading

"Review of summary findings and punishments", clause 151 states

"Where—

(a) a charge has been heard summarily, and

(b) a finding that the charge has been proved has been recorded, the finding or the punishment awarded may be reviewed at any time."

You will recall, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that both under the last Conservative Government and during the lifetime of this Labour Government, when the present Secretary of State was Minister for the Armed Forces, I drew the House's attention to the case of more than 300 British soldiers who had been executed during the first world war on charges set out in part 1 of the Bill: cowardice, desertion, sleeping at post, throwing away arms, and hitting a superior officer. I thought that it was a shade unfair, to say the least, that they had been executed. The present Secretary of State came to the House, and—I deeply regret this—I was rather polite to him at the time. I went away very sad and angry, and decided not to let the matter rest.

I want to be fair to the Secretary of State. He made a speech acknowledging that many of the executions had been unfair, but he advanced a case for not reviewing them. I do not believe that it is a matter of history. The daughter of Harry Farr, executed in October 1916, has taken the Secretary of State to court. Her name is Gertie, and I was privileged to meet her mother. Having checked with the Table Office and the Clerks Department, I find that the matter is not sub judice, and I am pleased to say that I can refer to it.

Some weeks ago, the judge looked over his desk to counsel for the MOD and asked whether counsel would like to reflect on the matter and return in January. We need to know what the Secretary of State is thinking. I raise the issue now because I believe that the Bill's long title, and clause 151, give me an opportunity to table amendments giving effect to a private Member's Bill that I have tabled in the past—it commanded support from all parts of the House—to grant a posthumous pardon to those 300-odd soldiers who were executed during the first world war. It would be much better if Her Majesty's Government took the initiative on this matter. To anyone who says that they will not do so, I have to say that, for reasons that I shall explain, they are thinking about it again.

The New Zealand Parliament has unilaterally granted pardons to members of the Otago Regiment who were executed. Strictly speaking, in respect of our constitution, that is constitutionally irregular. The only Government or Parliament with responsibility for this issue is based at Westminster, because it applies to what were British empire forces. To its credit, I believe, the New Zealand House of Representatives in Wellington decided unilaterally to grant pardons.

The third point—the first being the Harry Farr case, to which the Secretary of State will have to respond in the not too distant future, and the second being the New Zealand case—relates to the Taoiseach who, more than a year ago, made a submission to the Ministry of Defence, arguing that the Irish soldiers among the 300 should be pardoned. Given that the Secretary of State for Defence, when he was Minister of State for Defence, stood before Parliament and said, "No, regrettably, it cannot be done", one might think that he would have sent off a letter to Dublin saying the same thing. However, he has not done so, as I have ascertained from a parliamentary question during the last couple of weeks. The reply said that a response would be given to the Government of the Irish Republic in due course.

The Under-Secretary, currently in his place, has some competence in this matter. I hope that he will not consider it offensive for me to say it, but when I approached him about this matter informally, he suggested that dealing with it was above his pay grade. I can understand that and I took it that he was not necessarily unsympathetic, but I expect someone somewhere to respond to the issue. A response must be given to the Irish Republic—[Interruption.] I see the Secretary of State assuming his place. From the bottom of my heart, I hope that he will accept that a compelling case has been made and that public opinion has not abated but grown in support of granting pardons. Consistent with "Erskine May" and our Standing Orders, I believe that either the Bill can be amended to provide for pardons for the 300 or we can establish an independent review panel, as distinct from the Secretary of State, to look into the cases. Now would be great opportunity for him to acknowledge that he is considering the matter.

John Reid: I listened to my hon. Friend's contribution from my office while I was attending another meeting. He will know that, seven years ago, I spent 15 months examining these 306 cases. In 114 cases, I read the files myself. I came up against an apparently immovable obstacle to the granting of a legal pardon. My hon. Friend will also know that I interpreted and extended the word "pardon" to mean forgiveness and understanding. I allowed the names of people who were executed to be put back into memorials and cenotaphs, I abolished the death penalty and I went as far as I could without making a specifically legal case. As I understand it, I am now being asked to consider not a full pardon, but a conditional pardon relating to the sentence. When that matter reaches me, I will reflect on it seriously, but I cannot give my hon. Friend any guarantee that, while looking at the issue sympathetically, I will be any more successful than I was last time.

Andrew Mackinlay: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for that and I hope that he will understand how strongly I feel about this matter. What he said seems to me to leave the door slightly open. He was clearly referring to the court case of Harry Farr, but he cannot ignore the fact that the Taoiseach wrote a formal submission about a year and a half ago. Clearly, the Irish Government expect, and are entitled to expect, a reply in respect of what are loosely called "the Irish soldiers"—soldiers among the 306 who fought in the Irish regiments.

I acknowledge the Secretary of State's work in personally reviewing those cases, but I invite him to consider setting up a judicial inquiry, or appointing a judge or someone of that category to review those cases, rather than a Minister. [Interruption.] I have to say to those Members who consider this a matter of levity that there is growing and widespread support in this country for such an idea. We should not deal with this issue just because it is popular, but the fact remains that it is, and I intend—if I am able to do so—to table amendments relating to it, unless the Secretary of State decides, in the spirit of what has been said, to take it on board himself.

Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): It is always a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay), who can be counted on to find a royal angle in most Bills that come before us—congratulations to him on that.

As has been said, this Bill is the most radical revision of military law in almost 50 years, and the Bill team and the Minister should be congratulated on introducing this ambitious set of measures. It provides an opportunity to restore public confidence in the military justice system, which, as we have heard, has been called into question, whether as a result of allegations of abuse in Iraq or at home. Cases have collapsed and some have taken years to be brought to trial; others have been closed because of the inadequacy of the initial investigation. Several successful challenges have been made, moreover, to the military justice system in the European Court of Human Rights.

Whether we are idealists or realists, it is our responsibility as a society, as the Secretary of State said, to find a new consensus on the military justice system that all can unite behind. I should like to propose two general principles. In a modern democratic society, it is no longer acceptable for the military to investigate itself behind closed doors. Secondly, there has to be a timely and effective public investigation by an independent official body, and defendants and victims' families must be kept informed throughout the entire process. We can argue about how to put those principles into action in the particular operational context of military law, but they are the basic ones that I want to propose for our deliberations.

Many elements of the Bill are to be welcomed. It places a clear duty on commanding officers to ensure that cases are appropriately investigated, and it requires that service police be informed about serious cases and that they refer them to an independent director of service prosecutions, who may come from a civilian background. Those important measures are to be welcomed and they are in line with the general trend. In 1996, the previous Conservative Government created Army and other prosecuting authorities that were independent of the chain of command, and this Bill makes some important changes to the role of commanding officers.

As we have heard, however, there is continuing concern about the grievance procedures. The Bill provides a streamlined grievance procedure for members of the armed forces, but it is not clear that it provides one for their relatives or for civilians affected by military action, whether at home or abroad. There is a modernised system for internal service inquiries, but where in the Bill is provision made for an independent inquiry into matters of public concern? Although the Bill continues the trend toward greater independence, it is at its weakest on grievance procedures.

On the commanding officer's role, human rights lawyers have claimed that more than 20 inquiries into alleged abuse have been blocked by Army commanders. It would be useful to have some information on the number of alleged serious offences that have been dismissed at a commanding officer's request. There certainly appears in at least one case to be prima facie evidence of "a concerted attempt by the chain of command to influence and prevent an investigation".

That is not my contention; I am quoting directly from the Attorney-General's letter to the then Secretary of State for Defence. Indeed, the Attorney-General went on to say:

"In this particular case it was precisely because of the exercise of those powers"— the commanding officer's powers—

"that I felt it necessary to move the case to the civilian jurisdiction in order to maintain public confidence".

It therefore appears that there is a strong case for the proposed changes to the commanding officer's role.

Other concerns have been expressed by the Attorney-General and others about the quality of initial investigations. We are told that at least six prosecutions have collapsed because of inadequate investigations, and we have also heard about the case of seven members of the Parachute Regiment. We should remember that in that case the judge found that there might be "sufficient evidence . . . for a court martial board to conclude that Nadhem Abdullah"— the victim in question—

"died as a result of"—

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that no body was ever found, and that there were no hospital records whatever? How could there be a trial in a civil court in this country when there is no evidence of a body, let alone of a murder?

Adam Price: I am quoting directly from the Judge Advocate General, who said that there might be "sufficient evidence . . . for a court martial board to conclude that Nadhem Abdullah died as a result of an assault carried out by" the section, but that there was no evidence in relation to any individual defendant, so clearly the case should not have been brought.

The point that the Judge Advocate General was making was that there were serious omissions in the investigation, such as the failure to search hospital records or take DNA swabs, the fact that defendants and witnesses were not interviewed and cautioned until six months after the incident, and that the clothing of the victim should have been seized much earlier. Indeed, he reiterated that general point in evidence before the Constitutional Affairs Committee, saying that there were serious concerns in the Army prosecuting authority about the quality of the investigation.

I know that the Under-Secretary of State has said that the intention is to have closer liaison with and closer early involvement by the prosecuting authority in the investigation, as is the practice with the Crown Prosecution Service, which is now present in most police stations. It would be interesting to hear what specific proposals he can present to improve the quality of investigations, which has been such a problem in many cases.

Many hon. Members have mentioned the length of cases—they take too long to come before a court martial. Simple cases take months and some take more than a year from offence to trial. In the case of Baha Mousa it took, I think, 22 months before anyone was charged with the offence. It would be interesting to hear what the Under-Secretary has to say, as I understand that some of the proposals are intended to expedite cases. There could be a problem with resources—a matter that the hon. Gentleman has touched on in comments outside the House.

The subject of the independence of investigations has been touched on by several hon. Members. There is still some confusion in my mind about the role and jurisdiction of the civilian authorities in relation to serious offences such as rape, murder and manslaughter committed within the United Kingdom. I understand that the Secretary of State said earlier that there had been no change, and that there was already concurrent jurisdiction between the civilian and military authorities.

In his evidence to the Constitutional Affairs Committee, the Judge Advocate General said that under current law, offences of murder, manslaughter and rape committed in the UK were dealt with by the civilian court, and the court martial did not have jurisdiction, although he was of the opinion that that would change as a result of these proposals. I would be grateful if the Under Secretary clarified that matter.

As a general principle, there is a need for clear and unambiguous civilian control of the investigations of suspicious deaths within the UK. Indeed the High Court recently made that point in the case of Kathleen Thompson, criticising the Army's decision to delegate to the Royal Military Police in that case. Of course, a broader point is made by the Deepcut families and the Surrey police, who have reiterated the need for an external review of the investigations, and by the Defence Committee, in its call for an independent military complaints commission.

As we have heard, we have seen the setting up of the Independent Police Complaints Commission and the Police Ombudsman for Northern Ireland. Last year, the independent prisons ombudsman was introduced, so that it is no longer the Prison Service that investigates deaths in custody. In order to achieve public confidence and effective public scrutiny, we have an independent process in all those areas in which the state has a particular monopoly.

Pete Wishart: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point. Does he agree that the military is the last bastion standing against that trend and that it is time to ensure that we have a proper external complaints commission, authority or ombudsman to pursue such matters? When the Army investigates itself, there is a sense of institutional protectionism—it attempts to protect its own interests. We need a completely separate process to monitor and examine complaints effectively in order to satisfy public opinion and the families involved.

Adam Price: I agree; we need an independent process to maintain public confidence. If proper processes were in place to ensure effective public scrutiny, the greatest benefit would be to the armed forces.

In the response by Ministers to the previous Defence Committee's report on Deepcut, the promise was made that the Government would look at the international models that it mentioned. The hon. Member for Salisbury (Robert Key) also mentioned those models. There is a wide range of international models, all with different elements of independent oversight of procedures. The Government have made some compromise, with an independent member of the grievance panel, but that will not be enough to satisfy the Deepcut families or the wider public interest in independence in the process. External review does happen, and I understand that South Wales police and Lancashire police have occasionally been asked to participate in peer review of investigations. However, we do not have a single, independent body to which families, service personnel or members of the public can make their complaints.

The Judge Advocate General made some additional proposals to improve the independence of the process. For example, he said that the military court service, which is now part of the MOD, should join the civilian court service as part of the Department for Constitutional Affairs; that the administrative staff and those responsible for listing cases should be the responsibility of the judges, as in the civilian system, and not of officials in the MOD; and that sentencing should be done by judges, not by the military panels that currently decide penalties within a bracket set by the Judge Advocate General.

The key point is the need for an independent ombudsman. Otherwise the only avenues available for families or civilians abroad—in areas where we are in military occupation—will be to call for a public inquiry, with all the expense that that means for the public purse, or through the system of tort. It has always been possible, of course, to bring civil proceedings against the British Army, but that requires expenditure by the individuals. Surely an independent military complaints commission or ombudsman would be the most effective remedy, whether for the family of Baha Mousa in Iraq, where we were responsible as the military occupation gave us jurisdiction, for the Deepcut families or in other allegations of abuse. It would allow greater public scrutiny, which is a feature of the American system.

Whatever our feelings about the allegations of abuse levelled at American forces, the degree of public scrutiny by the American authorities is unparalleled compared with the amount of public scrutiny we have been able to effect in the UK. At the last count, there were 12 reports by the American authorities into allegations of abuse in Iraq—Schlesinger, Taguba, Jones, Fay, Kern, Church and so on—on top of the congressional inquiries. There has been nothing like that in the UK. We understand that after the Camp Breadbasket case, the Army conducted an internal review, but we are not allowed to see it. We do not even know whether it has been completed. It covers many issues that are sub judice and we do not need to see those, but a version of the report would inform our debates. We have nothing like the public scrutiny of the military that is undertaken in the United States and other jurisdictions.

I want to make a few points about legal representation. Much opprobrium has been heaped on the heads of human rights lawyers who acted for Iraqi civilians. I do not want to enter that debate, but many of those lawyers operated pro bono publico—in the public interest—and where we deny Iraqis the right to take cases under local law it is our responsibility to ensure that they have adequate legal representation in UK courts. Where there is a status of forces agreement internationally, rather than blackguarding such human rights lawyers, we should consider procedures for providing adequate legal representation for civilians in those areas.

I agree with the point made by the hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble): soldiers found guilty of murder, rape or bullying should not be allowed to remain in the Army and to rejoin it on their release. A recent case involving two members of the Guards who were found guilty of manslaughter and allowed to rejoin the regiment caused much upset to the family of Peter McBride, the individual who was killed. Queen's regulations state that a person should be dismissed after a custodial sentence unless there are exceptional circumstances. Will the Minister tell us whether changes are proposed as a result of the Bill?

In relation to the post-appeal remedy, I understand that service personnel have no recourse to the Criminal Cases Review Commission, although Ministers have said that they should have. It is not clear why such a provision has not been included in the Bill. The Minister said that other priorities made it impossible, but perhaps he could elucidate. What are those priorities? Why has not it been possible to include the provision?

9.18 pm

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): This has been a fascinating debate. It is to the great credit of the House that it has been able to conduct such an informed and well-argued debate despite the fact that this 375-clause, 250-page, 15-schedule Bill was made available to us only 10 days ago and the explanatory notes only last week. The debate has been better than we might have anticipated.

In a spirit of generosity, I thank the Under-Secretary for making available himself and his Bill team to brief some hon. Members last Thursday. I should like to add to the compliments that have been extended already to those in the Bill team for the work that they have done. However, it is worth making the point that the Government have had a long time in which to prepare the Bill, that the Defence Select Committee has not had a draft of the Bill and that the Opposition have had even less time.

However, we have had a good debate with a lot of contributions from hon. Members on both sides of the House. The hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy) welcomed the proposals on the redress of grievances, but she did not think that they went far enough. She, like many other hon. Members who have spoken today, supports the reinstatement of the annual review.

The hon. Member for Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk (Mr. Moore) broadly supports the Bill. He was concerned that we must not undermine the armed forces. Nevertheless, he thought that a few provisions might be needed that some hon. Members might feel would lead to that effect. He, too, is in favour of an annual review.

[Mr. Gerald Howarth]

The hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones), with whom I had the privilege of serving on the Defence Committee of which he was an assiduous member, argued the case for creating an independent commission, which is very much in line with what the Select Committee has been proposing.

My right hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hampshire (Mr. Arbuthnot)—a former distinguished Minister for Defence Procurement, now the even more distinguished Chairman of the Select Committee on Defence—faithfully argued the cause espoused by his Committee in saying that he wanted an independent commission and an annual report, two things of which the Committee has been strongly in favour. He drew on his own experience of the Mull of Kintyre issue as evidence to support his case.

My right hon. Friend made an interesting point about the tri-service nature of the Bill. It is accepted that a 50 per cent. increase in courts martial is likely in respect of the Royal Navy, as a result of the changes to that service. As a number of right hon. and hon. Members have pointed out, the Royal Navy is the service that is most affected by the proposals. A matter of keen further debate in the Select Committee is likely to be whether we have got the arrangements right and whether the prize of harmonisation, as Captain Crabtree described it in evidence to the Defence Committee, is worth the price that is being paid by the Royal Navy. The jury is out on that issue, and we must examine it in more detail later.

My right hon. Friend drew further on the importance of the Defence Committee being represented on the Committee that will consider the Bill, and I am sure that that will be the case.

The hon. Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) duly praised the Select Committee—always a good start—expressed her concern for the parents who have lost their children as a result of tragedies in the armed services and referred to the need to remove what she called the stain of Deepcut. I do not intend to dwell very much on the Deepcut issue, but I am well aware that it is of very great concern on both sides of the House. Of course, Deepcut lies just over the border of my constituency.

My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Robert Key) made a very spirited contribution. I am extremely grateful to him for the very detailed work that he has done on the Bill and for drawing my attention to clause 35, on annoyance by flying. As an aviator, I have to say that he is absolutely right about the risks that the Royal Air Force could be exposed to by a literal interpretation of that clause. I am sure that that matter will be explored in even greater detail—it certainly will be if I have anything to do with it because, as I read it, even in Farnborough, I have constituents who are likely to be annoyed by anything that flies in the air, and I am sure that the situation is even worse in other constituencies. I think that we will have to revisit that one. I am not sure whether my hon. Friend noticed this, but interestingly enough the penalty for a person found guilty of the offence would be up to and including dismissal from the service. There is thus a pretty draconian penalty attached to the offence.

My hon. Friend drew attention to the crucial role of chaplains. As a churchwarden of the Royal Garrison church in Aldershot, I have the privilege of working with military chaplains. It is entirely right and proper to put on the record the fantastic work that is being done by chaplains, especially Army chaplains, in the difficult theatre of Iraq.

The hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Borrow) welcomed the tri-service aspect of the Bill. He wants it to restore morale, which he says has taken a knock on the question of whether a military or civilian approach should apply.

I was sorry that I missed the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier). I gather that he made a typically trenchant speech, and he certainly gave me encouragement during my earlier interventions. He apparently said that behind the Bill lies what he called an ugly trend of civilianising the armed services, and he was right to issue such a warning. He also expressed concern about removing the powers of commanding officers, which is a matter to which I hope to return in a moment. I gather that he would like us to vote against the Bill on Third Reading, but that will depend on the progress that is made during the Select Committee proceedings.

John Reid: On the speech made by the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier), may I clear up something that he has repeated several times that is factually inaccurate? It is not for us to comment in any way on the merits of a case before the courts. However, it is quite wrong to suggest that the charges laid against Colonel Mendonca arise from the International Criminal Court Act 2001—they do not. They arise from section 29A of the Army Act 1955. The offences of which the soldiers are charged in the case pre-exist the International Criminal Court Act because inhumane treatment has been in English law since the adoption of the Geneva conventions into English law in 1957. Manslaughter has been in English law for decades. The fact that the offences were rolled into the International Criminal Court Act does not mean that they were introduced by that Act. I want to place the factual record before hon. Members because there has been repeated inadvertent misleading of the House on the matter.

Mr. Howarth: I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury has noted the Secretary of State's comments. Obviously, I was not in the Chamber when my hon. Friend made his speech.

Mr. Brazier: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Howarth: I will be delighted to give way to my hon. Friend in a moment, but may I tell the Secretary of State that in the briefing—I am sorry to make the point again that we had no other briefing—titled "Background to the Forthcoming Armed Forces Bill", the House of Commons Library, to which people have rightly paid tribute, referred to the case of the Queen's Lancashire Regiment and the Intelligence Corps? The briefing said:

"The latter case has attracted particular comment as it represents the first case brought against British Service personnel under the provisions of the International Criminal Court Act 2001 and the first case against an officer for 'negligently performing a duty', resulting from operations in Iraq."

Mr. Howarth rose—

John Reid: There is nothing inconsistent between that and my accurate description of the fact that the offences of inhumane treatment and manslaughter for which charges were brought were of long standing in English law—both military and civilian—and existed long before the International Criminal Court Act 2001. In the case of Colonel Mendonca, the charges were brought under section 29A of the Army Act 1955. That is the accurate position. It is up to hon. Members to regret, perhaps, that the offences were incorporated in the International Criminal Court Act, or that the Act was passed, but it is quite wrong to imply that the offences would not have been extant in English law if the Act had not been in force. They would have been in law under the Army Act, English law and the Geneva conventions that were brought into our law in 1957—incidentally, under a Conservative Government.

Mr. Howarth: I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury has heard that. He might wish to intervene.

Mr. Brazier: The Secretary of State has made the point that we are not allowed under the sub judice rule to comment on a particular case, although the investigation currently being carried out in respect of General Wall has not yet resulted in charges, so we could comment on that. The Secretary of State must accept—this is not just me speaking but a number of distinguished and gallant Members of another place—that the provision to which he refers takes us on to entirely new ground. For the first time, commanding officers can in principle be charged for errors of omission which would not have been offences under military law.

Mr. Howarth: I am sure that the House is grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention.

Lying behind recent cases has been the perception—we all know the importance of perception, and my hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) made that clear—that if it is not the European Court of Human Rights, it is the International Criminal Court that is exerting a pressure. Whether the Secretary of State likes it or not, that is the impression that is being created. It is a serious matter. My view is that it has been wrong that we in the United Kingdom, and particularly we in this Parliament, have been obliged to change the regulations by which our armed forces are governed to meet the requirements of a court.

I see that the Secretary of State shakes his head. The Armed Forces Discipline Act 2000 was directly the result of a ruling of the European Court of Human Rights. One of the reasons why we have a tri-service Bill, if I might tell the Secretary of State why he is introducing the Bill, is because there have been a number of Acts since 1955 and 1957—separate services Acts—arising directly out of decisions made by the European Court of Human Rights, to which the House has felt obliged to respond.

I note that the Secretary of State wishes to intervene. As long as his hon. Friend the Minister does not keep tapping his watch at me, I will give way to the right hon. Gentleman.

John Reid: I am merely responding to the specific allegations about the specific case. It might as well be argued that the Geneva conventions and protocols of 1957 led to the charges against Colonel Mendonca and his men. It is precisely the concept of inhumane treatment introduced under the 1957 Geneva protocols, brought into law by the then Conservative Government, that forms the legal basis that led to incorporation under the later ICC legislation. That puts in context the sort of perceptions that are being encouraged by misleading statements in this area. I do not deny that there is a perception, but part of that perception is being fuelled and encouraged by those who are making misleading statements, inadvertently or otherwise, about the nature of specific charges being brought against specific people.

Mr. Howarth: Clearly, these charges are being brought under English law. Charges cannot be brought in any other way in an English court. The question still arises whether they would have been brought had it not been for the existence of the ICC.

The Secretary of State will be aware that in a debate in the other place on 14 July a number of significant contributions were made. I draw the Secretary of State's attention to the contribution of Lord Campbell of Alloway, who spent five years in Colditz. He is not a man who is unfamiliar with military matters. He drew attention to a letter that had been sent by the Adjutant-General on 24 March to "CGS and CIC Land" in respect of what I think was Trooper Williams' case. My hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury referred to it and it is worth putting it on the record again. The Adjutant-General wrote:

"With current legal, political and ginger group interest in the deaths of Iraqi civilians during operation telic: our investigation and subsequent failure to offer for prosecution could become a cause celebre for pressure groups, and a significant threat to the military justice system."

I submit that it is not a threat to the military justice system; it is a threat to our armed forces. They are being treated in a fashion where they are being used effectively as guinea pigs to satisfy a demand for what amounts to a pretty rough justice. In that letter, one of the most senior generals in the British Army said that we were under pressure to bring prosecutions. That is not acceptable.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I am very fond of the hon. Gentleman, who is a former member of the Defence Committee. However, he is clearly out of step with his Front Bench team, as a consensual mood of politics is supposed to prevail. The Secretary of State clearly explained the position, so efforts to perpetuate anti-Euro myths will not do anything to help the British armed forces.

Mr. Howarth: It has nothing to do with anti-Euro myths or with anything else. Time is short, and I have made that point.

[Mr. Howarth]

The hon. Members for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) and for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) both called for independent investigations. The hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr allied himself to human rights lawyers, which was brave of him.

Several hon. Members have referred to written evidence from the Judge Advocate General to the Constitutional Affairs Committee, in which he said:

"There are several cogent reasons for maintaining a unique system of military justice, separate and distinct from the civilian system. These are to:

—support operational effectiveness and morale;

—maintain discipline which is an essential element of command;

—reflect the special and unique nature of the Armed Forces, in which sailors, soldiers and airmen are required to use lethal force to support Government policy, to risk their personal safety, and to be prepared to lay down their lives for their country; and —extend the law of England and Wales to personnel serving overseas and outside the jurisdiction of the civilian courts.

He continued:

"The limited powers of Commanding Officers to deal summarily and immediately with minor offences are subject to the unfettered right of the defendant to elect trial by Court-Martial or to appeal to the Summary Appeal Court for a de novo hearing after the Commanding Officer's hearing. The two tiers together (Courts-Martial and summary dealings) amount to a system which is proportionate, effective, economical, ECHR compliant, and meets the unique requirements of the Armed Forces."

I do not think that any of us could better encapsulate the importance and relevance of a separate military system. Broadly speaking, we support the thrust of the Bill, which is why we shall not oppose it on Second Reading. However, we have a number of reservations. My hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring made it clear that we are concerned about the ramifications for the authority of commanding officers. It is not as though we are discussing these things in a rarefied academic forum. We are doing so against a backdrop of challenges that face our armed forces day in, day out as they make life and death decisions, and I make no apology for repeating that to the Secretary of State. A group of soldiers on patrol do not know whether the man with his hand in the air is holding a grenade or a tomato. We must give our men the benefit of the doubt in those circumstances, because if we do not do so we will destroy the very system in which we take great pride.

There is genuine concern about such matters, which I hope the Committee will be able to address. The two cases in the civilian courts that have been mentioned—the Trooper Williams case and the case involving seven members of 3 Para—both collapsed. It was disgraceful that a lawyer went to Iraq to trawl for Iraqis, who were basically bounty hunters collecting £100 a day from the British taxpayer to denounce our armed forces. That is unacceptable, and I believe the Iraqi Government should apologise for the disgraceful action of those Iraqis, who did nothing to promote the cause of Iraq among the British people. The problems highlighted by those cases must be addressed.

A few final points—first, the Bill makes no reference to rules of engagements, which are of concern to us all. There ought to be some provision for those. Secondly, we must have an annual review, for the reasons that I outlined. There is common consent right across the House that annual review is essential. Thirdly, I hope that the Bill is not a prelude to some sort of Canadian-style merger of all three services. The Secretary of State shakes his head—I take great encouragement from that. One of the strengths of our system is the individual ethos of each service. We are trying to harness and retain the individual ethos within a more procedurally efficient system.

The Bill will be committed to a Select Committee. I am sorry that that will conclude on 27 April. It is a complex Bill, but we have a month longer than was originally offered, so that, at least, is encouraging.

In conclusion, I happened to be in Basra the night that two members of the British armed forces were rescued. I spoke to Brigadier Lorimer the following night, and I know the Secretary of State had phoned to congratulate him on an outstanding operation. The dramatic pictures of those Coldstream Guardsmen getting out of those Warriors on fire went around the world. A couple of days later I happened to be in al-Udeid in Qatar, which is a US airbase where Britain has a significant presence. I was sitting in the canteen watching that on CNN, and the sheer amazement of the American servicemen and women that our armed forces had put up with that level of provocation without a shot being fired said a vast amount about the self-restraint and self-discipline of our armed forces. In that, we should take great pride. It is very important that in the Bill we do nothing that will undermine the power of commanding officers and the bond between commanding officers and their men which led to that self-restraint and self-discipline, which are admired throughout the world.

9.41 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): This has been an important debate, with significant contributions. I shall try to answer as many points as I can, but I hope Members will forgive me if I cannot cover every point.

We place an enormous responsibility on the shoulders of our servicemen and women. We ask them to operate in circumstances that are often difficult, unpredictable and dangerous. We ask them to perform tasks that have no parallel in the civilian world. Sometimes they make the ultimate sacrifice. We, and they, demand very high standards of behaviour, whether overseas on operations or training at home. Discipline is essential and service law is essential to enforce it. Ultimately we all want an effective, efficient fighting force. At the heart of discipline in any military unit is the commanding officer, and as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made clear in his opening remarks, this key role is retained and reinforced in the Bill. There is no doubt we need a separate system of law for the armed forces, and it needs to reflect the increasingly joint nature of their work. The Bill delivers that.

I shall cover as many points raised by colleagues as I can. The hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox), at the Dispatch Box for the first time in his new role, spoke several times about perception and mentioned the Royal Military Police giving warnings in Basra to our troops there. He said that there is a perception that, in Iraq, they will face investigation if they kill or seriously injure someone in battle. This is an important matter and I want to deal with it clearly.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, our forces operate within the rule of law and have robust rules of engagement. No soldier has ever been prosecuted for killing an enemy in battle. If there is a credible allegation of, say, murder, it is right that the service police carry out an investigation. The Bill offers protection to the accused in that respect as well. He went on to quote the noble Lord in another place who stated, as was mentioned several times this evening, that our forces are under legal siege. I totally reject that. It is important that we get the message across that there have been 80,000 deployments in Iraq since we have been there. As my right hon. Friend said earlier today, there have been 184 investigations and 164 have been concluded. Our forces are not under legal siege at all.

Linda Gilroy: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Touhig: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I want to cover as many points as possible, although I would normally give way.

The hon. Member for Woodspring pointed out that he agrees that perception is a key problem, and I hope that Conservative Front Benchers will join me and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in debunking the perception that our forces are under "legal siege", because they are not.

The hon. Gentleman suggested opting out of the European convention on human rights, as the French have done. The French reservation is often quoted erroneously, because it no longer impacts significantly on the French military justice system following legislative reforms in 1982 and 1999 that provided for greater involvement by the civilian courts. The French model does not commend itself to us at all.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether serving personnel are at risk of prosecution by the International Criminal Court, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State addressed the matter in his intervention on the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) a few minutes ago. It would not be right to go into further detail on the case of Colonel Mendonca and others associated with that matter, except to say that my right hon. Friend has clarified the situation.

The hon. Member for Woodspring raised his concern about the reviewing authority. Under review, a person who was not present in court and who has heard neither the accused nor the prosecution can quash a conviction or change a sentence that is decided by the judge and the service members of the court martial, so long as he considers the new sentence to be no more severe. That power has no parallel in any other part of the British justice system, and we think it appropriate that it should be changed.

The hon. Gentleman discussed extra risks to soldiers caused by the extension of military jurisdiction to murder and manslaughter in the UK. A civilian jurisdiction already exists in almost all cases. It will still be right for the civilian system to consider other cases, specifically offences in a purely military context for which a military court may be more appropriate.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the number of summary hearings. At the present time, 95 per cent. of military justice matters are dealt with summarily, and we believe that that percentage will not change greatly as a result of the Bill.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the randomly selected panel. The important point is that members of the panel are selected independently and that those who are too close to a case are excluded.

The hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members discussed the five-year review and the annual review. The Government will be happy to take the views of the Defence Committee as we consider the legislation, because it is important that everybody gets a chance to have their say.

My hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy) raised a number of matters, including the duration of the service discipline Acts, a matter which we are prepared to consider. She also mentioned annual renewal, and if it is appropriate for the Committee to make representations, we will certainly listen to them.

The hon. Member for Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk (Mr. Moore), who spoke for the Liberal Democrats, expressed concern about the delay in publishing the explanatory notes. I apologise for the delay, which has happened on many occasions to all Governments, which is no excuse, but we felt that the important thing was to concentrate on getting the Bill ready. I am pleased that the explanatory notes were issued a few days after we published the Bill, but I am sorry that they were not available immediately.

The hon. Gentleman and several other hon. Members pointed out that much will be left to regulation, and I understand those concerns, which I have discussed with members of the Defence Committee and others. A great deal of work clearly remains to be done on the regulations, and I have no doubt that hon. Members will press me to provide as much information as possible. The matter is complex, but I understand that when hon. Members are asked to endorse legislation, they want to know exactly what powers they are conferring on the Secretary of State and how the Secretary of State will use them.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether we will produce draft regulations on redress. As I said, we will aim to cover those details in Committee.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) asked about the complaints commission. Some, including the Defence Committee, have expressed the view that complaints from service personnel about bullying and harassment are best dealt with by an independent ombudsman. I can see that that might be superficially attractive, but the fundamental problem is that setting up an alternative source of authority would undermine the chain of command. I believe that it is vital for the ethos and operational effectiveness of our armed forces that the role of the chain of command should be preserved. No doubt we will discuss that in Committee.

My hon. Friend mentioned the independence of service inquiries. In some cases, an independent investigation is vital—for example, in inquests and special independent inquiries. That is another matter that we will consider in Committee.

The right hon. Member for North-East Hampshire (Mr. Arbuthnot), who is Chairman of the Defence Committee, welcomed the Bill. I pay tribute to him, his Committee and his predecessors for the pre-legislative scrutiny that they carried out as we prepared the Bill. I thank him for the compliments that he paid to the Bill team. Ministers stand up here in the Chamber, but the people on the Bill team do a huge amount of work behind the scenes. I am grateful to them and to the right hon. Gentleman for his remarks.

The right hon. Gentleman made several other points that I will try to deal with. He expressed concern about the 50 per cent. increase in naval courts martial. In setting the limits of commanding officers' powers and jurisdiction, we looked very carefully at which criminal offences naval COs try summarily and asked the Navy which of those should be included in the Bill. Those that they wanted have been retained for naval COs and given to COs of other services. Eight offences are listed in the Bill. We do not think that that will result in a significant increase in courts martial, but the situation will have to be monitored with the progress of time.

My hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) raised several matters relating to family concerns. She will fully understand I am not in a position to comment on matters that are still under consideration. She said that everything that the Ministry of Defence does as regards our armed forces should be open to scrutiny. I remind her and other Members that we have five days a year when we debate defence matters in this House, so the opportunities are there to hold Ministers to account.

My hon. Friend asked why the Bill removes the link between imprisonment and dismissal. We think that the current rule is too harsh. If a member of the armed forces is sentenced to imprisonment, he must be dismissed—there is no possibility of looking at extenuating circumstances. In most cases, imprisonment will result in dismissal, but fairness demands that that is not applied rigidly. My hon. Friend asked whether service personnel will retain their rank in prison. The answer is no. In the rare circumstances in which a serviceman is sentenced to prison, he does not retain his rank. The offender will have no rank while in prison. On his release and return to service, he will, having paid his debt, revert to the rank that he held before being in prison. He will of course have lost any seniority that he would have gained during his imprisonment.

My hon. Friend raised the issue of family members attending boards of inquiry, as did the right hon. Member for North-East Hampshire. We recognise that in the past we have not always done well in that respect. That is why we have reviewed how best to meet the concerns that have understandably been expressed. Under the new arrangements introduced last year, we endeavour to ensure that the next of kin are much better informed about the progress and outcome of inquiries. I have no doubt that we shall revert to that matter in Committee.

The hon. Member for Salisbury (Robert Key) was generally pleased with the Bill. He raised several matters that I might answer better as we go through our work in Committee but I shall consider carefully his detailed points and, if it is appropriate, I shall write to him. He specifically mentioned annoyance by flying, which clause 35 covers. Clause 35 will be engraved on my gravestone. The Bill sets out all the disciplinary offences and the clause does not provide for a new offence. At the RAF's request, the offence is being retained. Few complaints of low flying result in prosecutions but I am sure that, if the hon. Gentleman gets the opportunity to serve on the Committee, he will revert to the matter.

I shall examine the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Borrow) and, if appropriate, I shall write to him in detail.

The hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) started by saying that the cuts that the Government had imposed on defence were wrong. I am not sure where he gets that information. The Conservative Government's record on defence cuts was shameful. The Government have increased expenditure on defence and we are proud of that. The hon. Gentleman said that he starts out as a sceptic about the measure, and I suspect that he will remain one. Again, he did not help by referring to a blizzard of investigations.

It is important that all we do as a Government is open to scrutiny and criticism in the House but we do the morale of our armed forces no good by suggesting that they are under legal siege or that there is a blizzard of investigations. [Interruption.] I do not care about the source of the comments. I simply stress to colleagues that, if they continue to repeat them without any basis in fact, they do great damage to the morale of our forces.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the standing court martial. I give him the benefit of the doubt—perhaps he was not in the Chamber but seeing his new leader when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State referred to the matter. If he reads Hansard tomorrow, he will realise that his question has been answered.

The hon. Gentleman said that the court martial was inquisitorial rather than adversarial. Frankly, that is nonsense—it is a load of rubbish. In an inquisitorial system, an examining judge asks questions to elicit answers and reaches a view about whether he is satisfied that the case is proved. The court martial is adversarial because there is a defence and a prosecution. Witnesses are called and it is exactly the same as a Crown court.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to civilianising the military system and removing the powers of commanding officers. I cannot understand how he interprets that from the Bill. He should examine it more closely. Perhaps because of our failure to get the explanatory notes out early, he may need to devote more time to reading it. I suggest that he does that—he will learn a great deal more as a result.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) raised many issues. He mentioned the Bermuda Regiment. When on duty, it is part of the British forces. I note his point about the appointment of the Governor of Bermuda being in the gift of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary. I will mention my hon. Friend's interest and, when there is next a vacancy, perhaps he will be considered for it.

The hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) made several points. I shall write to him should that be appropriate. Specific reference was made to the Judge Advocate General's views. I have a letter from the Judge Advocate General in which he welcomes the Bill and is pleased to give it public support.

The current military justice system is effective but needs to be brought up to date. Just as training, equipment and operations have been updated since the cold war, we need to modernise the legal system that personnel use at home and carry with them in operations. The Bill is an historic measure that fulfils a promise that we made in the armed forces strategic defence review. I commend it to the House.

Council Tax

10 pm

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): I wish to present a petition drawn up by my constituent, Mr. Derek Bunting, about council tax.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons votes to replace Council Tax with a fair and equitable tax that, without recourse to any supplementary benefit, takes into account ability to pay from disposable income, such tax to be based on a system that is free from any geographically or politically motivated discrimination, and that clearly identifies the fiscal and managerial responsibilities of all involved parties.

To lie upon the Table.

10.1 pm

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): I rise to present a petition signed by more than 40 of my constituents from Melton Mowbray and nearby, who are enraged by the burden and unfairness of the council tax, and by its doubling over the past few years.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons votes to replace the Council Tax with a fair and equitable tax that takes into account ability to pay from disposable income. The tax should be based on a system that is free from any geographically or politically motivated discrimination, and should clearly identify the fiscal and managerial respons¹bilities of all involved parties.

To lie upon the Table.

A27 (Improvements)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Coaker.]

10.2 pm

Nick Herbert (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): I am grateful for this opportunity to raise the need to improve the A27, both in and outside my constituency. I am sorry to detain the Minister this evening, but may I first congratulate him on his recent appearance on "Top Gear", and in particular on his performance as a star in a reasonably priced car? He came 15th among the celebrities, beating Sir Cliff Richard, Jordan and Vinnie Jones, but coming a full two seconds behind Dame Ellen MacArthur. His licence would not be at risk if he were to travel on the A27 in my constituency, however, because the traffic is at a complete standstill for much of the time.

The A27 runs for 68 miles along, or just inland of, the south coast. It links Portsmouth and the M27 in the west with Pevensey and the A259 in the east. It is the only defined east-west lorry route across Sussex. It is part of the south coast lifeline, giving access to the south coast ports and the channel tunnel, and it is regarded as a strategic road in Britain's transport network. Most of the A27 in West Sussex is dualled. The only stretches that are not are in Arundel and Worthing. I shall focus on the A27 around Arundel, because that is in my constituency, but I know that many of my hon. Friends are equally concerned about the lack of improvements on sections of the road in Chichester and, in particular, in Worthing.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): Just in case the Minister has not been down to the A27 recently, his advisers will tell him that it is faster to go through Chichester than to use the bypass, it is sometimes faster to go through Arundel than to use the bypass, and it is probably faster to go along the coast road than along the national road in Worthing, Shoreham and Lancing. Will the Minister please come and try it for himself?

Nick Herbert: I echo my hon. Friend's request; I hope that the Minister will come and see the problems for himself. He is smiling at the moment, but there is a serious problem.

Plans for the Arundel bypass were first formulated in 1985. Two decades later, the bypass still has not come to fruition. The bypass that exists runs between two sides of the town, cutting off one mainly residential half from the town centre. If one travels west on the A27, having eventually escaped the congestion in Worthing, one will get on to a dual carriageway for a few precious miles, but it simply runs out at Arundel. The flyover is there, and was ready for the dual carriageway to continue, but lies moribund.

That has a serious impact in several respects, the first of which is congestion. Traffic flows are continually rising on the A27. In the six years between 1994 and 2000 alone, they increased by 25 per cent. Traffic flows on the A27 are three to four times more than the designed capacity of the road, which causes long tailbacks. I became personally aware of that before I was elected as Member of Parliament for Arundel and South Downs, when I missed my grandfather's funeral as a result of extended delays, first at Arundel and then in Worthing. The traffic flow on the A27 through Arundel—a town of 4,200 inhabitants—was 27,000 vehicles a day in 2001. As the right hon. Member for North-West Durham (Hilary Armstrong), then a Transport Minister, said in 2000:

"Few can deny that the volume of traffic that passes through Arundel daily has an impact on the quality of life both of local residents and of those who must use this section of the A27 for their journey."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 7 March 2000; Vol. 345, c. 152WH.]

There is also an impact on safety. The accident rate in Arundel is twice the national average for the type of road and four times the national average for dual carriageways. I saw that again for myself on Friday when there was yet again an accident at Burpham junction, which is a particularly dangerous section of the existing inadequate road. The Highways Agency estimates that off-line improvements to the A27 at Arundel would prevent 425 accidents and 580 casualties over the next 30 years.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend, because he is describing a dire situation on the A27 in his constituency and in mine. According to the Minister's own recent written answer, however, the level of traffic in West Sussex over the next 10 years is predicted to increase by as much as 23 per cent. An increase of a quarter in the congestion that we already have can only lead to those roads being completely gridlocked in the next few years.

Nick Herbert: My hon. Friend makes a good point.

There is an impact in terms of local pollution and an environmental impact as traffic is pushed away from the A27, rat-running through the South Downs area of outstanding natural beauty. However, I want the Minister to focus on one particular impact of the failure to upgrade the road—the economic impact on the whole region.

The Minister will know, as an MP for a costal community in Kent, that while the economy of the south-east is strong, and the economy of West Sussex has traditionally performed well, there are significant areas of deprivation along the south coast, and pockets of long-term unemployment. Poor transport links continue to hamper economic growth and investment in those areas and along the whole south coast. It is estimated, on the basis of figures compiled by Sussex Enterprise and British Chambers of Commerce, that problems with transport infrastructure cost Sussex businesses an average of £29,000 a year. Cumulatively, that is an annual cost of £2 billion to the Sussex economy. The South East England Development Agency highlights the fact that one of the main issues facing the south-east is regeneration. It states:

"Major transport projects of regional significance for regeneration of the coastal South East include the comprehensive improvement of the A27, especially deliverable solutions for Worthing and Arundel."

The Government's house building plans will also be affected by inadequate transport infrastructure. The South East England regional assembly has proposed that West Sussex should provide 58,000 new homes over the next two decades. The Deputy Prime Minister could impose larger numbers still. As West Sussex county council points out, however,

"any further development would depend on infrastructure capacity being available, especially on the A27."

That infrastructure is not available at the moment.

The unhappy history of the Arundel bypass is that broad agreement on it was reached between all parties before the current Government took office. The Department for Transport, the local community, the environmental lobby, the county council and the district council all signed up to what is known as the pink-blue route, seen as minimising damage to the environment. That was for a bypass of just four miles, then costing £23.1 million, which was in the main roads programme. In the Government's 1998 roads review, however, the bypass was de-prioritised. Then, in 2002, the south coast multi-modal study recognised that there was a case for the bypass, and that it should go ahead. It recommended that, along with improvements to Chichester bypass, and consideration of Worthing and Lancing bypasses. Again, however, in 2003, the Secretary of State rejected those on environmental grounds. Since then, successive Ministers told my predecessor that the Government accepted the case for dealing with congestion at Arundel, and that proposals would be brought forward, modified to deal with the environmental objections. Those, however, have been subject to constant delays.

Most recently, the Minister informed me in September that the Highways Agency was working with the county council to find less environmentally damaging options. He also said that as part of the spending review, he would seek regional advice from SEERA's regional transport board on the priority of any emerging schemes. That means that even if the Minister decided to go ahead on the basis of the regional advice, there would not be a consultation until later this year. The timetable has slipped again.

Peter Bottomley: I think I can speak for the other Members whose constituencies are on the A27. We all know that Arundel should be dealt with first. Worthing is important but probably comes second, along with Chichester. If that saves consultation, it probably saves a year.

Nick Herbert: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's recognition that Arundel should come first, but I think that all the upgrades are important for the economic health of the region.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): What about Chichester?

Nick Herbert: I should of course mention the need for improvement at Chichester. There is already a dual carriageway there, but it needs to be upgraded.

As the Minister will know, all the regional bodies agree. The South East England Development Agency strongly supports the bypass. It points out that road investment in the south-east per capita is lower than investment in any other UK region. SEERA also supports the bypass. Indeed, it strongly condemned the Secretary of State's rejection of the A27 improvements, which it said was "perverse" and risked turning coastal Sussex into "a social and economic backwater."

The county council is strongly in favour of the bypass. West Sussex Economic Partnership, representing the local business community, is also in favour of it, believing that congestion on the A27 is one of the main barriers to economic regeneration of the coast. Sussex Enterprise supports the upgrades. Last year a poll of its members and other local businesses found that one fifth of businesses would have to consider relocating outside Sussex unless the transport infrastructure, particularly the A27, improved soon. The RAC Foundation has condemned the Government's rejection of the A27 improvements, and says that it believes strongly that the decisions should be reconsidered.

Let me deal briefly with some of the objections to the bypass. I do not believe that they stand. The first relates to the environmental impact. The original bypass route was not seen as a threat to the environment. Indeed, the Secretary of State's own decision on the preferred route noted that it was supported by English Nature, Sussex Wildlife Trust, the Arun branch of Friends of the Earth and the Sussex branch of the Council for the Protection of Rural England.

I recognise that road building is unpopular with those who are directly affected, but I hope that the Government's reticence and reluctance to support a scheme is not being influenced by protesters who began to build tree houses as a decision on the bypass seemed imminent. Decisions on these matters must be made democratically, not as a result of direct action by Swampy's friends. I myself would be anxious to ensure that a bypass did not result in the building of new housing between it and Arundel, thus changing the character of the town irrevocably, but I am assured that that could not happen, as the land concerned would be on the flood plain of the River Arun.

There is also the question of whether the bypass would go through the national park, depending on where the park's southern boundary would be, and indeed on whether such a park is created. I can tell the Minister that the bypass would run not through the downs, but below them. The council points out that the land south of Arundel is not naturally beautiful, as statutorily defined. Indeed, the preferred route does not even run through an area of outstanding natural beauty. The real impact on the national park would occur if traffic continued to be forced up through it and the downland villages. That would constitute an impact on an area of outstanding natural beauty, whether or not the park came into being.

There is also concern about the visual impact of a bridge crossing the River Arun. France seems to deal with problems of this kind very well, as anyone who has driven over the stunning Millau viaduct over the River Tarn will know. It would be perfectly possible to design a bridge that would complement the stunning view of Arundel and its castle and cathedral, which can be seen from the river bank.

I mentioned that the Minister had written to me saying that he was taking regional advice. I am concerned about the ranking of the schemes in relation to the regional transport board. The Government have been responsible for the fact that an Arundel scheme has not been developed. The board has told Arundel town council that the fact that a solution to the problems at Arundel has yet to be agreed on, together with the potential timing of any work, explains the relatively low current ranking of Arundel's bypass. We are in a Catch-22 situation. The Minister will not move until he has regional advice, while the region will not give the scheme priority until the proposals are presented. Fortunately, the merits of the bypass are being recognised at the regional level and the sub-regional report submitted to SEERA last week highlights the need to improve the A27.

In conclusion, I would like to ask the Minister how many times we have to make the case for a bypass and for improvements to the A27. Frankly, the economic case is unarguable and I believe that there is also a strong environmental case. We have been waiting 20 years since the bypass was first agreed by the Government. It has strong local support. Of course, there are some exceptions, but most people back it. In a MORI poll commissioned by the South East England Regional Agency last year, 82 per cent. of residents cited traffic levels in the region as an area of major concern—on a par with crime as a key issue. About 72 per cent. indicated a preference for bypasses that would draw traffic around towns. If the Minister is unmoved by the local case, the impact on the regional economy should surely be of concern to him. Now is the time to end the delay and give the go-ahead to improvements to the A27 at Arundel and also at Chichester and Worthing.

10.15 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert) on securing the debate and on the passion with which he has put his case. I am delighted to hear that he spends his Sunday evenings watching my brief appearance on television. I regard it as no shame whatever that Dame Ellen beat my time very considerably. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman watched last night and saw that Nigel Mansell did even better, which I put down to the fact that I had lunch with him on Tuesday and gave him a few tips.

I hear the case that the hon. Gentleman makes and I understand his passion and that of his hon. Friends who have intervened in the debate. I rather suspect that, while I am fortunate enough to hold this office, I will hear more and more questions, address more and more Adjournment debates and have more and more meetings with the relevant Conservative Members as we take the process forward.

I remind the hon. Gentleman that he said that it has been 20 years since the scheme was first proposed. By my arithmetic, that means that the Government whom he supported ignored it for 12 years. He might like to take that point up with the hon. Member for Worthing, West (Peter Bottomley), who is in his place behind him and was a transport Minister for part of that time.

Tim Loughton: Let me offer the Minister a truce. Rather than having lots of meetings with me and other West Sussex Members or face Adjournment debates at this late hour, will he agree to come down to West Sussex, as I have requested before, and see for himself at first hand the congestion and problems that occur on the A27 in Worthing, Lancing, Chichester and Arundel? I, for one, would refrain from detaining him here late at night if only he would offer to come and meet some local people who have to face those problems every day of every year.

Dr. Ladyman: I would not rule out visiting the area at some point in the future, but I would like to see the regional advice first and then I will need to prioritise the various visits that I make around the country. I will certainly come down at some point, but I am not promising to do so in the immediate future.

Peter Bottomley: I am grateful to the Minister, who is a good fellow, for giving way. Twenty years ago, I had not yet become the Minister for Roads and Traffic; my predecessor was in office. When I was a Minister and saw what happened at Crossbush, I asked my officials whether it would be right to build the Crossbush section. They said yes, so we did it at Clapham and Patching. I suggest that the Minister ask his officials whether it would be right to build the Arundel bypass and then get on with relieving Chichester, Worthing, Shoreham and Lancing. He might then find that the ratio was right. In my day, Ministers said, "Is it necessary, is it right, will it work? Let's do it."

Dr. Ladyman: That is no different from what Ministers say these days. In fact, that was the reason why we commissioned the south coast multi-modal study, which the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs mentioned. Our continuing strategy is based on that study. I would ask Conservative Members to acknowledge at least that the area through which the A27 runs is environmentally sensitive. Indeed, for the greater part of its length through the two counties, the A27 is either inside or forms the boundary of the South Downs area of outstanding natural beauty. That was the principal reason why we asked the Highways Agency to work in partnership with local authorities and statutory environmental bodies to identify less environmentally damaging, alternative schemes to those recommended by the SoCoMMS report.

Good progress is being made on all these proposals. The first outcome of the partnership in West Sussex was the public consultation on a package of transport proposals—some road-based and some public transport-based—for the city of Chichester. The public exhibition in November and December 2004 setting out the proposals was attended by 2,600 people and the Highways Agency received nearly 10,000 responses. It has completed its analysis of them and is finalising the scheme assessment, taking on board the views expressed during the consultation.

In East Sussex, the public inquiry into the Southerham to Beddingham improvement to the east of Lewes ended last month. The inspector's report is expected early next year, so I am severely limited in the detail that I can go into, but subject to the inquiry's outcome, that scheme is still on target for a programmed commencement of works in 2006–07. Following the SoCoMMS decision, other ongoing work includes major studies of traffic issues at both Arundel and Worthing. It is generally agreed that there is no simple solution to the problems in those towns.

As the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs said, the A27 separates the old town centre of Arundel, including the cathedral and the castle, from the more recent, mainly residential development to the south of the town. Approximately four out of five vehicles on the A27 at Arundel are through traffic—in other words, both their origin and destination is outside the town. On the other hand, the surrounding countryside is environmentally sensitive and borders the South Downs area of outstanding natural beauty. There are also other designated sites near Arundel, so any outer bypass of the town would seriously affect that landscape. That was the case for the proposals recommended by SoCoMMS.

At Worthing, the trunk road route passes through densely developed urban areas, and I appreciate the problems that that brings to the town. However, the proposals recommended by SoCoMMS consisted of a series of four tunnels each up to 2 km long, with major road developments in between—all located within the South Downs area of outstanding natural beauty. Not only was the scheme environmentally damaging, the cost of the tunnels alone would have made it unaffordable. I remind Members present that I recently called for a review of the Stonehenge tunnel when that scheme's cost rose to £470 million. The Stonehenge scheme involved just one 2 km tunnel, not four.

The problems at Worthing are exacerbated not only by the dense urban areas but, as I said earlier, by the fact that the boundary of the South Downs area of outstanding natural beauty comes right up to the urban area of Worthing and Lancing. It is therefore proving to be very difficult to find an acceptable working solution to the problems associated with the A27 at that location.

Mr. Tyrie: I agree that the Minister is a good chap, as my hon. Friend the Member for Worthing, West (Peter Bottomley) said a moment ago, but I really do think that he is slightly off the rails now. He has said four times that the proposed road improvements are close to an area of outstanding natural beauty and that they might cause environmental damage. Surely we need some joined-up government, particularly in the Chichester area but throughout the region. Will the Minister speak to his opposite numbers and do something about the huge amount of house building that is going on, which is creating the demand on the road and generating the pressure? One lot are building the houses while the other lot are saying that we cannot improve the road because it is near an area of outstanding natural beauty.

Dr. Ladyman: I assure the hon. Gentleman that in respect of all the assessments that I have mentioned this evening, I have asked the Highways Agency, in undertaking them, to take account of any proposed house building in the area. The fact that development will take place in the area will be taken into account when the road building decisions are made.

I want to say a little more about the scheme in East Sussex that complements the major Southerham to Beddingham improvement scheme. In line with our announcement on the multi-modal study, the Highways Agency has been working in partnership with the county council and the statutory environmental bodies to identify longer-term improvements to the single carriageway length of trunk road between Beddingham, east of Lewes, and Polegate, north of Eastbourne, including possible bypasses at Selmeston and Wilmington. Again, that is an environmentally sensitive area and it is proving difficult to find solutions.

On the points that the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs made about the regional funding allocation process, we expect to receive by the end of January 2006 the South East England Regional Assembly's advice on which transport schemes should be given funding priority.

With the exception of the Southerham to Beddingham improvement scheme, which is already committed to, all the A27 improvement schemes that I have mentioned so far—at Chichester, Arundel, Worthing, Selmeston and Wilmington—have been included in the prioritisation exercise. It seems to me, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman would do well to make his representations in the region, to raise the priority of the proposals. He says that the schemes are strongly supported, but is the support strong enough for the region to put them into the top priority category of the schemes that it wishes to move forward most urgently?

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): When the regional priorities are identified, is the Minister undertaking to deliver them?

Dr. Ladyman: I have made it clear that the region offers advice, and we do not expect to accept its advice absolutely and always. There may be reasons why the hon. Gentleman himself might not always want us to accept the advice of a region, but to judge it to be flawed—and we have reserved that right. However, we have said that where a region does have a consensual position on which schemes should take the highest priority, and the region and the Government office seem to have done a good job in consulting everybody and taking their views into account, we would certainly pay very strong regard to that advice—and I would be surprised if we deviated very far from it.

In addition to the advice, we are awaiting the inquiry inspector's report on the Southerham to Beddingham stretch. The Highways Agency is also expecting to report back on the consultation on the improvements at Chichester early next year, and a little later it expects to report on its studies at Arundel, Worthing, Selmeston and Wilmington. We will consider the way forward for all those schemes in the light of the advice received from the South East England region about its priorities.

The hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs raised housing as a specific issue, and it was also raised in an intervention. I said that the Highways Agency had been asked to take it into account in its reports back to me. Complementary to that process, the agency is currently working with local authorities as they produce their local development frameworks to ensure that transport issues are fully addressed, and that integrated transport proposals are included in each authority's plan.

In addition to the major improvements, the Highways Agency has a three-year rolling programme of maintenance and smaller-scale improvements to the A27. The agency has just completed modifications to the Stockbridge roundabout on the Chichester bypass, reducing the diameter of the roundabout and improving the approaches, which will improve the flow of traffic through the junction.

[Dr. Ladyman]

At Worthing, signals have been provided at the Grove Lodge roundabout. I know that there has been some local disquiet since the signals were installed, but early indications are that traffic flow through the junction is better.

Several hon. Members rose—

Dr. Ladyman: I think that I should give way to the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton), as he represents part of Worthing.

Tim Loughton: The Minister mentions the traffic changes on the Grove Lodge roundabout. I carried out a survey recently among residents who use that roundabout, and overwhelmingly they say that the changes have increased the problems on that stretch of the A27. If he is saying that they, along with the other roundabout adjustments at Chichester, are his panaceas for the congestion on the A27, he is sorely underestimating the scale of the problem. When was the last time he came down to the A27 in West Sussex and saw it for himself?

Dr. Ladyman: The word "panacea" never passed my lips. Those small-scale schemes are simply some short-term measures by which we are trying to improve things while we try to move forward on the wider agenda that all the Opposition Members here are keen to promote.

Mr. Tyrie: Does the Minister realise that the idea that the changes to the Stockbridge roundabout will improve the situation whereby a large chunk of my constituency is effectively cut off every day by a huge traffic jam almost an hour long leading into Chichester will be greeted by my constituents with a hollow laugh? What we need is some real road improvements.

Dr. Ladyman: I do not deny the possibility that the hon. Gentleman's constituency may need some major road improvements. My point is that we are making some short-term improvements while we work out the way forward. That is a not unreasonable position to take. We have made several short-term improvements throughout the area.

The proposals and the major road improvements, which have been backed by significant investment, are an indication of the Government's policy of trying to develop sustainable solutions to the transport problems of the south coast corridor. I understand the need for economic regeneration and accessibility to those towns and I understand the frustration of the constituents of the hon. Gentlemen opposite. I undertake to do my best to keep the issues moving forward—[Interruption.] I will, as the hon. Member for Worthing, West (Peter Bottomley) suggests, ask whether it is a good thing that we do this and, if so, on what time scale and how fast can we get on with it. If we can make a case, if the scheme is value for money and if the region agrees that it is among its priorities for progress, I am confident that we can get this sorted out—unlike the Government of whom he was a member.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Ten o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

The Secretary of State was asked—

Scotland Act

1. Anne Moffat (East Lothian) (Lab): Whether he plans to amend the Scotland Act 1998. [35557]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): There are no plans to revisit the Scotland Act through primary legislation.

Anne Moffat: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer and I am glad that there are no immediate plans to look at the Scotland Act. However, will he consider revisiting the Scotland Act when we have the genuine and mature energy review, debate and consultation? If the Scottish Parliament tries to hold up the prospect of having nuclear energy as part of future energy provision, would we perhaps need to examine the Act to take the planning laws away from the Scottish Parliament?

Mr. Darling: No, I do not think that that would be necessary or desirable. I repeat that there are no plans to revisit the Scotland Act through primary legislation. However, I agree strongly with my hon. Friend about the need for a sensible debate on the future generation of electricity not only in Scotland, but throughout the whole United Kingdom. As the Prime Minister has said, that must include a consideration of nuclear energy. I know that many people in the Scottish Parliament have a philosophical objection to that and that others take a more pragmatic view by saying that we must decide how we would deal with nuclear waste. I was interested that the Liberal spokesman, the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso), has said publicly that he has an open mind on nuclear energy, which, as I understand it, represents something of a departure from Liberal policy.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): On energy, should we not reopen consideration of the Scotland Act to devolve control of the oil and gas industry to the Scottish Parliament? We know that revenues are reaching a record level of £12 billion, but jobs and exploration are likely to reduce as a result of the Chancellor's clumsy tax hike. We know that the First Minister of Scotland was not consulted—no surprise there—but was the Secretary of State consulted about the tax hike that will affect many Scottish jobs, or is he just a cipher of the Chancellor?

Mr. Darling: As the House knows, I have many discussions with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor about a range of matters. On North sea oil taxation, it is necessary to strike the right balance between oil producers and consumers. We want to promote exploration in the North sea—indeed, there has been considerable exploration over the past few years—but it must be borne in mind that the return on capital was forecast to be 40 per cent. for oil companies in 2005 compared with just 13 per cent. for other non-financial companies. The Government have also said that they are committed to making no further increases in North sea oil taxation in the lifetime of this Parliament and have introduced additional incentives to help exploration. I recall that, in 2002, when we last changed the oil taxation regime for the North sea, the hon. Gentleman predicted the end of exploration as we knew it. Since then, exploration has increased and North sea oil activity has proved to be remarkably robust. He is ever the opportunist and ever ready to make the wrong calls, and it is not just us who believe that, but, increasingly, members of his own party.

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the curious alliance that is demanding that the Scotland Act be revisited: a combination of the nationalists, Greens, Trotskyists and The Sunday Times Scotland? Does he agree that any idea that gathers the support of such an alliance must be mad, bad and, indeed, dangerous?

Mr. Darling: Talking of alliances, I noticed that the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) was on the same platform as the Greens and the Scottish Socialists, who want to shut down the North sea completely—as well as capitalism. He has been building an odd pro-business alliance, and, as I said, he keeps making the wrong calls. I agree with my hon. Friend. I see no need to reopen the Scotland Act and it is not the Government's intention to do so.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): I draw the attention of the House to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests.

In answer to the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond), the Secretary of State said that the high oil price justified the high tax. Will he thus send a signal to the industry that if the oil price falls, the tax that has been justified by the high price will fall in line with that fall in price so that investors are encouraged by knowing that there will be a more stable regime in the long term?

Mr. Darling: I thought that the hon. Gentleman was going to explain his policy on nuclear energy, as we have heard the policy of his hon. Friend the Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso). As for the North sea, I drew the attention of the House to the fact that the return on capital is 40 per cent. in the North sea oil sector and 13 per cent. for other non-financial companies. The Chancellor made it clear last week that, having reached a decision, he does not propose to revisit the matter in this Parliament.

Rosemary McKenna (Cumbernauld, Kilsyth and Kirkintilloch, East) (Lab): Without asking my right hon. Friend to speculate on how many women will be selected for safe Tory seats in Scotland, does he agree that one of the great successes of the Scotland Act is the creation of the Scottish Parliament, given the number of women, particularly Labour women, who became MSPs?

Mr. Darling: I agree. It is entirely right and long overdue that the Scottish Parliament should be far more representative of the Scottish population, and I am pleased that our party led the way in making sure that that was the case. The Conservative Front Bench gives a misleading impression of Scottish Tories. While I am delighted to see both the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) and the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell), there is only one Conservative MP in Scotland, so there is considerable gender imbalance. I see in the press that, no matter what the new Tory leader says about having more women candidates, that policy will not apply in Scotland.

Fuel Prices

2. Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Central Ayrshire) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the effect of rising fuel prices on businesses in Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [35558]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): In his pre-Budget report, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor confirmed that he would freeze petrol, diesel and road fuel gases duties this financial year, which will help businesses in Scotland and, of course, elsewhere.

Mr. Donohoe: My right hon. Friend may not be aware of my meeting with three of the five biggest users of gas energy in Scotland, all of whom are experiencing immense difficulties in sustaining their businesses over the winter. Consequently, 2,000 jobs in north Ayrshire could be affected in an already fragile economy. Will he do me the favour of meeting a small delegation from my constituency and north Ayrshire to discuss the matter further?

Mr. Darling: I understand the point made by my hon. Friend. The decision by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor to freeze duties on fuels was a helpful one. The supply of energy is a separate issue and my hon. Friend will know that the Department of Trade Industry, which has the lead responsibility, has taken a number of measures to safeguard supplies this winter and in future years. I will have a word with my hon. Friend after Question Time, but it may be better for him to speak directly to the DTI, which has the policy lead in this area.

David Mundell (Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale) (Con): May I begin in the new way by agreeing with the hon. Member for Central Ayrshire (Mr. Donohoe)? On fuel prices, does the Secretary of State agree with the conclusion of the report by the Select Committee on Trade and Industry on gas supplies that the Government are not doing enough for businesses and the vulnerable? Given the severer climate in Scotland, what is he going to do about that?

Mr. Darling: I welcome the hon. Gentleman to the Dispatch Box. On behalf of the Government, may I say that we are sorry that the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) no longer speaks for the Conservative party, but we should all be grateful for her willingness to stand in during her party's hour of need? It was good of her to return today to give the impression that there are two Scottish Conservatives rather than just one.

I have not had an opportunity to read the report by the Trade and Industry Committee but I am aware of it. As I told my hon. Friend the Member for Central Ayrshire (Mr. Donohoe), the Government are taking action to ensure that we have security of supply not just this winter but in future winters.

In the spirit of agreement—it is obviously the new mood—may I tell the hon. Gentleman that the Government, too, are concerned about fuel poverty, but we have been concerned about it ever since 1997? That is why we introduced the winter fuel allowance, which was opposed by the Conservative party, and is worth £200 this year and £300 for the over-80s. We have introduced measures to help to insulate homes, and the Scottish Executive have devoted £64 million to help pensioners and other people. If he really believes that something ought to be done about fuel poverty, he and his party must vote to support such measures. In particular, they must vote for the necessary money to support those schemes. In the past seven or eight years, however, they have opposed just about every single measure that we have introduced to tackle fuel poverty.

David Mundell: Given the likely impact on fuel prices, jobs and the wider Scottish economy of the Chancellor's £2 billion smash-and-grab raid on the oil industry, did the Chancellor consult the Secretary of State on his proposals, and if not, why not?

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman will no doubt learn that one of the problems with prepared questions is that he should have listened to what I said a few moments ago. I have many discussions with my right hon. Friend on a range of matters. I repeat the point that I made earlier: it is important that the Government strike the right balance between the interests of encouraging exploration in the North sea, just as we have done over the past few years, and making sure that there is a fair return for the British taxpayer. Looking at the present level of prices and the return of capital, the Chancellor took the decision that it was right to change the level of taxation. I should point out that the level of taxation in the North sea is less than it is in comparable countries such as Norway, another North sea oil producer, and it is competitive against tax rates in other parts of the world. I believe that the measure was absolutely necessary and it was also the right thing to do. Similar predictions about the future of North sea oil were made three years ago and they were wrong. I suspect that the predictions made now are wrong as well.

Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): May I turn to the serious question of the damaging effect of gas prices on the business community in Scotland and the rest of the UK? Is my right hon. Friend aware that the interconnector with Europe, which can run at 50 million cu m a day, has a flow-through of only 26 million cu m a day at present, and that the liquefied natural gas terminal at Canvey Island, which can take four tankers a month, is unloading only one a month? Shell has undertaken a big maintenance project on the gas flow from the North sea in November and December, thereby forcing the price up. Is my right hon. Friend aware that what we have here is an invidious monopoly where the suppliers also control transmission, and they are hiking the prices that people have to pay on the spot market because the long-term price was 90p per therm when it should probably be 60p, if the gas were only allowed to flow? We are being manipulated by the owners.

Mr. Darling: I am aware that there have been problems in relation to the supply of gas through the interconnector and, as the Chancellor said in his pre-Budget report last year, the Government are making representations to the European Commission because we believe that, for our market to work properly, it needs to be liberalised. It must be possible for people to buy and sell gas across different countries, and for it to be supplied. As I said earlier, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the Minister for Energy are pursuing a variety of measures that, I believe, will increase the supply of oil available to us not just this year, but in the future.

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): The cost of fuel for motorists in rural Scotland is as much as 10p a litre more than for motorists in urban areas. The long-term answer to that is probably national road user charging, but that is some years away. Will the Secretary of State consider a short-term remedy: the use of the derogation available under EU directives 92/81 and 92/82, which permit lower fuel tax for remote areas? Will he discuss that with the Chancellor? Why should those who have little or no public transport be penalised in this way, when the Government clearly have a solution to the problem?

Mr. Darling: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman is so critical of rural transport in Scotland, when after all it is the responsibility of his Liberal Democrat colleague, the Minister for Transport and Telecommunications in Scotland. I am surprised the hon. Gentleman has not made representations to him to try to improve the situation. I am sure that he would be very ready to listen, since they are in the same party.

There would be some difficulty with the hon. Gentleman's specific proposal. Wherever the line was drawn, anomalies would arise with somebody living just outside such a line having to pay more fuel duty than someone living just over it, so that would not provide the solution that the hon. Gentleman has in mind. I appreciate that, in rural communities, especially where people have to travel long distances and there are difficulties with public transport, there are additional pressures, but I do not think that particular measure would help.

Asylum Seekers

3. Mr. David Hamilton (Midlothian) (Lab): How many asylum seekers in (a) Midlothian and (b) Scotland have been granted refugee status in 2005. [35559]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (David Cairns): The information is not held in the form requested. However, there were 1,400 grants of asylum in the UK in the first three quarters of 2005.

Mr. Hamilton: Does the Minister share my concern about the view, which is often the result of paranoia, that the United Kingdom has been overrun by hordes of asylum seekers? I cannot think of a single person who is seeking asylum in my constituency, although the relative of an asylum seeker has been to my surgery, and there are very few asylum seekers in Scotland. Is it not time to separate asylum seekers and economic migrants who contribute to the Scottish economy and fill employment gaps—in my area, unemployment is 2.2 per cent.? We must make it clear that we are not being overrun. We should welcome people who have run away from tyrants to come here with open hearts.

David Cairns: I congratulate my hon. Friend on dealing with the issue sensibly and moderately, because the debate is too often characterised by hysteria at the extremes—the hysteria of those who say that we are being swamped by asylum seekers and, at the other end of the spectrum, the hysteria of those who say that any rules on asylum are an affront.

We must deal with the issues separately. Asylum is about the needs of the individual—if someone has a well-founded fear of persecution, we must welcome them with open arms, and we have a long and proud history of doing so. Immigration is about the economic needs of the host country and it is important to have a managed migration system, which we are working towards. My hon. Friend is right to warn of the dangers of blurring the two issues, because immigration and asylum are separate matters and should be dealt with separately.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): According to the Home Office, in 2004, just one in 15 failed asylum seekers were removed from the United Kingdom. Given his previous answer, what is the Minister doing to ensure that failed asylum seekers are removed from Scotland?

David Cairns: The Home Office is making significant progress on removing failed asylum seekers. It is clear that we have an obligation to welcome those who have suffered abuse or the threat of abuse in their own homes and who qualify for asylum. Those who use the asylum system to bypass the immigration system, however, are engaged in an abuse and are illegal immigrants. If their asylum appeals fail, we ask them to leave the country, and if they do not do so voluntarily—assistance is provided—they are removed. The system is sensible and humane.

John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that it is thanks to the friendly city of Glasgow that we have asylum seekers in Scotland? Glasgow is the only city in Scotland that takes in any asylum seekers and it would be better if other areas did their bit to welcome people from far-off lands, in which case they might understand the problem better.

David Cairns: Once again, I pay tribute to Glasgow city council, which is the only authority in Scotland to take part in the National Asylum Support Service scheme. Although there were some difficulties in the beginning, most people recognise that the scheme has benefited Glasgow. There have been discussions through the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and others about other local authorities joining the scheme, but they have not come to fruition. However, it is open to any local authority to make such arrangements with the Home Office.

Nuclear Plants

4. Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): What assessment he has made of the level of public support in Scotland for new build nuclear generation plants in Scotland. [35560]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): The energy review will provide the opportunity to assess public support for both nuclear build and other forms of energy generation.

Mr. Hollobone: Is it not the case that, unless a decision is made soon, not only will the pool of talent, knowledge and expertise in the Scottish nuclear industry emigrate from Scotland, but Scotland's carbon footprint will be likely to increase?

Mr. Darling: No, that is not the case. British Energy and others involved in the nuclear industry in Scotland fully support the Government's decision to review our energy requirements and the source of generation. I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman's forecasts are anything like accurate, and I probably have as good an idea about the situation in the nuclear industry in Scotland as he does.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): First Minister Jack McConnell does not know whether there should be new nuclear power stations in Scotland. The Liberal Democrat spokesman thinks that it might be a good idea, although his party is opposed. What is the Secretary of State's position? Is he in favour of new nuclear power stations in Scotland? Will he resist the temptation from Labour Back Benchers to repatriate powers over the nuclear power planning process and confirm that it is up to the Scottish Parliament to make decisions about whether there will be nuclear power stations in Scotland?

Mr. Darling: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was in the House at the beginning of Question Time when I made it clear that we do not propose to amend the Scotland Act 1998. He is right to say that the Scottish Executive are responsible for planning matters. If I were him, though, I would be wary of lecturing other parties on their deficiencies, given that his party's position on wind power is remarkable. It is in favour of it in general but against it if it is anywhere near its constituencies.

David Mundell (Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale) (Con): In light of the interesting question asked by the hon. Member for East Lothian (Anne Moffat), can the Secretary of State explain to the House what the Government would do if a politically motivated Green, Liberal Democrat or, worse still, Scottish National party-influenced Executive blocked the building of a nuclear power station in Scotland?

Mr. Darling: Again, in the spirit of the new consensus, I think that we would both agree that the Scotland Act has to apply regardless of who happens to be elected to the Scottish Parliament. My view is that most sensible political parties, and most people in Scotland, recognise that we need to have a profound debate about the future of energy generation in Scotland, and that to rule out nuclear would be absolutely foolish. This country has very substantial energy needs in future and we must consider what we do with nuclear plants. We should be looking not to the Scotland Act but to the good sense of people in Scotland, who have rejected the nationalists, the Greens and the Trots on every occasion on which they have had the opportunity to vote them down.

Illegal Drugs

5. Andrew Rosindell (Romford) (Con): What recent discussions he has had with the Home Secretary on measures to curb the flow of illegal drugs into Scotland. [35561]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (David Cairns): My right hon. Friend has discussions with the Home Secretary on a range of issues.

Andrew Rosindell: The Minister will be aware of reports that, in Scotland, a line of cocaine is cheaper than cappuccino. There has been a 12 per cent. increase in drug-related deaths in Scotland. When will the Government take action to end this epidemic by securing our ports and airports and ending an appalling trade that ends in the deaths of young people?

David Cairns: I have seen in my own constituency the terrible damage that drug consumption does. It ruins individual lives and wrecks families and communities. That is why it is very important to get all the necessary measures in place to deal with it. Of course, such issues are substantially devolved to the Scottish Parliament. I pay tribute to the Scottish Drug Enforcement Agency, which has done a magnificent job since its inception, and to the measures that have been put in place through the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002. Since that was enacted, more than £5.5 million of assets have been seized from suspected drug dealers. That is hitting drug dealers where it hurts them most—in their pockets. A clearer signal might have been sent from this House if the Conservative party had supported that Act.

People Trafficking

6. Mr. Angus MacNeil (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP): What steps the Government are taking to prevent trafficking of people into and through Scotland. [35562]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (David Cairns): The Government are committed to tackling people trafficking, and we have made that issue a priority in our presidency of the EU, resulting in the adoption of a UK-drafted action plan on trafficking at a Council of Ministers meeting earlier this month.

Mr. MacNeil: Does the Minister accept that the see no evil, hear no evil approach is not a sufficient answer to torture flights and people trafficking on Scottish soil? What is he doing to stop such criminal activity, bearing in mind Lord Woolf's words last week about torture being one of the most evil practices known to man? Will the Minister encourage the police to investigate any suspicious flights and not pass by on the other side on this issue?

David Cairns: We have made the attack on people trafficking one of the priorities of our presidency of the EU. Three important strands need to be put in place to deal with it. First, we need domestic legislation, which we now have in place. Secondly, we need the law enforcement agencies to work in a coherent manner throughout the UK; we will do that through the Serious Organised Crime Agency. Finally, we need co-operation across Europe and beyond because many people who are trafficked come into this country not only from the EU but from Africa.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): People trafficking is a big issue not only in Scotland but throughout the United Kingdom. A big problem is the accommodation in which those who are trafficked live. Will my hon. Friend use his influence with local authorities and housing associations to find out whether local authority environmental officers check out people who have been put in local authority housing?

David Cairns: People trafficking is a crime and anyone who puts up those who have been trafficked commits a crime irrespective of the standard of the housing. To that end, we should look to some of the work of Glasgow city council, which is running a pilot programme to examine the impact of people trafficking. That shows the need for a joined-up approach between the various agencies of the council and the law enforcement authorities. People trafficking is modern slavery. As someone once said:

"If slavery is not wrong, nothing is wrong."

We must take every possible measure to stamp out the evil of people trafficking.

Asylum Seekers

7. Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): What discussions he has had with Home Office Ministers about the process for removing failed asylum seekers with children from Scotland. [35563]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): I have regular discussions with Home Office Ministers on a range of subjects.

Mr. Carmichael: Does the Secretary of State accept that there is a genuine consensus between all parties in Scottish politics that a removals policy for asylum seekers who have children that involves dawn raids is irreconcilable with a policy of treating children according to their best interests? Will he assure hon. Members that he will represent that view in Government and ensure that, throughout the United Kingdom, we have a removals policy that is, at the very least, humane in its treatment of children?

Mr. Darling: As my hon. Friend the Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality said when he visited Scotland recently, it is unfortunately necessary to remove people who no longer have a right to remain in this country and who have exhausted all the appeal processes. No matter what policy is in place, if someone's application has failed, that must be tackled. I agree that, especially when children are involved, we must be sensitive and the policy must be humane. I also agree that the same policy must apply throughout the United Kingdom. My hon. Friend the Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality made that clear.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

The Minister of State was asked—

Legal Aid

15. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): If she will make a statement on the review of legal aid in criminal cases. [36642]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Bridget Prentice): An independent review of legal aid procurement by Lord Carter of Coles was launched following the publication of a fairer deal for legal aid on 5 July 2005. Lord Carter will produce a plan to reform the way in which criminal defence and civil legal services are procured with legal aid in early 2006.

Miss McIntosh: As a non-practising Scottish advocate, I follow the question of legal aid for criminal cases closely. Will the Under-Secretary assure hon. Members that, in the rush to save money by slashing the legal aid budget, the legitimate preparatory work that junior counsel in particular perform at the Bar in England will be recognised as well as their travel expenses so that they are not forced into a position whereby they have to withhold their services because their costs are not being met in full?

Bridget Prentice: I do not accept the hon. Lady's description. We have no intention of slashing the legal aid budget. We want to rebalance it. I assure her that Lord Carter of Coles will take into account the position of junior barristers as well as that of everyone else in the legal aid system.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): As a non-practising solicitor in England and Wales, I urge my hon. Friend to examine closely, when the results of the Carter review are produced, the distribution of criminal legal aid between very few highly paid barristers and the junior Bar, which loses out. I urge her to try to get a much better balance for the junior Bar to stop some top counsel making rather a lot of money out of the legal aid system.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East) (Lab/Co-op): That is a very good point.

Bridget Prentice: That is, indeed, a very good point.

Mr. Purchase: I also write good scripts.

Bridget Prentice: Perhaps my hon. Friend might write one for me.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) refers to an important part of what Lord Carter will tackle. We are well aware of the amount of the budget that is being spent on high cost criminal cases. We are also aware of the position of those who are relatively new to the Bar and those who have been juniors for a long time. Lord Carter has been made aware of all those issues by the Department and through talking to practitioners.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): The Minister says that she does not recognise the description given by my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh), although I thought that it was pretty accurate. Let us see if she recognises this one. At the recent Legal Aid Practitioners Group conference, the director, Richard Miller, said in relation to legal aid:

"I am frustrated that apparently rational people can believe that a business can survive when its overheads are increasing and its income frozen . . . In no other business or profession would this be tolerated."

Will the Minister please explain to the House how she intends to save legal aid from collapse?

Bridget Prentice: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman every single detail of that at the Dispatch Box today, but I hope that we shall be able to have that conversation in the course of further debates. I very much intend to save the legal aid budget. However, I do not intend to allow criminal legal aid to grow like Topsy while the civil budget is being squashed. I want to ensure that we rebalance those arrangements. I work closely with Richard Miller and other people from the LAPG, and have long conversations with them about how we can best achieve that.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): First, the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) was misquoting Miller if he was alleging that he was talking about crime. He was talking about civil legal aid, not about crime at all. Quite rightly, my hon. Friend the Minister has pointed out that there is a coincidence of interest between the Government and the LAPG on that issue. Of course, there has been something of a row between the Bar and the Government about who is responsible for the increase in costs. Will the Minister make the good point to the House that the Government have now accepted that there should be legal aid impact assessments on all new laws, so that it will be clear if a new criminal law—we all need new criminal laws; we all want to get more people convicted—is going to have a knock-on effect on legal aid, so that that can be provided for. The situation would then be clear, and there would be no need for any bitterness.

Bridget Prentice: My hon. and learned Friend makes an important point. We have indeed introduced the legal aid assessment test, thanks to conversations that we have had with the LAPG. Every Government Department will now have to account for any of the funds that would be needed in legal aid, should they introduce any such legislation. Of course, we in the Department for Constitutional Affairs will be happy to help other Departments to find alternative ways of regulating the system so that people may not necessarily have to go through the court system.

Barristers (Industrial Action)

16. James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): What contingency plans she put in place in response to the industrial action by barristers in criminal practice. [36643]

17. Andrew Rosindell (Romford) (Con): If she will make a statement on the industrial action by barristers. [36644]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Bridget Prentice): We said that we would maintain the judicial system regardless of any action that barristers might take. We have done that. The action was limited, and was managed locally by the courts, the Legal Services Commission and the Crown Prosecution Service using a range of effective contingency plans.

James Duddridge: I thank the Minister for her response. What contingency plans does she have in place in case there are problems and disruption when Lord Carter eventually produces his report? What will happen if barristers withdraw their labour after the Carter report?

Bridget Prentice: I do not want to prejudge either the Carter report or what the barristers will do as a result of it. Since the barristers took strike action, they have co-operated very positively with Lord Carter, and I do not foresee that we shall have to put any contingency plans in place post-Carter. However, if we have to, we will.

Andrew Rosindell: Does the Minister agree that cuts in legal aid pay will have a serious effect on the recruitment of barristers from lower income backgrounds? I thought that that was a recruitment policy that the Government encouraged.

Bridget Prentice: In answer to the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question, he is absolutely right. We do want to encourage people from a variety of backgrounds into the legal profession, both as barristers and solicitors. As I said in answer to an earlier question, Lord Carter is looking at the situation as a whole. He is well aware of where the strains are within the legal aid budget, and I hope that he will suggest some positive reforms that will ensure that people not only from lower income backgrounds but from a diverse variety of backgrounds are able to join the profession.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): Does not the Minister share my disappointment that members of the junior Bar took this industrial action? Will she assure the House that the Government are continuing to hold a dialogue with them? Will she explain to the barristers concerned that we have a legal aid budget of £2.1 billion, which is up from £1.5 billion in 1997? The Government are seeking not to cut that budget but to refocus it on the areas that clearly need funding, such as the community legal service and the large parts of the country in which one simply cannot find a solicitor prepared to give legal advice. That is why there must be a reshaping of our priorities.

Bridget Prentice: I know full well the amount of work that my hon. Friend did to establish facilities such as the community legal service, and I hope that the House is appreciative of that. I do not accept, however, that there are large swathes of the country where people cannot get legal advice. They can get legal advice, and there are a variety of ways in which we can provide it, whether face-to-face directly with a solicitor, by telephone or on the internet. It is also right, however, that we want to rebalance the increased budget that this Labour Government have put into legal aid—up from £1.5 billion to £2.1 billion, which we should not forget—so that civil legal aid gets its fair share of the pot.

Barbara Keeley (Worsley) (Lab): On the subject of industrial action, will the Minister tell us what might be the impact of the planned industrial action by magistrates court staff?

Bridget Prentice: We are disappointed with the ballot result in the magistrates courts. There is still time for industrial action to be averted, and it is regrettable and unfortunate that we have been unable to reach agreement on a settlement with the unions. I hope that further negotiations and discussions can take place between now and when they wish to consider action.

Jeremy Wright (Rugby and Kenilworth) (Con): The Minister has expressed her concern for the junior Bar, which I share. Does she agree that one of the reasons for the industrial action is that members of the junior Bar in particular have been asked to wait and wait for an indication of what their financial future will be? Had the Government also waited for the Carter review before imposing cuts on fees paid to the junior Bar, that industrial action might have been averted.

Bridget Prentice: The Government, as the caretaker of the taxpayer's money, must behave in a responsible fashion. Legal aid was £130 million over budget, so we had to take some action to ensure that we brought it back into line. It is responsible and proper for the Government to behave in that way. We look forward to the outcome of Lord Carter's review early in the new year, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman and the junior Bar will find it a positive way forward.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Stephen Hockman QC, the new chair of the Bar, has stated his view that Carter will recommend fee levels that are likely to be accepted as appropriate. Of the 4,000 criminal barristers in England and Wales, however, increasing numbers are refusing to take on new defence cases, and in some cases declining to take late appointments when other barristers were double-booked in relation to a prosecution. As a result, prosecutions in the courts have been lost. Does the Minister think that that is likely to be an increasing trend before Carter reports?

Bridget Prentice: No, I do not think that that will be an increasing trend before Lord Carter reports. The picture that my hon. Friend has painted might have taken place during the strike action, although no case was lost in court. I do not therefore believe that the scenario that he describes is likely to recur. Lord Carter is well aware of the views of everyone in the legal profession, however, and has had detailed conversations on such matters. I am sure that he will bring forward a review that will allow us to have a legal aid system that is sustainable and appropriate for the 21st century.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): The Minister fails to face up to the fact that legal aid in this country is in crisis. With barristers striking, at least 25 per cent. of criminal law firms having closed down over the past four years, legal aid rates frozen for eight years and more than 50 per cent. of Crown court legal aid now being spent on just 1 per cent. of the cases, how much further can the Government squeeze the pips of legal aid before it collapses?

Bridget Prentice: It is a pity that the hon. Gentleman did not think about the answers to some of the earlier questions before asking his own question. I have already established that the barristers' strike is over, and that they are co-operating with Lord Carter. It is precisely because 50 per cent. of the budget is being spent on 1 per cent. of cases that we asked Lord Carter to conduct a review and to see how the position could be improved. We have already provided opportunities to manage cases before they go to court, and we are considering ways in which the junior Bar can be helped and supported. A whole range of things are happening. If the hon. Gentleman is to speak from the Front Bench, he really ought to do his homework first.

House of Lords

18. Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): What plans she has to change the composition and powers of the House of Lords. [36645]

The Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs (Ms Harriet Harman): Our plans include clarifying the powers of the House of Lords to entrench the primacy of this House, and giving this House a free vote on the composition of the House of Lords.

Mr. Hollobone: Given the speed with which the Government are advancing reform of the House of Lords, when the Prime Minister eventually steps down, is he likely to be elevated to the upper House, or will he have to seek election to it?

Ms Harman: I think that we are proceeding at an appropriate pace. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we are committed to establishing a Joint Committee of the two Houses to consider and codify the powers of the House of Lords, so that when we vote in this House on the composition of the House of Lords we shall be in no doubt about what its powers are. Now that the Conservatives have sorted out their leadership issues, I trust that we shall be able to proceed with the establishment of the Joint Committee as soon as possible.

Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): Does my right hon. and learned Friend share, or at least empathise with, my embarrassment over what happened last week when the European Scrutiny Committee visited the Turkish Parliament? When we spoke of people's concern about the fact that the country was run by a religious party, it was pointed out that we have a second Chamber containing 13 representatives of a particular religion. Did they get there by right? According to those parliamentarians, if any member of their Parliament had been found to have given £200,000 to a political party, he would be in jail and not in a legislature.

Ms Harman: Let me respond to my hon. Friend's first point by saying that he will have a chance, as we all will on a free vote, to vote on the composition of the House of Lords. What is important is ensuring that the House is given the choice that it wants, rather than the Government narrowing down the possibilities. In that way the House can play a part in deciding the choice on which it is ultimately able to vote.

I shall pass swiftly over my hon. Friend's second point.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): I welcome the news that the House is to be given a free vote on the composition of the second Chamber. Many of us believe that it should be either wholly or largely elected. However, may I ask the Minister to be very careful when talking about the primacy of this House? What she is actually talking about is the primacy of the Whips Offices in all parties. That is very different from the primacy of an elected Chamber.

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, who is a former Whip, says that that sounds perfectly reasonable to her, but I believe that plenty of Members on both sides of the House consider that the Whips do not have absolute primacy—although of course they have powers to persuade and encourage.

When Members of this House vote on the composition of the House of Lords, the vote will be not only free but unwhipped. All Ministers will have a free vote, and members of all parties will have a free vote. What is more, we want to ensure that the House has decided on what choice is before it, so that no Members can feel that they were not given the right choice on which to exercise their votes.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): If the right hon. and learned Lady thinks that we are moving at an appropriate pace, I should hate to see us moving slowly. This is the most urgent issue within the urgent process of democratic renewal that the House needs to undertake. We have waited since last summer for the Joint Committee to be established, and there is still no sign of it. We cannot have the free vote to which the right hon. and learned Lady referred until the Joint Committee has done its work. Has she had any conversations with the Leader of the House as to whether, when we do come to take a decision on the matter, we can do so by a process of exhaustive amendment similar to the process by which you, Mr. Speaker, were elected, so that we have a genuine outcome and not the Whip-arranged score draw that we had last time?

Ms Harman: On the speed with which we are proceeding on constitutional and democratic reform, I remind the hon. Gentleman that we have devolved power to Scotland, Wales and London, we have new electoral systems for Scotland, Wales, London and the European elections, we have introduced the Human Rights Act 1998, the Freedom of Information Act 2000 and we have already undertaken substantial reform of the House of Lords. I would have liked us to go faster in establishing the Joint Committee of the Lords and the Commons, but it requires the agreement of all parties. We are seeking to reach that agreement and to set up that Joint Committee of all parties. We do not want to proceed without the help of a Joint Committee but, if it cannot be set up, we will move on. That will, however, be less satisfactory.

I will be having discussions with hon. Members about the process by which we decide the options on which to have the free vote. I do not think that any of us wants to go through the processes that we went through last time, which people felt were unsatisfactory. We must work out how to get the appropriate consensus of this House reflected in a vote.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows that I am tied by the rules of the House, which say that I must go on to another matter.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE

The Leader of the House was asked—

Select Committees

30. Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): If he will bring forward proposals to appoint a representative of the Select Committee on the Modernisation of the House of Commons to the Liaison Committee. [36657]

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Nigel Griffiths): The House decided on 13 July that the Liaison Committee should comprise members who chair the Select Committees established in our permanent Standing Orders. We do not propose to revisit that matter so soon after that decision was taken.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: The Modernisation Committee of the House of Commons has existed and operated in this House for eight years. Although it is appointed only until the end of the present Parliament, it has become a permanent fixture of the House, whether we like it or not. Is not it wrong that a major Select Committee that can influence the way in which the House operates should not have a representative on the Liaison Committee, which is the Committee of all the Chairmen of the Select Committees of this House? Will the Minister review the issue as a matter of urgency and fairness?

Nigel Griffiths: The Modernisation Committee may indeed be fairly new in terms of the history of this House and it may indeed, to use the hon. Member's words, be a permanent fixture, but it is not in our permanent Standing Orders. I pay tribute to the valuable role that the Modernisation Committee plays in this place, but there are other Committees whose Chairs are not represented either. It is, of course, open to any Member or any Committee of this House to make direct representations to the Liaison Committee, and I urge the hon. Member to do that.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): With all due respect to the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Sir Nicholas Winterton), surely, if there is a place available on the Liaison Committee, it has to go to a representative of the minority parties. Currently, we are completely excluded from that important Committee, and denied the opportunity to question the Prime Minister on key issues of the day. Does the Minister agree that the Committee does not need any more members from the three main parties and that that exclusion must be addressed?

Nigel Griffiths: I have to say to the hon. Member that there is minority party representation, but it is not his party—it is the Liberal Democrats. It is up to him and his colleagues to sort the matter out with them. I have to stress that the deliberations of the Liaison Committee are available to all and representations are taken, as I have said, from Members. I attribute the same importance to every Member of the House, so if the hon. Member wishes to make representations to the Liaison Committee, he should do so.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that some of us think that modernisation should come to an end fairly soon? Would it not be interesting to allow the Chairman of the Modernisation Committee to sit on the Liaison Committee? Then we could hear the Leader of the House question the Prime Minister in public.

Nigel Griffiths: The issue of whether the Chair of the Modernisation Committee should be on the Liaison Committee has already been covered when I referred to the Committees established under the permanent Standing Orders of the House. It is also important to note that, with the Committee already comprising 30 members and the Chair, there is plenty of scope and plenty of representation across the House. There is no reason why any question that an hon. Member feels is appropriate should fail to be put to the Prime Minister or to anyone else.

Modernisation Committee

32. Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): If he will press the Modernisation Committee of the House of Commons to recommend a procedure for moving amendments to statutory instruments. [36659]

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Nigel Griffiths): No. Delegated legislation covers subsidiary areas of law making that Parliament has already decided should, subject to certain safeguards, be for Ministers to deal with. Those safeguards are laid down in the parent Act and there are opportunities under the negative or affirmative procedure for the House to reject any instrument.

Norman Baker: The Minister is a fair man and he will recognise that on some occasions in Committees when statutory instruments are presented, it becomes apparent that a minor change would be beneficial. Sometimes all parties agree on that, but the Government do not want to take the SI back for further consideration, so it gets pushed through in its unamended and deformed state. Would it not be far better if Members could amend SIs? If that were allowed to happen, the legislation would be better and it would help the Government.

Nigel Griffiths: A number of organisations, including the Procedure Committee, have looked into this matter. The Hansard Society examined it under Lord Rippon and concluded:

> "We see the greatest difficulty in empowering the House or its committees to amend the text of instruments ... and all the advantages of greater flexibility of delegated legislation would be lost."

It is that flexibility that we do not wish to lose and neither do we wish the statutory instrument procedure to become yet another series of whipped votes on issues, which I fear it would undoubtedly become.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): I am interested to hear the Minister's comment that statutory instrument procedure should not become a matter of whipped votes, which, of course, they are when a vote is taken in the Committee considering a particular instrument. Given the number of legislative measures that are enacted not through a Bill but through secondary legislation and given that statutory instruments are debated for a maximum of only one and a half hours under the negative procedure, does not the Minister believe that the time has come for better scrutiny of the statutory instruments and regulations that the Government use as a secondary means of introducing legislation?

Nigel Griffiths: First, I welcome the right hon. Lady to her post as shadow Leader of the House. Having looked into the problem—the Procedure Committee looked into it more recently than the Hansard Society, and it is kept under review by Committees of the House—I do not believe that there is a convincing case for opening up statutory instruments to a different set of procedures from the existing ones that have been used for some time. I have to disappoint the right hon. Lady by saying that I do not accept her point of view on this matter.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): My hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) is obviously right, but is there not an even more worrying development? Over recent months, Northern Ireland legislation has been introduced by statutory instruments. It is, in effect, primary legislation, but because of the rules of the House, it is unamendable. Will the Minister at least consider the matter further in the context of dealing adequately with Northern Ireland legislation?

Nigel Griffiths: The important point about Northern Ireland legislation is that, as the peace process moves forward, we have to re-establish the Northern Ireland Assembly as quickly as possible. It is important to move in that direction rather than consider temporary measures to cope with what we all hope will be a temporary issue.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

The hon. Member for North Devon, representing the House of Commons Commission, was asked—

Cleaners (Pay Dispute)

33. Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): What plans the Commission has to help resolve the dispute with the House's contract cleaners. [36660]

Nick Harvey (North Devon): I understand that the employing company has made an offer to the union representing its work force, about which the union is consulting its membership. To provide further information at this delicate stage in the negotiations would not be helpful to either side.

Julie Morgan: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's response and I am glad that some progress has been made, but does he not think that this situation will continue as a running sore until there is a satisfactory resolution, and that it may be necessary for the House of Commons Commission to involve itself and to renegotiate the contract?

Nick Harvey: The authorities of the House have been actively involved in discussions with the employer company and I am very hopeful that a resolution can now be found. However, given that the proposal is being discussed and negotiated at this very moment, there is a limit to what I can say at this stage if I am to avoid being unhelpful.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Can the hon. Gentleman tell the House, despite the acknowledged sensitivity of the negotiations, whether any attempt will be made to bridge the gap between this Parliament and other European Parliaments, in that no other European Parliament allows its cleaners to be paid so little and none allows them to be employed without sick pay or pension provision? Are those two issues also under discussion?

Nick Harvey: I am not party to the negotiations but I believe that the issues to which the hon. Gentleman refers are indeed under discussion. On comparisons, he will have to accept that employees in central London are employed in a local market here, and that comparisons with other markets in other countries are not really valid for the purposes of concluding a contract negotiation.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): I am absolutely delighted that progress is allegedly being made. That said, there are stories circulating that the trade union involved is flexing its muscles, but nothing could be further from the truth; rather, it is defending basic, principled rights and representing people who are among the most vulnerable in our society. That is what trade unionism is about, not flexing muscles.

Nick Harvey: I have not heard such suggestions and I am sure that the trade union involved is doing its best to represent its members. As I said, I am hopeful that a conclusion can be arrived at before long.

Points of Order

3.32 pm

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I briefly gave notice yesterday of this point of order, which relates to the answer given to a question from me by the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety, the right hon. Member for Salford (Hazel Blears). It appeared in Hansard on 29 November, and on 8 December, she wrote to me to point out that it was inaccurate—through, I am sure, no fault of hers—in two substantive respects. She then wrote to me to correct the two inaccuracies and has confirmed that a copy of the letter has been placed in the Library. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the inaccurate answer remains on the record in Hansard. May I ask you to use your good offices to ensure that the record is reprinted with the full text of the amended written answer, including the corrections to those two inaccuracies?

Mr. Speaker: I am pleased that the Minister has clarified and rectified the situation. If the hon. Lady is very keen to ensure that the content of the reply that she received is on the record, she can table an identical question and the answer to it will tie in with that reply. That is the way to do it.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether you can advise Ministers on the correct procedure when answers given in this House are not correct. If I may, I draw your attention to the differing practices of the Treasury and the Foreign Office in this regard. When I asked a question during Treasury questions on 10 November, the answer given was incorrect and a letter was then placed in the Library of the House. However, I noted from yesterday's Order Paper that when the same thing happens in the Foreign Office, it is good enough to include a written ministerial statement on the Order Paper. Given these differing practices, can you advise Ministers on the manner in which you expect inaccurate answers to be corrected?

Mr. Speaker: May I say to the hon. Gentleman that that would be a matter for consideration by a Committee of the House? It is not one for me to intervene in.

Mr. Angus MacNeil (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Today, I have read on a BBC website that a £100-million contract for new coastguard helicopters has been awarded. One of the coastguard bases that will benefit is at Stornoway, in my constituency. I raised this matter in a point of order last Thursday, when I asked whether the relevant Minister would come to the House and make a statement about the contract. Will hon. Members have an opportunity to question that Minister about the matter?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman can put down questions for the appropriate Question Time. He can also submit written parliamentary questions to find the information that he seeks.

Road Traffic Signs (Enforcement Cameras)

3.35 pm

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require all road traffic signs which show the routes where enforcement cameras are from time to time in use to include information on the speed limit in force on such routes.

The Bill is very simple, and I do not expect to detain the House for my full 10 minutes. My proposal would mean that signs indicating the location of a speed camera would also include information about the speed limit that drivers are expected to observe. So, a sign might say, "Speed camera 30", when 30 mph is the limit at that spot or, "Speed camera 40", when the limit is 40 mph.

In many places—and there are some in my constituency—drivers joining a larger road from a side road will pass a speed camera before being informed about the relevant speed limit. I am not at all opposed to the use of speed cameras to enforce reasonable speed limits, and I speak as one who has been fined. Cameras have the effect of restraining those of us who might be tempted to go beyond the appropriate limit, and certainly I am always especially careful when I see a camera.

I think that speed cameras work; but surely it is in the interests of law enforcement and common sense to require camera signs to inform drivers about what they are expected to do. That would be in drivers' interests, too: on seeing a camera sign, all they would have to do is glance down at their speedometers to make sure that they were within the limit displayed on the sign, and then proceed.

Really, that is all that there is to the Bill. It has widespread, all-party support, for which I am very grateful. Its implementation costs would be negligible, as existing signs would merely have to be amended. The hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) has asked me to stress his view that there are too many signs already, and that he would like efforts to be made to reduce other signage if the Bill were passed. I accept that that is a reasonable point.

In this House, the tradition is that Bills that merely offer practical improvements are given a fair wind. I hope that hon. Members present today will give it that fair wind, and that it meets the same treatment if approval is given for its Second Reading on 14 July.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): Full speed ahead!

Dr. Palmer: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend for his encouragement, and I hope that the House will allow me to bring in the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Dr. Nick Palmer, Mr. Andrew Tyrie, David Lepper, Mr. Fabian Hamilton, Andrew George, Dr. Howard Stoate, Mr. Rob Wilson, Mr. Andy Reed and Mr. Paul Truswell.

ROAD TRAFFIC SIGNS (ENFORCEMENT CAMERAS)

Dr. Palmer accordingly presented a Bill to require all road traffic signs which show the routes where enforcement cameras are from time to time in use to include information on the speed limit in force on such routes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 14 July, and to be printed [Bill 102].

Orders of the Day

Criminal Defence Service Bill [Lords]

[Relevant document: The Fifth Report from the Constitutional Affairs Committee, Session 2003–04, HC 746, on the Draft Criminal Defence Service Bill.]

Order for Second Reading read.

3.40 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Bridget Prentice): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill seeks to establish a legal aid system that balances fairness with administrative simplicity and that is based on affordability yet is sensitive to an applicant's individual circumstances. In order to achieve that, we will transfer the power to grant legal aid representation from the courts to the Legal Services Commission, and we will introduce a test of financial eligibility.

The Bill and the scheme that it seeks to deliver are a straightforward evolution of the founding principles of legal aid as they were first expressed by the Rushcliffe report in 1945 and by the subsequent Legal Aid and Advice Act 1949—introduced by a Labour Government. From its earliest design, legal aid was intended to be a wider expression of the beliefs that lay at the heart of the welfare state. A "judicare system" was to be established whereby the services of lawyers could be made available to the poor as well as the rich. The Bill reasserts those founding principles, as well as creating a robust and sustainable legal aid system that is not only capable of responding to the demands of the modern justice system, but of enhancing and supporting it. It also builds on an existing raft of reforms that have already had a significant impact in the area. The Access to Justice Act 1999 modernised the legal aid system and, since then, we have continued to improve and refine the performance of legal aid.

But costs have continued to rise: as indeed they have throughout the history of legal aid. In 2004–05, spending on legal aid as a whole exceeded £2 billion, a rise of £513 million since 1997–98. To put it simply, year on year, the cost of legal aid has risen, on average, at almost twice the rate of inflation. That trend cannot be allowed to continue.

Since 1997, there has been a large growth in criminal legal aid where expenditure has risen by £458 million. There is little doubt that a good proportion of that spending has proved invaluable in protecting the rights of the vulnerable, ensuring access to justice and maintaining the efficiency of the criminal justice system, but the Government also have a wider responsibility to protect the interests of the poor, the socially excluded and, ultimately, the law-abiding members of society. Legal aid resources are finite and only one part of our social agenda, which includes health and education.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): I have listened with great interest to what the Minister has said, but is not she saying—in a roundabout way—that the Government got it all wrong a few years ago and that they are now making a gigantic U-turn?

Bridget Prentice: The system that was in force before we came into government was decrepit, convoluted, complex and overly bureaucratic. We introduced a system that swept all that away, but we were not aware how many people would take advantage of the new system. That is why we need to look again at the issue. We have an obligation to live within our means and to ensure that the available funds are targeted in the fairest and most strategically beneficial way.

We must make our money work for us and the Bill seeks to do just that by rebalancing and refocusing legal aid expenditure to ensure that we not only protect the rights of those who find themselves prosecuted under the criminal law, but we fund law-abiding citizens who may find that they need to protect or enforce a civil right.

Despite the refinements to the proposed scheme that the Bill empowers, the core principles of the policy, and the Bill itself, remain largely unaltered from the draft that the House saw originally.

Mr. David Burrowes (Enfield, Southgate) (Con): The Government refer to the fact that they are focusing funds. Although the Bill seeks to make further savings of £35 million in respect of the lower courts, has not the Legal Services Commission already accepted that those costs are under control? Indeed, the Department for Constitutional Affairs has predicted that they are on the decrease. One respects the fact that legal aid costs in general have increased, but the budgets of lower courts are under control, so should not the true target for cost-cutting be high-cost cases?

Bridget Prentice: The hon. Gentleman may have been in the Chamber during Constitutional Affairs questions, in which case he would have heard me say that we are targeting high-cost cases. The Bill tries to ensure that we have a much fairer system in both the lower and higher courts. The Bill will also cover the Crown Court.

There are two key enabling powers: first, the power to grant representation is to be transferred from the courts to the Legal Services Commission and, secondly, a test of financial eligibility is to be reintroduced. Clauses 1 and 2 confer those powers by amending schedule 3 to the Access to Justice Act 1999. Clause 3 creates a power to require defendants to make contributions towards the cost of their legal aid, which will be a central component of the Crown court scheme. Clause 4 makes consequential amendments to other legislation.

The scheme to be developed through those powers will consist of three distinct elements: transfer of the power to grant; means-testing in the magistrates court; and means-testing in the Crown court.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Will the Minister explain to the House why she had to sign a certificate to ensure that the legislation complies with the European convention on human rights?

Bridget Prentice: We all sign certificates to ensure that we comply with the convention. It is a good thing to do and that is why we do it. Every Bill that comes before the House has to have such a certificate. That is part of the law that we introduced and I am puzzled about why the hon. Gentleman is asking that question. Perhaps he would like to explain.

Mr. Hollobone: I am grateful to the Minister for allowing me to intervene again.

I understand from the helpful explanatory notes that there are particular difficulties with clauses 2 and 3, such that the Minister had to sign a certificate under section 19(1)(a) of the Human Rights Act 1998. I am not aware that that has been necessary with other recent legislation.

Bridget Prentice: I can only reiterate that it is part of the law of our country that we comply with the Human Rights Act, and we are ensuring that the Bill does so. I am happy to have signed up to the Act according to those provisions—[Interruption.] I am informed that all Ministers taking Bills through the House sign according to the same provisions in the Act. There is nothing unusual about the Bill in that respect.

I want to explain some of the things that the Bill will not do. I must emphasise that it will not affect the existing interests of justice test, which will remain an important feature of the legal aid system and all applicants will need to satisfy it. The test allows for several factors to be taken into account; for instance, whether the applicant is likely to lose his liberty when determining if it is in the interests of justice for legal aid to be granted.

It is an inescapable fact, however, that, as matters stand, every Member of the House would qualify for legal aid provided they passed the interests of justice test. I doubt that I need to remind Members about the unfortunate stream of well-publicised cases in which apparently wealthy individuals are able to claim legal aid under the current scheme. Few would disagree that such a perverse system needs to be tackled and that is precisely what the Bill sets out to do.

David T.C. Davies: Surely, we made those points four or five years ago, when the hon. Lady's Administration changed the rules and brought an end to means-testing.

Bridget Prentice: I am not aware that the hon. Gentleman was making any of those points four or five years ago, but if some of his colleagues were doing so, I was not aware of it. When the scheme was introduced four or five years ago, it was seen to be much simpler and more straightforward than what had gone before. We recognise that we made it much easier for people to obtain legal aid when they would not otherwise have chosen to do so. We are trying to get the balance right.

Under the Bill, the grant of legal aid will cease to be a largely judicial function administered by court staff and, instead, become an administrative function with judicial oversight. Responsibility for the grant will be given to the Legal Services Commission. However, the Government's intention is that court staff will remain responsible for the scheme's day-to-day operation. That arrangement will be regulated by a service level agreement between Her Majesty's Courts Service and the Legal Services Commission. A right of appeal to the court on the interests of justice test will still remain.

Jeremy Wright (Rugby and Kenilworth) (Con): The Minister has made it perfectly clear that the Government's intention is to reduce the demands on the criminal legal aid budget, but I am sure that she will accept that delay in the criminal justice system is a problem. What measures will the Government take to ensure that means-testing, and all that goes with it, does not delay the bringing to court of criminal cases?

Bridget Prentice: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point, which I shall come to later in my speech if he is prepared to bear with me.

The transfer of grant will allow the Legal Services Commission to exercise greater control over legal aid expenditure, as well as ensuring consistency and certainty for applicants. The proposed means test in the magistrates court will be quick and simple to administer. A simple initial filter that consists of upper and lower thresholds will be applied. Applicants whose income falls below the lower threshold will automatically qualify for legal aid, while those who exceed the upper threshold will not be eligible.

To enhance the scheme's sensitivity, however, those thresholds will not be set at a single level; they will be weighted to take account of household composition. For instance, for a childless couple, the upper threshold would be set at £34,000 and the lower one at £19,000. However, a couple with a three-year-old child would have an upper threshold of £40,120 and a lower threshold of £22,420.

For applicants whose income falls between the two thresholds, a more detailed assessment would be carried out to determine disposable income by incorporating a system of allowances covering actual housing, child care and maintenance costs. Applicants whose disposable income, when so calculated, is below a set level would be eligible for legal aid. At the moment, we believe that the disposable income threshold should be in the region of £3,156—close to that used in the civil legal aid scheme.

To place that in context, under that two-tier model for the means test, a couple with a three-year-old child and a joint gross income of £24,000 would probably be granted legal aid after completion of the detailed assessment, but a childless couple, with a similar income and therefore a far higher disposable income, would be unlikely to pass the detailed assessment and therefore would not receive legal aid.

The means test will include assets held by the applicant's partner. Since the test makes allowance for the increased cost of a two-person household, it is fair to recognise not only the full cost, but the full income of the household. However, we acknowledge the concerns of those who argue that unfairness may arise in cases where the partner has a clear contrary interest—for example, in a domestic violence case. For that reason, we will build safeguards into the new scheme to deal with such situations. Once legal aid has been granted, it will cover the entire cost of the defence.

We are aware that such a system can never take account of all possibilities. It has long been a central objective of the scheme that it is sensitive to individual circumstances and considers not only an individual's income, but his capacity to pay. To achieve that, tightly drafted regulations will detail when an applicant can request that special consideration be given to his circumstances. For example, account would be taken of the circumstances of applicants who had especially high outgoings and were genuinely unable to pay for their defence, perhaps because they cared for a disabled relative.

It is also a prime objective that the scheme causes minimal disruption to the justice system. Information on a defendant's means will be collected at the earliest opportunity after entry into the criminal justice system. In some cases, that will be as soon as an applicant is charged with a criminal offence.

Mr. Burrowes: Will the Minister give way?

Bridget Prentice: I am just about to respond to the point made by the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Jeremy Wright).

In a second measure to reduce delay, defendants will be able to apply for legal aid under an extended advice and assistance scheme running up to, and including, the first hearing, when a means-tested representation order will come into force. Qualification for the scheme will be determined on the interests of justice alone. That will ensure that the new system does not introduce any delay and that full advantage is taken of the natural pauses that already exist in the criminal justice process. For example, if a defendant who is charged with a relatively serious criminal offence for which he faces imprisonment is held on remand, he will appear in court immediately for a bail hearing. Should the defendant intend to plead not guilty, his trial will be adjourned to allow the defence and prosecution to prepare fully for the trial. Legal aid could then be sought in the period before the full trial started.

Mr. Burrowes: Given that it is likely that the Bill will increase the burden on magistrates courts' staff, does it not highlight the present damaging pay dispute involving such staff? Magistrates courts have great difficulty recruiting and retaining high-quality staff, which has a profound effect on the quality of justice. Such staff will be considering the interests of justice test and implementing the Bill. Unless the Government try to resolve the problem of the pay dispute, there is a worry that there will be a profound effect on local justice.

Bridget Prentice: I hope that the pay dispute does not result in industrial action and that there will be an opportunity before the time at which that action is supposed to take place for all parties to come together to find a constructive solution. I am well aware of the situation that magistrates courts' staff face.

Magistrates courts' staff do the administration for the scheme, and their jobs will be enhanced by giving them responsibility. They perform their roles under judicial supervision at the moment. It is important for us to say to them, "Here is an administrative job that you are doing very well, and we want you to continue to do so."

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): The hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes) is wrong to suggest that the Bill is likely to increase the administrative burden on magistrates courts' staff. Although they will have more calculating to do, which is a skill that they are used to using—despite what the hon. Gentleman said, staff in magistrates courts are actually of a high calibre—it is expected that there will be between 10 and 20 per cent. fewer applications because the means test will screen out an awful lot of people. The Bill is thus administratively neutral.

Bridget Prentice: My hon. and learned Friend makes an important point. We think that the Bill might well screen out more than 10 to 20 per cent. of applications—perhaps up to 30 per cent. of applications. I am happy to reiterate her important point that the calibre of magistrates courts' staff is high. As I said, they already carry out similar work at the moment and that is likely to continue.

The proposed Crown court scheme will use a combination of powers within existing legislation and new powers under the Bill. Applicants for legal aid in the Crown court will be assessed on financial eligibility as well as the interests of justice. In contrast to the magistrates court scheme, individuals who fail the means test will still be eligible for legal aid. However, they will be expected to contribute towards the cost of their defence. Another notable difference between the magistrates court and Crown court schemes is the proposed capital test, under which liquid assets in excess of £8,000 held in cash accounts at bank and building societies are the subject of a single, one-off contribution. As with the magistrates court scheme, aggregation of means is a feature of that model. The Government propose a phased introduction in which the magistrates court scheme is introduced first and allowed to bed in before the Crown court scheme is launched.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): What is the reference date for that assessment? It would be all too easy for someone to ensure that they do not have liquid capital assets available for means-testing at a Crown court hearing if they knew that that would be a sensible thing to do in preparation for such an appearance.

Bridget Prentice: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid and important point. We will ensure that the assessment is made at the earliest opportunity, possibly at the point of arrest, before people have a chance to try to disperse their assets. I am happy to hold further discussions, however, about the best time for assessment.

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): We are right to be concerned that people with limited financial means should have access to advice and legal aid, but what measures has the hon. Lady considered introducing, especially in complex criminal trials involving large assets, to deal with someone from a wealthy family who may have an offshore trust or who may be the beneficiary of another trust with assets that are not necessarily visible in the UK?

Bridget Prentice: As I said, we will look at liquid assets in an individual's personal bank and building society accounts. We should think carefully about whether we want to introduce a more complex system to assess assets, as the aim of the Bill is to try to keep things as simple and straightforward as possible. In the regulations we will make sure that we can identify those assets as easily and simply as possible. As the hon. Gentleman will know, there are other laws to deal with the proceeds of crime and so on if someone is found guilty.

The new scheme is outlined in greater detail in the supplement to the framework document accompanying the Bill. In developing the Bill, the Government have not only listened to, and acted on, the findings and recommendations of the Select Committee on Constitutional Affairs on an earlier draft, but we have taken into account the considered opinions of a wide range of stakeholders. We have worked particularly closely with the Law Society to refine the means test model and produce a scheme that is both fair and sensitive to the circumstances of individual applicants without placing an undue burden on those responsible for administering the system.

We have addressed and, we believe, satisfied, early concerns voiced by the judiciary about the original appeals process. We firmly believe that there should not be an appeal to the court on the basis of financial eligibility, but we are satisfied that the case has been made that there may be an appeal to the court based on the interests of justice. However, an amendment accepted in the Lords removed the power to review decisions on financial eligibility from the Bill. Those decisions will now be subject to a full appeal to the court. That is unacceptable. Not only is it a misdirection of the courts' resources, but members of the senior judiciary agree that the means test is a wholly administrative assessment that does not require judicial oversight, apart, of course, from judicial review. We will seek to overturn the amendment in the Commons.

The Government believe that the Criminal Defence Service Bill is both innovative and practical. While we have placed a high value on measures to develop an administratively simple scheme, we have given equal importance to measures to ensure that defendants are treated fairly and consistently. The scheme will be transparent and measures will be taken so that it can be easily understood by defendants, solicitors and the court-based teams responsible for its administration. By streamlining legal aid and cutting bureaucracy we have created a strong, flexible legal aid system able to withstand the rigours of the modern criminal justice system. The new scheme will allow legal aid to continue to safeguard the rights of the vulnerable, but will also achieve maximum value for the taxpayer. I therefore commend the Bill to the House.

4.5 pm

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): I begin by declaring any interests that I may have as a practising solicitor.

The Bill allows for the power to grant rights to representation to be transferred from the courts to the Legal Services Commission, introduces a means test for the grant of such funding and, where the test is met, provides for contribution orders based on means. Several amendments were made to the Bill in another place, and I pay tribute to the significant progress that was made there.

We, the Conservative Opposition, feel that access to justice is a serious matter that requires full and detailed consideration. Through the determined efforts of our noble Friends, such detailed consideration has already been possible. We welcome the restoration—by amendment in the other place—of responsibility for legal aid matters to the Lord Chancellor, as we welcome the amendments that have been made relating to appeals. I was sorry to hear the Minister say that she will attempt to overturn those at a later stage.

Vera Baird: I am interested to know the views of the Opposition. It is undoubtedly mostly a matter of arithmetic to establish whether somebody is in or outside the financial eligibility criteria. Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that judicial time could be appropriately used on an appeal against that, or does he have some alternative model in mind?

Mr. Djanogly: I intend to discuss that in greater detail, so if the hon. and learned Lady will wait, I shall come on to it. It is important that the court should be able to hear appeals on the interests of justice test, as well as on the eligibility test, and should be able to consider those matters afresh.

The Conservative party has long been in favour of many of the measures in the Bill, in particular means-testing for those who can afford it, which the Government abolished in 2001. We opposed the abolition of the means test during the passage of the Access to Justice Act 1999, which the Bill amends. Now, after four years' experience, the Government wish to bring back means-testing. It has taken them eight years to bring back the NHS internal market and eight years to bring back grant-maintained schools, so perhaps we should be impressed that it has taken them only four years to do a U-turn on legal aid and means-testing.

The measure is basically right. Those who can make a contribution to their own defence costs ought to do so. However, we need to ensure that those who cannot make such a contribution are still properly represented and not disadvantaged within the criminal justice system. That second aspect is conspicuously missing from the Bill. The proposed means test involves a calculation to derive an adjusted level of income for the purposes of considering eligibility. Various deductions are made on a proportional basis from overall household income to reflect a client's costs. As the Minister explained, if a client's adjusted income falls between a higher and a lower threshold, a more detailed assessment is required to establish whether the client qualifies. Clients will not qualify for public funding in the magistrates court if their calculated disposable income is above £3,156 a year.

The Department has suggested that the abolition of the means test has contributed to the rising costs of criminal legal aid. As the draft Bill and consultation paper put it in 2004,

"Since the abolition of the means test many who previously would have been privately represented or who choose to represent themselves have applied for public funding."

It stated that the

"re-introduction of the means test will focus the resources on those that need help the most."

All that led the Constitutional Affairs Committee—rightly, in our view—to question whether there is enough joined-up thinking, principally between the Department for Constitutional Affairs and the Home Office, in the overall approach to criminal justice policy. It concluded at paragraph 46:

"We recommend that the Department should ensure that initiatives rolled out by other Departments, especially the Home Office, are properly costed so that their impact on the Criminal Defence Service budget can be taken into account. This is an essential feature of 'joined up Government' and needs to be done so that the Government can consider the causes of rising costs, rather than merely relying on the Department to tackle the symptoms".

It would be helpful if the Minister could give us a progress report on how that recommendation is being carried forward.

Bridget Prentice: I am happy to give the hon. Gentleman a progress report: we have introduced a legal aid impact assessment test, which is part of the regulatory impact assessment that every Department conducts when it introduces legislation. If any legislation introduced in this House impacts on legal aid, it must be funded or another way must be found to deal with it.

Mr. Djanogly: I thank the Minister for explaining that all legislation requires a regulatory impact assessment, which I shall discuss later in my speech.

The press briefing that the Government published in May at the time of the Queen's Speech estimated that the Bill would lead to annual savings of more than £35 million. We sincerely hope that it will, but it would be useful to hear more about how the Government reached that conclusion. After all, the original justifications for abolishing means-testing back in 1999 were that the system was too bureaucratic, which led to delays in cases being brought to trial and added significantly higher costs, and that it applied to less than 1 per cent. of applicants. It would be interesting for the House to hear how the Labour party, which abolished means-testing as a cost-saving measure, is going to reintroduce means-testing as a cost-saving measure.

In its response to the draft Bill in 2004, the Constitutional Affairs Committee concluded:

"We do not think these proposals have been properly costed. The Department has produced no convincing evidence demonstrating that reintroducing means testing would result in substantial cost savings".

We support the Bill in principle, but we want to see more convincing evidence that it will have the desired effect. Will the Minister provide more detail on the projected savings?

We want to address several other issues in Committee. For instance, concern remains about the perverse incentive for defendants to choose the Crown court in cases that may be tried either way in order to ensure a more favourable position on legal aid. That serves only to increase costs, and the matter requires further review. We are still concerned about a related aspect of the Bill, which seeks to translate the magistrates court regime in a modified form to the Crown court simply by delegated legislation. We are of the opinion that separate regimes should be introduced simultaneously for magistrates courts and for Crown courts through primary legislation to avoid uncertainty in the drafting of the regulations and the perverse incentives that I have just mentioned. We believe that those points outweigh the benefits of first appraising the magistrates court scheme.

Despite our welcoming the Bill in principle, it is a very small step towards the desperately needed reform of the legal aid system, which the Government have allowed to fall into disrepair, and much more remains to be done. The Minister's speech was short on detail on the Bill's impact—for instance, what percentage of the population will have their access to legal aid restricted by the Bill? That is why I want to address some of the broader legal issues.

The soaring cost of legal aid in England and Wales forms the background to the Bill and this debate. The problem is not new, and I concede that it is not exclusive to the current Administration, because Governments of both parties have grappled with the cost of legal aid over the past three decades or more. It is clear that the problem has become acute since this Government entered office: in 1997, the total legal aid budget stood at around £1.5 billion; this year, it is more than £2 billion, which is an increase of some 35 per cent. while this Government have been in office.

More than half of that £2 billion is spent on criminal legal aid, the cost of which has risen dramatically. Since 2000–01, there has been a significant rise in the cost to the criminal defence service of criminal legal representation in the magistrates courts. By contrast, spending on civil legal aid, excluding the cost of asylum, has fallen in real terms by 24 per cent. since 1997. That in turn has forced many high street solicitors to go to the wall, restricting access to justice for many of the most vulnerable in our society. For example, as I found out through a written question earlier this year, the number of high street solicitor firms offering representation for legal aid and family cases has decreased by more than one third in the past five years.

That is despite the Government's ambition, as set out in the 1997 manifesto, to reform legal aid and achieve value for money for the taxpayer and the consumer. Meanwhile, at this year's election the Government promised to reform legal aid better to help the vulnerable. Their predicament seems to have led to a state of paralysis, and regrettably the vulnerable are being hit the hardest due to their inability to access lawyers who take on legal aid cases.

We agree that the growth in spending on the criminal defence service has to be checked. In the words of Lord Justice Judge in his evidence to the Select Committee on Constitutional Affairs, which reported on the draft Criminal Defence Service Bill in 2004, and to which the whole House is indebted for its work in this area,

"we simply cannot work on the basis . . . that there is a tree at the bottom of the garden full of ten pound notes. There is not, and therefore there has to be some control exercised."

As the Magistrates Association put it,

"there is a large and continued increase in the amount of money spent on legal aid, and we accept that the amount available is not infinite."

We agree.

The fundamental legal aid review was announced by the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Lammy) in May 2004. On 19 July this year, I made a request to the Department of Constitutional Affairs under the Freedom of Information Act 2000 in relation to the review. The relevant DCA press release stated that the review would be "a far-reaching study into the underlying legal aid system, which will focus on how best to provide legal help to those who need it in the longer term."

Some of its conclusions were set out in the July 2005 paper, "A fairer deal for legal aid", but the Minister decided on the basis of public interest to withhold the detailed responses and conclusions contained in an internal report. I called for an internal review of that decision, which resulted in certain limited material being made available. Nevertheless, the contents of the internal report remain elusive. That is entirely unsatisfactory, and one has to query why such information is being withheld. It seems only to add further weight to the concern that the legal aid system is in a state of crisis. The fact that fewer than two fifths of the population now qualify for legal aid sits rather uncomfortably with the concept that everyone is entitled to access to justice so that they can enforce and defend their legal rights and so that the Government and other powerful bodies can be held to account or contested where necessary.

The ridiculous extremes of bureaucracy involved in the legal aid process must continue to be broken down, and where savings measures are introduced, the savings must be real. The Government give in to the ever-present pressure to come up with short-term reforms designed to control the budget, but what is needed is a long-term strategy, particularly to reduce the amount spent on high-cost cases. The following figures represent the crux of the problem, which the Government are not adequately addressing. The half dozen most expensive criminal legal aid cases in 2003 amounted to no less than 25 per cent. of the total criminal legal aid budget. One per cent. of the highest cost cases amounted to between 40 and 50 per cent. of the total criminal legal aid budget.

The problem is not that the Government are spending too little money but that cases need to be managed more efficiently. There needs to be clarity about what legal aid is spent on. The Crown Prosecution Service needs to manage cases more effectively, as do judges. Dealing with the management issues at an early stage will help to avoid even bigger problems and spiralling costs later on. Yet the Government seem utterly unable to get to grips with the problem, which is not new.

Vera Baird: The hon. Gentleman is making a very poor point. He said that very high-cost cases accounted for between 40 and 50 per cent. of all criminal legal aid spending. That is so, as it was in 1996, when the Conservatives were in office. Since then, it has gone up from 42 per cent. to 49 per cent., but we are tackling it, whereas the hon. Gentleman's Government did nothing whatever.

Mr. Djanogly: Eight years later, here we are talking about what needs to be done, and the best that the hon. and learned Lady can say is that the last Conservative Government did not get it right.

Vera Baird: Would the hon. Gentleman like me to tell him over what period of time the same proportion of high-cost cases took up criminal legal aid? It was for many years while the Conservative Government were in office. We are trying to tackle that, I repeat that the Conservative Government did nothing about the problem for 18 years. We are trying to do something. How can he accuse us?

Mr. Djanogly: With barristers and magistrates going on strike, law firms closing down week after week—

Vera Baird rose—

Mr. Djanogly: No, I shall not give way to the hon. and learned Lady again.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. We cannot have two hon. Members on their feet at the same time. The hon. and learned Lady must know whether the hon. Gentleman who has the Floor is giving way to her.

Mr. Djanogly: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Vera Baird: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Djanogly: No, I shall not. The hon. and learned Lady has already intervened several times. The fact that the Government have to have a Home Office Parliamentary Private Secretary as the only Labour Back Bencher in the Chamber reflects the Labour party's attitude to legal aid and the crisis in the system.

Vera Baird rose—

Mr. Djanogly: I shall not give way.

I repeat that the Government appear unable to get to grips with the problem. It represents a significant failure on the part of the Department for Constitutional Affairs. It must know that the reintroduction of means-testing will not solve the problem or make significant savings in relative terms.

The Law Society said in its submission to the fundamental legal aid review of January this year that early skilled diagnosis would have the most benefit in controlling the budget and prevent straightforward issues from becoming more significant and therefore a greater burden. It recommended the early identification of problems, and access by clients to appropriate services through a single point of entry offering legal aid services at different levels, or planned referrals. That will enable firms and advice agencies that already exist to take on extra rolls and expand their business. Does the Under-Secretary agree that that is a sensible way forward? If so, will she assure us that something will be done to implement it?

Work needs to be done on proposals for competitive price tendering. If such proposals are to succeed, we cannot have a system that runs a high risk of being no more than a cost-cutting exercise, which will inevitably reduce access to justice and the quality of advice and representation that is available to legally aided clients. Given the range of quality accredited suppliers already in existence, where is the justification for jeopardising quality purely to save costs? Representations have been made to us that small, often ethnic, inner-city firms will have to close shop because of the proposals. The high street criminal practice could become almost defunct.

The graduated fee scheme could have the perverse effect of encouraging barristers to drag out cases so that the longer they last, the more money they receive. It is also worth pointing out that, although civil and criminal legal aid constitute different pots, the Government appear to want to examine the whole. Losing control of criminal legal aid budgets has meant a collapse in civil legal aid, excluding asylum, by 24 per cent. in real terms since 1997 as criminal expenditure has risen by 37 per cent. We need imaginative solutions to achieve a sustainable legal aid system and an application of basic management skills to criminal case management.

Another concern is the falling number of solicitors who choose criminal law defence work as a career. Work needs to be done to increase participation. The number of solicitors' offices that provide criminal defence services has fallen by 25 per cent. from 3,500 in April 2001 to 2,651 in September this year. Legal aid practitioners should be of a high quality and receive proper compensation. In a survey that the Law Society conducted, 50 per cent. of trainee solicitors said that, all things being equal, they were likely to pursue a career in legal aid work. However, the practical reality is that only 8 per cent. said that they were indeed likely to pursue a career in legal aid. Financial uncertainty is a particular problem for young barristers, who have not even the guarantee of a meagre salary.

Given that legal aid rates have not increased for approximately eight years, the idea of attaching the tag of "fat cat" to the average criminal lawyer is perverse. Indeed, the problem is so bad that criminal practitioners tell me that very few wish to practise criminal law. Of those who do, many want to become prosecutors, who get a decent salary.

Perhaps the Under-Secretary could describe the pilots for state defenders. I understand that they are even more expensive than private defence solicitors. Firms also need some predictability in their businesses. Many face immense pressure as they try to deal with new proposals and the complexities of the current system in a hostile environment.

In relation specifically to criminal law, the increased complexity of the law as well as trial length must be taken into account, as the Bar Council has argued that those are the central drivers in increasing costs. It has cited annual criminal justice Bills and other legislation, which, over the past decade, have produced major changes in almost every area of legal practice and procedure. Two important examples are the Human Rights Act 1998 and the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002.

Changes to sentencing guidelines and the increase in the number of offences that carry a prison sentence are further factors. In cases in which imprisonment is the likely consequence of a conviction, the interests of justice test in assessing entitlement to legal aid is more likely to be satisfied, causing more frequent grants of rights to representation. Imprisonment is increasing; indeed, the prison population today stands at about 77,000, an increase of 28 per cent. since 1997.

The effects of the Government's overall criminal justice policy must also be taken into account. For example, targets to increase arrest rates and the creation of a vast number of new criminal offences are contributory factors. That point was made by the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) in her very worthwhile comments in a recent Westminster Hall debate. Surely the message is that, if we are going to charge more people, send more people to Crown court trials and lock more people up, the costs of processing the accused—including legal aid costs—will rise.

Criminal solicitors are threatening to close up shop and criminal barristers have gone on strike, yet the Government seem unable to see that we need provisions to address the legal aid problems that are handicapping some of the most vulnerable and disadvantaged people in our society. What is needed is not simply to restrict the number of people being helped by the legal aid system, as the Bill proposes, but what was proposed in the Government's own report, "A Fairer Deal for Legal Aid", which was published in July this year. That is, a legal aid system that will be "fair and effective, providing access to justice for all who need it".

Why can the Government not respond to their own message? If the Minister thinks that we, or the legal profession, will accept the Bill as the answer to the legal aid crisis, she will have to think again.

4.27 pm

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): I congratulate the Government on the Bill, which I welcome. I also congratulate those in another place who did a very good job of teasing out the Bill's problems and giving them a good airing so that they could be addressed. It is not appropriate to arrogate that activity to just one side, which the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) sought to do. It is perfectly clear that the Liberal Democrats played a role, and that the hon. Gentleman's colleague and the Liberal Democrats in the other place were very complimentary about my noble colleague, Baroness Ashton. It seemed to have been a job well done all round.

It is a pity, therefore, that the atmosphere of trying to bring the Bill to fruition in everyone's interests cannot be maintained in this House, and that there has to be inaccurate cat-calling from the Conservative Front Bench. That is utterly unnecessary, and the hon. Member for Huntingdon really does get a great deal wrong. It is odd to hear him talk about the virtues of means-testing—the Conservatives usually speak of its evils—when its purpose is to get people out of poverty. The Tories took the extraordinary line only a few years ago of criticising the Government when they were doing their best to improve bureaucracy by abolishing a means test.

I also want to put the hon. Gentleman right on another point. There are plenty of applicants for the criminal Bar. My own chambers has hundreds of applicants per year.

Jeremy Wright: Will the hon. and learned Lady give way?

Vera Baird: I will in a moment. I know that the hon. Gentleman has an interest in this matter.

My chambers has hundreds of applicants every year, and I am aware of a number of young people who have now done all their training for the criminal bar and who would desperately like to get into it. They also have an ethic of public service, which helps. I wonder whether the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Jeremy Wright) is aware of that.

Jeremy Wright: I certainly am. The hon. and learned Lady is right to say that I have an interest in these matters. I practise, as she did, at the criminal Bar. I understand that plenty of people might apply to chambers such as hers, to be at the criminal Bar. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) said, the issue is how many people are going to be able to afford to practise at the criminal Bar, when there are many more lucrative options elsewhere in the legal profession. Does not the hon. and learned Lady agree that we should be attracting the brightest and best to criminal law, rather than allowing them to go elsewhere?

Vera Baird: If the Bar, made up as it is almost totally of white, upper-middle-class males, had some years ago paid attention to attracting the best, from whatever sector of society, the current imbalance in the Bar and judiciary would not prevail. The hon. Gentleman's point is not without foundation, however. There has been an understanding that because the rewards at the top of the Bar are good—as he knows—women and men together should just tolerate what there is at the bottom. That is not really a practical picture any more, but the Government have their eyes on that. In my debate in Westminster Hall, on which the hon. Member for Huntingdon commented and which the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth attended, there was a clear understanding on all sides, particularly in the Minister's response, that what she called the "baby Bar" should, in the eyes of the Government, be given improved circumstances. That, of course, is what we all want.

There is a certain amount of agreement, and it is false to sow, as the hon. Member for Huntingdon did over the preceding 20 minutes, some sort of queer animosity about matters that are not in the Bill. That causes a fair amount of concern. He talked, for instance, about it being the Government's fault that there is a perverse incentive for barristers, who are paid a refresher for every day longer that a case continues, and who therefore have no interest in shortening it. Of course, that is not the Government's fault; it is the basis on which barristers have been paid for a long time. I recall it from when I went into business as a barrister, roughly at the time, in an unfortunate coincidence, that Lady Thatcher became Prime Minister. I noted then that it was a curious way of paying people at the Bar. It needs to be attacked, but it is nothing to do with this Government.

The hon. Member for Huntingdon must face the fact that many of the things that he highlighted, such as the way in which barristers are paid and the excessive amount that very high-cost cases take from the criminal legal aid budget, go back many years. It is not sufficient for him to say that the Government have not tackled those issues over the past eight years when his Government did not even try to tackle any of them. He shakes his head, but I am willing to sit down and listen to him tell me in an intervention exactly what his Government did about very high-cost cases, recruiting people of all classes to the Bar and trying to remove the perverse incentives about which he now complains. I am waiting for his intervention.

Mr. Djanogly: It is not a question of what this or that Government did, but of how we can move things forward. The hon. and learned Lady misrepresents what I said in my speech. I did attack the Government where they needed attacking, but I also provided a series of pointers to how the position can be improved. I think that she agreed with me to that extent. Perhaps we can move forward now.

Vera Baird: If the hon. Gentleman reads his speech he will realise that he said that magistrates are on strike, which is utter rubbish, and that the Bar is on strike, which is utter rubbish—strike action was threatened for a very few days but it was accepted that Lord Carter of Coles understood their interests. The hon. Gentleman misrepresented that. He also blamed the Government for the way in which those at the Bar are paid. It was a lot of rubbish and it was quite unnecessary. I do not know why he cannot focus on the issues, which are that the Bill will promote some savings but a good deal more fairness. He ought, like his colleagues in the other place, to welcome and try to include it.

The Bill provides a reasonably simple formula, which, in magistrates courts, where costs are quite low, will exclude from legal aid those whose income is above a particular level. The hon. Gentleman did not appear to have digested the fact that there is a separate system for the Crown court, which is now in a supplement to the framework document. That different model will allow for the much higher costs in a Crown court, with a barrier over which one cannot get legal aid and a barrier under which one gets it whatever, with those in the middle being dealt with through a refined and fairly reasonable, on the face of it, basis of means-testing. That comes with the important proviso, on which everyone should be able to focus, that someone who is acquitted, all other things being equal, should be entitled to a defence costs order. That is also subject to the proviso that there must be an interests of justice override where the sheer mathematics are such that the interests of justice are not represented in giving a grant of representation.

There is also the issue of fairness—fairness to us all because we all pay in the end, and legal aid must be well organised, and also an element of fairness in the establishment of equivalence with civil legal aid. There have always been contributions on a means-tested basis for the purpose of civil legal aid, but that has not always applied to criminal legal aid, which seems slightly odd. The theory may be that because criminal defendants have no option but to be in that position, they should not be required to contribute, but defendants in civil cases often have no option either. It is odd that both groups have not always been subject to means-testing.

The other important aspect of fairness is clear: no one who needs representation should not be given it. I am very pleased that in the House of Lords everyone coalesced around the interests of justice test, and that it is to stay.

The hon. Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies) levelled a criticism at the change of heart, but I do not think that it should have been a criticism. The idea behind the scrapping of the means test was pretty simple. The costs in magistrates courts are very low. The state probably pays less if it bears them than if it must engage people to calculate a means test on a very complex basis in order to recover a small amount at a rate of perhaps a pound or two a week. That must have seemed a very reasonable position to take. Moreover, there was a huge increase in legal aid certificates that could not rationally be linked to the changes, almost as if there had been carte blanche for everyone to receive a certificate. That has led to anomalies. No one could possibly cheer when well-paid footballers receive legal aid for antisocial behaviour without making a contribution, and there is clearly a need for change.

Mr. Burrowes: When I was practising as a criminal solicitor, it was proposed that means-testing should be abolished. Solicitors did not propose its abolition; they, indeed all practitioners, were saying "Let us deal with the implementation and administration of the scheme." It was the Government who went ahead and abolished it. We, or anyone else, could have told them that applications would increase. It does not require sophisticated judgment to conclude that once those accused of drink-driving offences, for instance, are allowed legal aid there will be an increase in the number of certificates.

Vera Baird: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is completely wrong. The notion that the Government made the change without consulting the professions and other stakeholders widely is totally incorrect.

Mr. Burrowes: Did they listen?

Vera Baird: Of course they listened. I cannot comment on whether members of the hon. Gentleman's branch of the profession said what he tells us they said, but I was active in the magistrates court at the time.

Mr. Burrowes: It was made clear to me, as a member of the London Courts Solicitors Association, that the problem related to the practical implementation. The position is improving greatly, but the Government seemed to decide, no doubt in the interests of finance, to abolish means-testing without considering what the effects might be. That is symptomatic of their tendency to pigeonhole decisions—to make them at one end without seeing the probable outcomes at the other.

Vera Baird: It really was not as clear as that. If the hon. Gentleman shows me some brilliant document from the London Criminal Courts Solicitors Association suggesting a better mechanism for means-testing, I shall be very surprised. There was undoubtedly wide stakeholder consultation on the proposal, and it was a realistic possibility that it would be cheaper not to means-test than to means-test. However, there was inconsistency in the ways in which various magistrates courts were granting certificates. In some areas, it was seen as an invitation to open the floodgates; in others, that did not apply to the same extent. A number of certificates were issued that would not have been issued before, but there was no match between the change and the increase.

Mr. Heath: Surely at the time there was a trade-off between increasing the speed of legal proceedings by removing what was seen as an obstacle and a potential increase in costs. The view taken at the time was that removing the means test was likely to involve more benefit than disbenefit. Now it appears that the opposite view has been taken.

Vera Baird: Yes, that played a significant role but, in addition, removing that layer of bureaucracy was intended to be cheaper. Clearly, there are unacceptable occasions when someone who is very well to do receives legal aid, which has pointed to the need for a new look at the whole system. I hope that we will end up with a smarter, slicker, neater means test. It should not hold back justice significantly, especially given the high calibre of the people who will implement it through the service level agreement. The scheme should be coherent and consistent. The LSC has the background responsibility, but it will be delegated to those on the front line who have the practical skills. Therefore, one hopes for consistency and simplicity of application, so that we can get the best out of it.

I said that I thought that the scheme was a combination of fairness and savings. The savings are estimated to be around £35 million. Of course, they are well worth having. I guess that they will come from exclusions, from 10 to 20 per cent. fewer applications and from contributions. I do not know whether there will be any administrative savings as well, but it is key that, essentially, the same people will be involved, who will have the knowledge. I know that the Bar was worried about handing over the decisions on merits to the LSC when it was not front-line, court experienced. I think that that has been managed sensibly through the scheme.

As I have mentioned, it is imperative that we use legal aid in the civil system to ensure that we attack social exclusion. We have to disperse our available legal advice and other advice about debt and so on, and ensure that the poor, who cannot in another way obtain such advice, are resourced to get it. Many poor people do not know their rights. They are at the bottom economically, with no power of that kind to fight back. They can be pushed around by authorities, those who have better resources, organisations, Government and local government, because they do not have that power. Their rights can and will be abused if they are not given sufficient resources to have, as it were, a friend on their side who can advance their case. That imbalance must be addressed and legal aid in the civil sector is an important part of that.

It is also important that there should not be any lessening in the adequacy of support in the criminal sector. We are getting more cases to court. Surely everyone welcomes that. The conviction rate is getting better. We have better investigation, charging and review of charging. There is support for witnesses under the no witness, no justice scheme, so that witnesses have more confidence to come to court. That is what we all want—to catch more criminals, to bring them to court and, we hope, to play a role in reducing crime and the fear of crime.

That is all very good. It will inevitably increase legal aid costs, but we must keep the matter in proportion. There must not be any diminution of input into legal aid. I fear that, occasionally in these discussions, we lose sight of the fact that often people who come to court are not guilty and they need support to make their case. They can be found not guilty for a range of reasons, from mistaken identity or scientific evidence to having a legal defence. They may have been put into the frame by some criminal to get himself out of it. I have defended innumerable people who, on the face of the papers, I did not think would be easy to defend. I have found that I have been right to fight very hard for their cause because, in truth, they were not guilty. One cannot always see from the papers that that is the case. Therefore, do not let the savings be automatically allocated to civil legal aid if that is going to mean that there is inadequate resourcing of people on the criminal side.

The Longford lecture was recently delivered by Baroness Hale, the first Law Lady. She made another point that emphasises the importance of adequate criminal legal aid. She drew attention—her lecture was about women in the criminal justice system—to the fact that about 30 per cent. of women in prison have suffered from long-term domestic violence. About a quarter have been raped or have suffered sexual abuse—conviction rates for both offences are low—and they are highly unlikely to have received any justice. About half had either psychiatric or addictive behaviours in the year before they were taken into custody.

It is reasonably clear from that—though it would be a great jump if one were doing a research thesis—that trauma and chaos have been thrown into these women's lives and that they often turn to crime as a way of dealing with their poverty or with other problems. They have already been failed once—society has let the abuse be inflicted on them and given them no justice—so it is important that they are not failed again by not being provided with enough money to defend themselves.

David T.C. Davies rose—

Vera Baird: That was my last word, but I will give way to the hon. Gentleman.

David T.C. Davies: The hon. and learned Lady is extremely generous in giving way on her last word. I share her concern about the levels of domestic violence, but is she aware that the statistics show that married couples are a quarter less likely to be involved in domestic violence than those who are either co-habiting or single? Does that not suggest that the Government should offer more support to the institution of marriage?

Vera Baird: The hon. Gentleman is incorrect. The figures show that there is more reporting of cases by non-married than by married people. He cannot rightly draw the conclusion that he has drawn. One worries that people hold on to marriages longer than they should because of the institution of marriage, but that is a very different debate.

I want to end by saying that the new fairness is very welcome, that the savings are very welcome and that I look forward to them being used even-handedly and wisely across the range of legal aid.

4.46 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): It is a pleasure, as always, to follow the hon. and learned Lady. As is also very often the case, I agree with a great part of what she said. In particular, I agree that we should not be ashamed of legal aid; rather, we should rejoice in it. I am one of the few non-lawyers—either practising or non-practising—who is contributing to this evening's debate, but I want to make it absolutely plain that legal aid is unequivocally one of the most important pillars of the welfare state. It is as important in its way as provisions for education, health or social security, because allowing people access to justice is the mark of a civilised society—and that means ensuring that they are properly represented if they find themselves before a court of law.

Our debate has encompassed the whole of legal aid rather than the specifics of the Bill on Second Reading—I think that that is entirely appropriate in the present circumstances. It is important that we say how important both the criminal and civil legal aid systems are. It is right to acknowledge how the criminal legal aid budget has unfortunately squeezed the civil legal aid budget to an unacceptable degree. We should recognise the Government's difficulties in controlling the budget. Of course we recognise that dealing with it presents a problem for them, but it is not unreasonable also to say that we do not entirely agree with the way in which they have addressed the problem, notwithstanding what is contained in the Bill.

What I have found particularly distressing about Government propaganda recently is the constant concentration on so-called fat-cat lawyers to the exclusion of those who provide day-to-day services throughout the country to people who truly need the support of a solicitor or junior barrister in the courts. The more the attention of the press, the media and the public is drawn to a very small number of QCs operating at the Old Bailey or elsewhere to the exclusion of the rest of the profession, the more we do a disservice to the totality of the profession and the legal aid that is provided. It is a diversionary tactic that is intended to provide a hate figure for more easily led colleagues. They say, "We have got to do something about these very rich lawyers," without recognising that there is a very thin dividing line between reducing the excesses of some and reducing the effectiveness of the whole.

Adam Afriyie: Legal aid is incredibly important to the least well-off and most vulnerable in society, but does the hon. Gentleman agree that an absence of legal aid practising solicitors is equally iniquitous?

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman is right and I will deal with that point in a moment. We rightly always draw attention to the most vulnerable and the least financially able to make a point, but this issue affects a much wider swathe of individuals. It is a truism to say that nobody—and certainly not the articulate middle classes—thinks about legal aid until they themselves are in a court and have no access to a solicitor at the point of need. One of the difficulties in arguing the case for legal aid effectively is perhaps that so many people assume that they will never be in that position until they are. Then they realise just how important its provision is.

Much has been made of the idea that fees to lawyers are a substantial part of the problem, but in fact the evidence suggests the reverse. Remuneration for the large bulk of those providing legal aid is not excessive by any means and fees have been frozen for some time. The legal aid budget has risen inexorably simply because of the volume of business being pushed through, which is largely the result of the huge number of prosecutable offences that have been put on to the statute book. I do not know the precise figure, but the last time that I looked, this Government had created some 700 new offences. I suspect that the figure is now approaching 800. The legal aid impact test is now being applied to new legislation, but it is 800 offences too late: the damage has already been done.

New offences are included in Bills with monotonous regularity; sometimes, they are included before the offences that they are replacing have even been implemented. That provides work for lawyers but is of no advantage to anybody else. We must ask ourselves what the consequences are of such an approach. One way to reduce the legal aid budget is to have a sensible prosecuting policy and not to prosecute such absurd offences as reading out a list of names by the Cenotaph. In the first instance, we need sensible laws and offences that do not unnecessarily restrict free speech.

The attempt to get other Departments to share the legal aid costs associated with the offences that they put on the statute book is laudable, but I shall believe it when I see it happen. I fear that the Department for Constitutional Affairs does not have the clout within Government and the Cabinet to make this idea work. It could have worked, had my and others' proposal come to fruition to replace the DCA with a full-blown ministry of justice that takes significant powers from the Home Office. If we had that big player in government, perhaps more account might be taken of this idea. When I see the Home Office divesting itself of a significant part of its budget and handing it over to the DCA to pay for the consequences of the offences that it has put on to the statute book in this year's criminal justice legislation, this year's asylum and immigration legislation or this year's anti-terrorism legislation, perhaps I will believe it. Until that happens, I fear that this is a fruitless endeavour.

We have also heard about the management of cases, but that cannot be swept aside as irrelevant, as it is critical to the amount of costs incurred. If we managed prosecutions better, we could manage defence cases better. At present, the evidence is that the management of cases, and of high-cost cases in particular, is lamentably poor in many instances, with the result that costs are higher.

The hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) mentioned early intervention. Although he was speaking more about civil cases than criminal ones, I agree that early intervention can prevent matters going to court that otherwise would have to and that the effect is to reduce costs overall.

I shall give some examples of how not to deal with the expanding legal aid budget. First, we must be very careful about the thresholds that are applied. I pay tribute to the Government for having listened to the Liberal Democrats' departmental committee on this subject, and to the views of my noble Friends in another place. The system that has emerged has a built-in sensitivity that might not have been expected. A steep or sharp threshold would mean that there was a point at which a person's income would suddenly require him or her to pay the full costs of defence, even though that person had not had to pay anything before that point was reached. That would be inappropriate, whereas the tapering that is in place is entirely appropriate. However, the test is whether people are denied access to justice by their means, and that is a test that we cannot yet apply.

The second way not to deal with the matter is to reduce the service that lawyers can provide to clients. An example of that is evident in the immigration service, where the whole thrust of previous immigration legislation has been to cut costs by reducing what lawyers can do for their clients. The effect has been to drive good practitioners out, and to allow poorer practitioners to be the sole defence resource for those who need it.

We must also be careful about reducing fees. The Government have chosen a very arbitrary way to reduce fees, especially for junior counsel, but the number of people practising at the Bar and as solicitors is falling. It is very difficult to find legal aid solicitors in large parts of the country and, if we are not careful, the result will be that some places will become advice deserts. Often, the most deprived areas are not the worst affected: perversely, people in the most affluent areas are less likely to have legal aid practitioners. It is probably the worst thing of all to be poor in an affluent area, as such people have no access to services that they have a right to expect.

The House needs to be aware of how few practitioners there are in the less affluent and rural parts of Britain. As I have said many times, my town of Frome has a magistrates court but only one practitioner in one practice providing criminal legal aid. He can do so because he is cross-subsidised by the rest of the practice, but his colleagues' patience about that cross-subsidy may not last for ever. It is often reported that Frome magistrates court will close and that it will move to a new location 35 miles away. If that happens, I am sure that the patience of the other partners in the practice will be exhausted, as they will not want their colleague to be out of the office all day, every day, on visits to faraway magistrates courts. The result will be that there will be no one to represent people who require criminal legal aid in the magistrates courts in my area.

That is a huge concern. It is bad enough to have only one practitioner, given the obvious potential for a conflict of interest to arise. For example, the practitioner in Frome often represents interesting young gentlemen—I shall not say "thugs"—and in their defence makes a familiar speech, telling the court about the extraordinary behaviour that a break-up with a girlfriend occasioned, and about the remorse that the young gentleman in question has expressed. However, that might coincide with his client having a fight with another young gentleman, whose story is suspiciously similar. That could involve a conflict of interests. If we do not have such practitioners, how will we provide the service?

I am dubious about having a public defender service as a matter of course, which seems to me to be the direction in which we are inexorably headed. If that happened, the state would investigate the crime, mount the prosecution, try the crime and defend the defendant. I am not sure that that is how criminal justice should work in this country, and we need to be cautious about reaching that situation.

Jeremy Wright: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that not only would a criminal defence service be not necessarily better for the defendant, but—on the evidence we have so far—it would be no cheaper either?

Mr. Heath: It would almost certainly be more expensive, because we would no longer have the cross-subsidy that I mentioned earlier. It is more and more difficult to maintain that cross-subsidy anyway, as aspects of solicitors' general practice are hived off to other professions. The conveyancing that used to provide a large part of practices' income is now done by others, and other parts of the job are being done by other professions. That means that many towns do not have general practices providing all the services. That may not be a problem in a large city, which will have a variety of practices specialising in different areas, but it is certainly a problem in market towns and rural areas, which have a limited number of solicitors who have to provide a wide range of services.

Vera Baird: The hon. Gentleman makes the point well about the lack of cross-subsidy and the possibility that heavier costs will follow as a consequence. I am interested in his notion that because the state finances a criminal defence it might not be so good. I have done a case in which the criminal defence representatives were able to mobilise the Criminal Cases Review Commission to order the police to seize some evidence in a way that I am convinced that no high street firm would have been able to mobilise an organ of state to do. That may have been because the defence representatives were funded by the state, albeit at arm's length, and had some extra clout in some situations. They certainly did in that case. Is the hon. Gentleman interested in that as a counter-argument?

Mr. Heath: I am certainly always interested in counter-arguments and I do not wish to cast aspersions on the professionalism of lawyers employed in that capacity. Indeed, the source of funding is the same in either case. The question is whether a person is under contract directly to the state—as barristers are not—in a way that would be an innovation in our legal system.

The point that the hon. and learned Lady makes gives me cause for concern in the other direction, because I would not want us to have an elite defender system any more than I would wish us to have a substandard defender system. If it is true that a state defender would have more clout with the prosecuting authorities than other defenders, something would need to be done to prevent that from happening.

Vera Baird: In the case I mentioned, it was the Criminal Cases Review Commission, not the prosecuting authorities. The defence was able to mobilise that independent third party, and I wondered if it was because it had the clout of being directly financed by the state. It was to the defendant's huge advantage.

Mr. Heath: I am glad for the defendant, but the CCRC needs to look carefully at its independence if it considered more favourably a request from a particular source than one from an equally valid but alternative source.

Much has been said about the Carter review and what it will achieve. If it achieves everything that is expected of it, it will be a remarkable review indeed. I have some expectation that something will emerge from it. I have a jaundiced view of Government reviews as a rule, because it is this Government's way of saying mañana to establish a review, or a review of a review, or a review of a review of a review. In this instance, however, as the issue is urgent something is likely to emerge. I hope that it is not scuppered, like the Turner review, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer before it is even published. That would be extremely unhelpful.

I fear that an increase of costs will be involved, so there is a real prospect of that happening but I hope that the DCA will be able, and want, to stand up for itself and say that legal aid and legal services can never be provided on the cheap. They must be effective, but there will always be a cost, and to return to the point with which I began, in response to the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird), we should be proud of the fact that we provide those services to our citizens.

We shall support the Bill. There is nothing exceptionable in it. I am deeply disappointed that the Minister wants to revisit the issue of appeal, as the sensible amendment proposed by my noble Friend, Lord Goodhart, in the other place commended itself to Members there. The Minister says that the eligibility rules are simply a matter of arithmetic. I disagree. There is of course a large element that is arithmetic and it would be nonsense to require it to be appealed, but there is also the complex issue of whether, in a relationship or partnership, another person's financial position and arrangements should be taken into account as part of the eligibility criteria. That is properly a matter for appeal.

The previous appeal system was not overused and I do not think the proposed one would be. There would be no significant issues in terms of either costs or delay. At the end of the day, we are talking about the interests of justice. If someone is denied representation who feels that they should have it, it is per se in the interests of justice that we look into why it has been refused, if it is anything other than an incontrovertible case based on simple arithmetic.

Adam Afriyie: If it is simply a matter of a mathematical calculation, there is no reason why the existing court system cannot undertake it.

Mr. Heath: I would not expect an appeal to be heard on a challenge that someone had done their sums wrong. That would not be grounds for appeal, but where the issue is more complex, I would expect the court to take an interest in how the calculations had been made, because that is in the interests of justice. That is the distinction that I want to make, and in Committee I shall argue that point.

Vera Baird rose—

Mr. Heath: I have spoken for longer than I intended and to be fair to other Members I shall not give way again.

I was interested in the Minister's response on the relevant date for assessment. I think she suggested, perhaps off the cuff, that it should be the date of arrest, which might be difficult to manage. The date of charge might be rather easier to manage as the relevant date. As that provision will probably appear in regulations rather than in the legislation, it might help if careful consideration were given to it before Committee, so that we have some idea of the Government's thinking.

I should be interested in exploring the mechanism for the contribution paid. Are we intending that practitioners should be paid, presumably under contract from the commission, irrespective of whether the required contribution had been returned to the commission? Perhaps the Minister will be able to satisfy me on that point in due course.

We need to consider whether the Bill will achieve the savings that the Minister presumably expects from it. If they can be made, will they come from the contributions that more affluent people make to the cost of legal aid or from reducing the eligibility of those who are less affluent to legal aid at the bottom end? The House needs to be able to understand that important distinction in allowing the Bill to make further progress.

We have not yet had a satisfactory answer about a basic trade-off. A few years ago, we were told that the reason for abolishing the means test was effectively to produce a quick, efficient system that would obviate the need for lengthy means tests, which were getting in the way. We are now told that the Government's view is that we must reintroduce the means test because that is an effective way to produce a quick, efficient system that will save money for the taxpayer. Clearly, there is a trade-off between the speed of the process and its cost. I appreciate that the Government are trying to find the balance, but they must be clear about where the balance of advantage lies. However, I certainly do not wish to oppose the Bill this evening.

5.10 pm

Jeremy Wright (Rugby and Kenilworth) (Con): I do not propose to detain the House for long. I declare an interest as a non-practising criminal barrister and as a distinctly thin cat, rather than a fat cat, in the course of my practice. I have two concerns about the Bill. First, it does not perhaps address in the way that the Government hope it will the fundamental problem at the heart of the criminal legal aid budget. Secondly, in trying to address the problem in that way, the danger is that the Bill will damage the criminal justice system.

Following the remarks that have been made by other hon. Members on the first issue, I have two points to make. First, within the parameters of my experience as a practising criminal barrister, I can think of very few of my clients who would be caught by the scope of the Bill and who would have to pay any contribution to their own legal costs because their incomes would come below—in many cases, well below—the limit that the Government propose. I therefore wonder whether a sizeable percentage of those who were my clients would save us any money at all if they were invited to contribute a proportion of their own costs.

The other issue, which goes to the heart of the matter, and to which other hon. Members have drawn attention, is that the Government do not address in the Bill the very high-cost criminal cases that form a significant part of an unacceptably ever-growing criminal legal aid budget. Until something is done about those cases, the budget will not be brought under control. In fact, I suggest that the situation is worse than that: the danger is that those who practise at the junior end of the criminal Bar get the blame and must carry the burden of those who cause the real problem at the top end of the criminal Bar. That problem is not addressed by the Bill, which, if anything, perpetuates the myth that lawyers and, indeed, their clients in the criminal justice system are mainly responsible for the overspend. In my view, they are not.

Whether the criminal justice system operates at too high a cost is a genuine concern—it very clearly does—but the reason why it does so is not mainly, substantially and certainly not entirely due to the fact that criminal legal aid is paid in too high amounts to lawyers and their clients. Many other things in the criminal justice system need to be addressed, such as why cases do not come to court as quickly as they should and why there are innumerable adjournments. That has to do with a range of things—the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) referred to a few of them—including failure to disclose evidence in time and problems relating to witnesses and defendants who fail to attend courts. There are even problems, I am sorry to say, relating to defendants not being produced on time from the prisons where they are on remand. That causes delay, and delay causes cost. If the Government chose to do an analysis of costs, I would not be surprised if they discovered that a good portion of the overspend that they correctly describe in the criminal justice legal aid system results from that sort of problem.

The other difficulty that I have with the Bill is the fact that in the course of attempting to save money, the Government may do damage to the pursuit of criminal justice. It is inevitable that some people who do not receive criminal legal aid because their means are too excessive will choose to represent themselves. The Government have accepted that that will happen in a small number of cases, but I venture to suggest that it might happen in a substantial number of cases. In my experience as a lawyer, when that happens a case inevitably takes longer, and when a case takes longer, it costs more. When the Government calculate the amount that they hope to save through the Bill, they must take account of the lack of saving—if I may put it that way—that will result if more people choose to represent themselves.

The problem that arises when people represent themselves is not only monetary. It is of course right that such people, as non-trained lawyers, might not be able to get to the heart of the matter as quickly as a legal representative could. Cross-examination also goes on longer. However, in a substantial number of cases, it is profoundly undesirable that those who represent themselves should be permitted to cross-examine witnesses. One can think of several examples of such cases, including neighbour disputes and, worse yet, cases involving a child as a victim or a witness. If prosecutions are conducted in such a way that defendants represent themselves and thus cross-examine witnesses, the process not only takes longer, but detracts from the nature of justice and affects the tone of the case.

Although I do not object to the substance of the Bill, it fails to address the concerns that I have cited. I hope that the Minister will carefully examine not only what the Bill covers, but what it does not cover. As the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) said, when we deal with criminal defendants, we are often dealing with vulnerable individuals in their most vulnerable moments. It is important that they receive the assistance that they need so that they are represented properly. If they become inclined to defend and represent themselves, as I suspect that they will in some cases, it will not enhance the nature of British justice—quite the reverse. I hope that the Minister will take my points on board and bear them in mind when she thinks about other matters that the Government might wish to address when considering the criminal justice system as a whole.

5.17 pm

Mr. David Burrowes (Enfield, Southgate) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Jeremy Wright). I wish to follow on from his experiences at the Bar with my experience—I declare an interest—as a practising criminal solicitor-advocate.

The titles of Government Bills have tended to be more descriptive in recent times. For example, we recently considered the Violent Crime Reduction Bill. Perhaps a more descriptive title of this Bill would be the "Return of means-testing following our mistake in abolishing it Bill". The Government must have the humility to acknowledge that the will to abolish means-testing was theirs. They have realised that they made a mistake, so they are trying to reintroduce it.

I was a practising solicitor at the time at which we had the means-testing application forms. We all realised the administrative burdens and the problems and delays that the system caused. However, the problem was not means-testing per se, but the way in which it was administered. I remember the delays vividly. When clients applied for legal aid—as it was called before the representation orders came into being—they were not necessarily the most reliable of sorts. They were required to provide documentary evidence, but they were often self-employed. It took a great deal of time for their statements of accounts to come before the courts, or to get the wage slips for 13 weeks that were needed. There were weekly adjournments, and we went through the process of trying to get blood out of a stone to get the next wage slip to get up to the magic mark of 13 so that we could eventually reach a position at which legal aid could be considered. We certainly knew that the system needed to be changed to take account of those delays and problems.

Another problem arose due to contribution orders. Clients were often required to make a contribution of a matter of pounds a week, but failed to do so over several weeks. Just before the trial—indeed, in some cases, it was on the day of the trial itself—an order would be issued to revoke their legal aid order because they had not paid their contribution. The trial process ended, and we went back to square one. That must change, and I urge the Government to be cautious about the implementation of the new contribution orders so that we do not return to the bad old days when contribution orders were a spanner in the works for the trial process and the criminal justice system. There is certainly support for a much more simplified, straightforward form of means-testing. It should be less bureaucratic and burdensome, so I welcome the proposals in the Bill.

I am concerned about the rationale of the proposal to transfer responsibilities for granting representation orders from the courts to the Legal Services Commission. I am not aware of any justification for that proposal, and while I welcome the devolution of powers in the Bill to court staff—notionally, there will not be any changes in administration—the fundamental principle that the courts are the proper place for the judicial function of considering the merits of legal aid should be retained. The hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) referred to complaints about inconsistency after the means-testing scheme was abolished, and spoke about a flood of applications. She sought to criticise the courts for their inconsistency in granting certificates, and suggested that their decisions were wrong. I have not seen any research or statistics to justify such an assertion. From a practitioner's point of view, as soon as the means test was abolished it opened the way for problems for people charged, for example, with driving offences, who could not produce their payslips or a statement of accounts, and thus could not receive a legal aid certificate. Those people now fall within the range for the granting of legal aid, which, in the past, was often granted to people who had the means to pay for representation. The number of certificates increased, but that had little to do with a more liberal approach by the courts towards the granting of certificates. In my years of practice, I did not encounter any inconsistency in the granting of certificates by the courts, so that argument does not provide a proper rationale for seeking to transfer the primary responsibility for granting legal aid from the courts to the Legal Services Commission.

Recently, however, concerns were expressed when the commission became much more involved in the budgets of individual courts. Court staff were anxious about the targets they had to meet, and the decisions that were made were arbitrary, and not in the interests of justice. Inconsistencies, unfairness and injustice arise when the commission is involved in decision making, so it is worrying that the Bill should confer powers on it. I accept that those powers will be devolved to court staff, but the Bill refers to monitoring by the commission, apparently to deal with the problem of inconsistency. Courts should have a proper residual power to grant legal aid. There is no such provision in the Bill, but it was mentioned in the other place, where Members were anxious about human rights compliance and the need for proper safeguards. In Committee, the Government should accept that the appeal process for legal aid should comply with human rights provisions. Moreover, they should go a step further and retain the principle of residual power for courts to grant legal aid.

My hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) spoke about the prospect of defendants charged with either-way offences electing to plead in such a manner that means they will not be encumbered by contribution orders. I have represented clients who have been primarily concerned with the financial consequences of legal aid, and they have thus elected to plead in a certain way. At present, they must submit a statement of means, so they run the risk of contributing to defence costs. The reverse could well be true if we stagger, as we seek to do, the implementation of means-testing by magistrates courts and Crown courts. In either-way cases, many defendants will base their decision about whether to be tried in a magistrates court or in a Crown court on the issue of which court is less expensive for them. Plainly, there needs to be some reconciliation between the two procedures. We need to avoid the eventuality that I described, which could well increase the costs.

Finally, I wish to talk up the role of the criminal solicitor.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Hear, hear.

Mr. Burrowes: Thank you. I am obliged for that support.

It is easy, as has been mentioned in the debate, to stereotype legal aid debates and talk loosely about fat-cat lawyers and so on. Solicitors generally provide a good service, offering high quality advice at unsocial hours. If the solicitor is lucky, he sees his client in an interview room. If he is unlucky, the meeting takes place in a smelly cell. Clients are often the most vulnerable in our community and are often dangerous. Their liberty is at stake.

Solicitors up and down the land fulfil that role. They are under great pressure, not least because of the Government's proposals and the pigeon-hole approach to legal aid that the Government have taken. The Bill is a symptom of that approach to the criminal legal aid service. We all recognise that there has been an increase in criminal legal aid. The situation in the lower courts is largely under control, as the Legal Services Commission has recognised. The Department has predicted a decrease in that budget. It is estimated that the Bill will make savings of £35 million.

Taking all those factors together—a budget under control, solicitors properly administering the contracting process, and case management procedures in courts having their effect—we should get off the back of solicitors, who seek to provide a good service throughout the country.

We still face the prospect, which is no doubt under review, of competitive tendering, which could go to the heart of local services. It could drive out local firms, and black and minority ethnic firms in London could be disproportionately affected by such proposals. It is high time the Government took price competitive tendering off the agenda and removed solicitors and the lower courts from their gaze. No doubt high cost cases are a proper target. My hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Jeremy Wright) mentioned that delays are endemic within the system—delays caused, for example, by a prison van routinely failing to turn up. No doubt the courts could examine the 1 per cent. of cases that make up 25 per cent. of the criminal legal aid budget. There is certainly no basis for focusing on solicitors, who are trying to do a good job and are keeping proper control of the budget.

Although I welcome most of the Bill, I ask the Government to examine in detail the forgoing of the important principle of the interests of justice being properly determined by the courts, to look in the round at the cost of criminal legal aid budgets, and to ensure that they provide a good service to solicitors and defendants alike.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): I am delighted to have the opportunity to speak in the debate. I join my hon. Friends in giving a cautious welcome to the Bill, with certain caveats. I am not a lawyer, but one does not need one when reading through the Bill to realise that it represents a giant U-turn on the Act that the Government passed in 1999.

The Minister said the old system was decrepit and in need of change, in which case one must ask why she, or rather her colleagues, did not change the system. What they did was tear it up and start again. The Government insisted that means-testing would have to be abolished. They were warned at the time that abolition would mean an exponential growth in claims and legal aid bills, but they dismissed that on the basis that the extra claims would be more than offset by the increase in efficiency as a result of dispensing with the service for the calculation of contributions.

Legal aid spending has increased by 34 per cent. since 1997. The Government's figures suggest that the increase in costs is because people who would previously have paid for legal aid are taking advantage of the fact that they can now get it—the example involving a professional footballer who earns £40,000 a week is simply the tip of the iceberg. [Interruption.] I would be happy to take an intervention by the hon. Member for Workington (Tony Cunningham).

The Government introduced the 1999 Act in the face of warnings, and they made an error that cost millions of pounds and that possibly denied people access to justice. However, we must not be too hard on them, because any creditable system of justice should give a little credit to an offender who admits to having made an error and who wants to put that error right. Although we have not heard an apology from the Minister yet—perhaps we will get one shortly—the Bill is a way to make amends and reverse the errors introduced by the Labour party, and it will therefore receive cross-party support.

Vera Baird: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman has read the Hansard, but there was not a squeak from any Conservative Member when that change was made.

David T.C. Davies: I have not read the Hansard, but I have read a number of reports, which make it clear that warnings were given to Ministers that the cost of legal aid would increase. It is for Ministers, not the Opposition, to take such decisions, and today they have admitted that they took the wrong decision. All I want is for them to accept that they took the wrong decision.

The Government have said that money will be saved, and they have discussed the figure of £35 million. I shall echo the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) and ask about the form in which we will see those savings. Will legal aid bills reduce by £35 million, or will the money simply be spent in different ways, in which case the legal aid bill may continue to rise?

To pick up on a point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor (Adam Afriyie), how will the Government police the mechanism for ensuring that people do not submit incorrect information when they claim legal aid? My hon. Friend has discussed the possibility of hiding funds in offshore costs, and it would also be easy for people to take out their savings, which is the asset that will be examined, to pay off the capital on their house or to buy a new car. What steps, if any, will be taken to police the mechanism and ensure that people provide accurate information? The Minister keeps saying that the Government will come up with an efficient system, but one cannot help but wonder whether the Government's definition of efficiency simply entails accepting on trust applications made by people who are already in the courts having been charged with other offences.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) rightly drew attention to the point that one reason why legal aid bills are increasing is that the Government keep creating ever more offences. He discussed the example of a young lady who was arrested simply for reading out the names of British soldiers killed in Iraq. I do not suppose that that young lady is a paid-up member of her local Conservative association, but I fully support her right to speak out. Apart from the increase in legal aid bills, I find it extraordinary that such cases are being brought. The Government are going to try to be tough on legal aid spending, but they are not going to be tough on the causes of legal aid spending.

The Government could dramatically reduce costs in one or two other areas. Returning to asylum and immigration cases, more than £200 million was spent on legal aid for such cases in the financial year 2003–04. All hon. Members believe that genuine asylum seekers should be given all possible help in order to stay in this country. As the Government's figures show, however, the vast majority of those who claim asylum are making false claims and are not genuine asylum seekers. It is unacceptable that £200 million is being spent in this way, thereby funding legal advice to people who are making bogus claims. I know that all Members, many of whom are lawyers, are honourable, in and out of the House. However, I am concerned about the immigration and asylum lawyers who are, frankly, filling their boots with taxpayers' cash by launching one appeal after another in cases that are demonstrably hopeless. I suggest that the Minister should consider how legal aid for asylum and immigration is funded and even explore the possibility of withdrawing legal aid from people whose claims will clearly be false because they come from countries where there should be no danger to their lives.

The Government should examine the way in which sentences are imposed. One of the reasons legal aid bills are so high is that we have a system whereby offenders are able to keep reappearing on various offences because they have never been sentenced properly in the first place. If people were given adequate prison sentences, they, first, would not be free to go around breaking the law and causing more misery to members of the public, and, secondly, would not be causing a rise in legal aid spending by reappearing in court and making the British taxpayer responsible for their defence.

[David T.C. Davies]

It is utterly perverse that those who are in prison are able to claim legal aid in order to get out on early release. There was much self-congratulation in the establishment a few weeks ago when the murderers of Anthony Walker were given the supposedly draconian sentence of two life sentences—a double life tariff. But if one reads the small print, it is clear that those two murderers will be out walking the streets within 15 to 20 years. By the time one of them is aged 35, he will be able to go before an early release board with legal aid in order to get himself out of prison again. That is outrageous. If such people were given the sentences that they deserved, they would never walk the streets again, and they would certainly not get legal aid in order to qualify them to do so.

The Minister has a long way to go before she solves the problem of rising legal aid. She said that she is going to come up with a new system that will be simpler, more cost-effective and more efficient. Those phrases were all used a few years ago when the Access to Justice Act 1999 was introduced. I was not here in 1999—if I had been, I would be suffering from a case of déjà vu—but I would not be at all surprised if in five years' time we were not back here again having found that legal aid costs have once again soared and that the whole system is falling apart, with the difference that I fully expect that by that time those of sitting us on the Opposition side will be sitting on the Government side, and we will have a Home Secretary who will be able to put in place a proper system that will last us for many years to come.

5.38 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): I thank Members on both sides of the House for participating in a useful and constructive debate on this small but extremely significant Bill. I do not believe that there is a great deal of disagreement in the House about the key principle that lies at the heart of the Bill—that those who can afford to pay for the cost of their own defence should in normal circumstances be invited to do so. I think that we are on common ground in seeking to ensure that the legal aid budget is managed on a sustainable basis.

Several Conservative Members, particularly the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly), suggested that the reintroduction of a means test could threaten access to justice. However, it is not about denying the right to representation but about determining whether it is right and proper that the state should meet the cost of that representation in all cases.

Mr. Djanogly: I did not intend to intervene on the Under-Secretary, but I should be grateful if he would explain precisely when I said that the measure would deny access to justice.

Nick Ainger: That is my recollection, and I apologise if I am incorrect. A theme that ran through the debate was the concern that individuals could be denied access to justice in some cases, but we must accept that means-testing has been an integral part of the welfare state in ensuring that those who can pay do so. Successive Governments have tried to ensure that valuable budgetary resources can be accurately and fairly allocated to those who most need them, and that argument applies to the legal aid budget. Far from restricting access to justice, means-testing will actively help to promote access for all.

Several hon. Members asked questions about or doubted whether the savings to which the supporting documentation refers would occur. The calculation of a £35 million saving comes from detailed work, which shows published thresholds of £19,000 for a couple without children up to £34,000. Of the approximately 30 per cent. of people who currently receive legal aid, two thirds will be eligible and a third will not be eligible. It is then a relatively easy calculation to establish that, on current budgets, that means a saving of £35 million. The figure relates to thresholds in the supporting documentation. We accept that, as we progress through Committee and when orders are laid, the thresholds could be adjusted. That was one of the points that the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) made.

Several hon. Members accused the Government of a massive U-turn in the Bill, given that the Access to Justice Act 1999 abolished the means test. However, it is worth referring to the Second Reading debate on that measure. The Opposition tabled a reasoned amendment to Second Reading that did not mention means-testing in its lengthy objection or in the grounds that it set out for voting against the Bill. I have read all the speeches by Opposition Members and not one mentioned the abolition of the means test. My research so far suggests that, even in Committee, Conservative Members did not object to it.

David T.C. Davies: The Under-Secretary knows that I was not here in 1999 because I was serving in the Welsh Assembly. I can assume only that so much else was wrong with the Bill that Conservative Members had other things on their minds.

Nick Ainger: Nice try. However, it is clear from the debates in 1999 that the issue was not perceived as controversial. The abolition was accepted for the reasons that the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs gave. There were clearly serious problems, which the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes) identified, in that the processes involved in the means test added significant delays to the justice system. A judgment was made at the time that abolishing it was a way of saving money, but more important, of speeding up access to justice. Hon. Members should be careful and, instead of crowing, accept that, at the time, the measure was perceived as a step in the right direction. However, our experience in the past four years or so and the various individual cases that have clearly abused the system show that something has to be done.

The hon. Member for Huntingdon mentioned certain other factors that drive the rising costs of legal aid. The reasons for the growth in expenditure are complex, and require an integrated approach if they are to be tackled successfully. "A Fairer Deal for Legal Aid", which was launched in July 2005, sets out a strategic vision for how this can be achieved. While the reintroduction of means-testing has a key role to play in that regard, it is by no means the sole focus of the strategy. For example, major steps are being taken to address the budgetary concerns posed by very high-cost criminal cases. However, it is important to recognise that the savings that will flow from the Bill are significant, with at least £35 million of savings resulting from the implementation of means tests in magistrates courts alone. For that reason, it is right and proper that we continue to give proportionate emphasis to means-testing as a major element in the strategy.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome said that the number of criminal practitioners—solicitors in particular—in his area was causing concern, and that sometimes only one solicitor would be available. We are aware of problems in certain rural areas, which are often less well provided for than urban areas. However, the Legal Services Commission is providing training grants to tackle that problem. In my experience, the number of students seeking to enter law school is continuing to rise considerably, and we need to ensure that a package is available to encourage those students to go into criminal representation.

Mr. Heath: The Minister is absolutely right; there is no shortage of keen and eager students going into law schools with high altruistic principles about going into legal aid criminal practice. The problem is finding places for them in firms such as those in my area, where training places are simply not available.

Nick Ainger: I accept that point. We have to look at the issue holistically, and perhaps it can be discussed further in Committee.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome raised the issue of the amendment that was passed in the House of Lords, and expressed his disappointment that we intend to overturn it. I should reiterate the Government's position on this policy. On the interests of justice case, the Government firmly believe that there should be an appeal to the court. However, when an applicant disputes the outcome of the means test, the Government consider that an administrative review mechanism is entirely appropriate. I think that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) made the point that it would not be justifiable to take to court a dispute over a calculation.

To provide for a full appeal process in respect of the means test would amount to a misuse of court resources, as the test is essentially administrative in nature and does not merit judicial intervention. I would add that that view is supported by members of the senior judiciary, whom we have consulted on this issue. At the end of the day, if an individual remains dissatisfied after the review has been carried out by the authorities, the individual could seek judicial review of the decision. It is for those reasons that the Government intend to table amendments in Committee to restore that position.

Mr. Heath: The Minister must know that judicial review is not a substitute for an appeal process, because it would only consider the way in which the decision was taken. It could not consider the facts ab initio as to whether the eligibility should have been granted.

Nick Ainger: The issue, however, is purely financial—[Interruption.] If we are talking about eligibility, the issue is whether or not the individual qualifies for legal aid. That involves considering the individual's financial situation, and I reiterate that that is not a justification for the court—

Adam Afriyie: I disagree entirely with what the Minister has just said. This is definitely an access to justice issue, because how can one have justice if one does not have legal aid and one cannot afford to pay for legal representation?

Nick Ainger: First, there can be an appeal to the court on the interests of justice issue if aid is refused on those grounds. Eligibility, in purely financial terms, concerns whether or not the individual has sufficient resources to qualify for legal aid. That is not an access issue. With some of the thresholds that have been indicated, and the availability of resources test, this is a perfectly reasonable move forward. We need to keep the system relatively simple but fair, so that we do not return to the old system, which the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate described so well, and the problems that occurred under it.

Jeremy Wright: Surely the Minister cannot have it both ways. If, as he says, the eligibility criterion is a straightforward mathematical exercise, an appeal on that basis cannot waste much court time, can it?

Nick Ainger: Why should the matter be taken to court when there is a review system? If the argument is about what someone earns, or what their outgoings are, the position should be relatively clear. I fail to see why this sort of issue should end up in court.

Mr. Heath rose—

Nick Ainger: I shall give way for the final time on this point to the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome.

Mr. Heath: The Minister is being very generous, and we must not rehearse now the debate that we will inevitably have in Committee. I just wanted to understand the basic issue, which is not the simple addition of income in order to maintain eligibility. The most likely cause for an appeal would be in the case of estrangement or where there was a new partner who was not a spouse, on the question of whether their joint income should be taken into account for these purposes. The Minister is saying that it is all right for that to be dealt with administratively, whereas I am saying that, ultimately, a court might have to decide on the appropriateness or otherwise.

Nick Ainger: I always try to be helpful to the hon. Gentleman, and I do not know whether he has read the supplement, which goes into considerable detail about the points to which he refers—[Interruption.] All that I can say to him is that if there is such a complex issue, it is perfectly reasonable for it to be considered by judicial review. The concern, however, is that we will again tie up our courts with people appealing on their financial eligibility for legal aid. It is recognised by senior members of the judiciary that that is not a good use of court time.

[Nick Ainger]

This Bill seeks to tackle a widely recognised and much criticised flaw in the legal aid system—that, on too many occasions, those clearly able to afford the cost of their own representation and perhaps convicted of some of the most repellent and socially corrosive crimes are receiving the benefit of taxpayers' money through the legal aid system. Cases such as that of Kenneth Noye and, more recently, El-Hadji Diouf, are mercifully rare but do no credit to an otherwise socially vital, well-conceived and accepted system.

This is a common-sense measure that fits well with much of this Government's successful modernisation of the criminal justice system. It is based on the incontrovertible, broadly accepted principle that those who can afford to pay for the cost of their own defence should do so. It also makes significant progress towards ensuring that the modern legal aid system is sustainable and available for the protection of both current and future generations. It is, in short, a return to the founding principles of legal aid, and I am happy to commend the Bill to the House.

Birtley Community Partnership

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Tony Cunningham.]

5.56 pm

Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): Thank you for calling me, Mr. Speaker. I also thank the Minister for being present to reply to the debate.

I rise to speak about the town in which I live—a town where I have lived for only just over a year, but a town that has already had a major impact on my life. Birtley is not unique, except perhaps to those of us who live there. We think it is special, but I imagine that anyone else here would think the same of where they live. At its roots, it is a town built on the basis of hard work, a town that has seen hard times, and a town that deserves a break. My aim tonight is to give some impetus for the achievement of such a break.

I shall describe the history of Birtley, the solidarity and strength of a dedicated group of townsfolk and, crucially, a planning process that, if it is allowed to succeed, could be a blueprint for real community development based on partnership, consensus and involvement—not just for Birtley and not just for the whole country, but for those beyond our shores. I also want to describe the way in which I believe the Minister, his Department and local authorities can help to bring all the hard work to fruition.

Birtley is a town of some 10,000 people. It lies between Chester-le-Street and Gateshead, on what was the old Great North road—the old A1. It is an old town: indeed, in 1996 it celebrated the 300th anniversary of the founding of its Benedictine mission. The mission was founded only nine years after the execution of the Blessed George Douglas, a catholic priest who was hung, drawn and quartered on 9 September 1687 for the crime of "persuading to popery". It is an old town, and today it still has brave inhabitants.

Over the next 200 years the area experienced massive immigration, particularly from Ireland—so much so that by 1871 more than a quarter of the population were of Irish birth or descent. They came to Birtley because at the time it was a Klondike: coal, iron, chemicals, shipbuilding and engineering all beckoned to people who were struggling to survive following five horrific years of famine. They built a future for themselves and laid the foundation for people such as me to follow on.

Brickworks were popping up all over the place from the early 1850s onwards. They thrived up to the 1970s. In the years before the second world war, almost 300,000 bricks a week were produced in just two yards.

The area, like all of County Durham, was home to a number of collieries. There was even a tinplate works that was owned by the local Co-op. It produced everything from tin water bottles for miners to tea caddies for the Queen's coronation. The tin was even used during the second world war to make cases for smoke bombs.

I was amazed to discover, when speaking to people from the town, that 70 years before Nissan came to Sunderland, we built cars in Birtley. If anyone knows how I can lay my hands on a 1921, 14-horsepower Angus Sanderson, please get in touch as soon as possible.

[Mr. David Anderson]

Throughout the last century, we were one of the biggest manufacturers of munitions for all our armed services and for other countries, a role that is continued today by British Aerospace. It is noteworthy that, at its peak, over 7,000 people worked there, but today the number is nearer to 400. It is a very skilled work force dealing with high-quality equipment at a state-of-the-art facility.

Many of those workers in the early part of the last century were from Belgium, refugees escaping the trauma of the first world war. They settled in Birtley in an area that became known as Elizabethville in honour of the then Queen of Belgium. We were a town of hard-working people with lots of opportunities; but we were no strangers to struggle. Reading The Chester Chronicle—that is Chester-le-Street—from 11 March 1921, I was struck by the extract:

"a grand concert was held in aid of the Relief Fund, for the unemployed. The effort was a financial success and resulted in an amount of 12 pounds seven shillings being handed over to alleviate distress in the village."

Real hardship was the order of the day for many. During the 1926 miners' strike, people came together and shared what little they had, sticking together, making soup, or broth as we call it in the north. Sadly, as happened 60 years later, starvation and desperation forced the men back to work. The means test became a way of life for far too many and, all these years later, many old people recall all too vividly the harsh reality of that pernicious form of welfare. The sooner we have no more of it, the better say I.

The town has prospered since those dark years, thankfully. Today, we see many positive signs of improvements that our forebears could only dream of. We have new houses that are sold before they are built. We have successful schools and, beneath it all, a great community spirit. Despite the setbacks of the 1980s and 1990s, we are moving forward.

One of the best pieces of news I heard in the past year was that the jobcentre was closing because hardly any clients were using it. I pray for the day when we can celebrate the closure of the last jobcentre. Even better than that, one of the reasons that the jobcentre closed was that its offices were to be expanded into by a local company, Komatsu, which builds earth-moving equipment in Birtley and is breaking records week in, week out. However, we still want to do better. We are committed to seeing real regeneration of the town centre to complement the town's spirit and the hard work that is going on across the town.

The body that has risen to take up that challenge is the Birtley community partnership, a dedicated group of people encompassing local councillors, residents associations, the police, local businesses, youth clubs, church groups, sports clubs and school governors. Representatives of all the community have come together, inspired by the directive laid out by the Deputy Prime Minister in 2000, which said:

"people want to have a say in what happens in their community and to shape their own future."

We are taking part in that process in Birtley. Thankfully, we have had support from the Gateshead voluntary sector and Gateshead council. They have grown with the partnership, the collective voice of Birtley's people. Its remit is to seek improvements to the local environment, to communicate effectively on a two-way basis with and for local people, and to promote the regeneration of the town centre.

Already there have been small but important improvements, such as the introduction in the main street of flower baskets and flower tubs, a litter reduction scheme led and taken over by local schools, the siting of a Christmas tree in the centre of the town, which happened for years and has come back through the work of those people, and the development of an open-air carol service. Those are really small steps, but they make really tangible improvements to people's lives. They are things that put a smile on the faces of the people of Birtley.

The biggest challenge is still to come—the regeneration of the town centre. Using the avenue of the best value review carried out by Gateshead council—it was the first time that a town in this country was put under a best value review—the partnership engaged with officers from the council to put its plans forward. As part of that process, the council conducted surveys and sought the views of every person in Birtley.

To provide real ownership of the process, the council introduced Dr. Tony Gibson, OBE, to the partnership. Coincidentally, he lives in the Derwent valley, another great part of my constituency. Dr. Gibson was originally invited by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs to develop the concept of Planning for Real. It involved local people in changing their environment according to their wishes and their needs, rather than at the whim of faceless bureaucrats.

Building on 30 years of work from across the world—from Kenya to the Caribbean and most places in between—Dr. Gibson relies on hands-on techniques and readily available materials to give people the real sense of ownership that they need. People already have pride in their home town: they just need the prompt and the power to move forward from hope to reality. Dr. Gibson makes it easy and welcoming for people to engage, using simple direct instructions and guidance, such as "You tell me how you would like to see your town". He encourages people to turn talk into action. He asks people to identify their problems, but not to look to others to resolve them. Rather, people are encouraged to use their own knowledge and common sense to provide the answers. It is built up by involving as wide a cross-section of the community as possible.

By all means use expert advice, but do not let the experts own it. Build people's self-confidences and get those who believe that "It's about time, too," to do more than talk. Get them to lead by example and pull others into the project. Then make that project come alive. Develop models and maps: they do not have to be state of the art, but they do need to be recognisable to local people. Set up a skills database. Who are the local bricklayers, dressmakers, IT experts or mechanics? Ask them to play their part in helping to improve their town. From all of that activity, we can then pull together a priority list that may not move the earth, but may well make a real difference for real people on a day-to-day basis. Putting a seat in the middle of the main shopping street may not mean much to most people, but if it allows old friends to sit together in their town and talk with pride of their shared past and their hopes for the future, surely that is a job well done.

People came together in Birtley and drew scale maps of the town, saying to other people that it was a foundation that they were working for. They then said: "Put on the map what you see as the problem areas, and put next to it what you see as the solutions". That focuses people's minds and brings a real sense of ownership and control, which is done by involving people themselves. Local people are encouraged to speak out and put their point of view for the town in their own way. There is no delineation between us and them. Whether experts or onlookers, everyone is treated as an equal whose view is as worthy as the next person's.

Packs were developed for schools in Birtley and the children at Barley Mow and Ravensworth schools were busily engaged in producing models to put on to maps. They produced a video that showed what they thought needed doing to improve their town. That is nothing new. As I said earlier, this is being done across the world by Dr. Gibson and others—and it works.

Listen to some of the comments from other towns. In Sheffield, it was said:

"This is a real example of residents changing the council's mind."

In Kingston, Jamaica, it was said:

"The community support has been overwhelming."

In Statterham, South Africa:

"It's what we've been waiting for all these years. The less people are talking, the more they are doing".

In Kenya:

"The youths themselves are thinking that they can really do something."

In Bosnia:

"It was a new and inspiring experience for all of us, we will work in the same manner in the future for sure."

Commenting on the first Planning for Real project, the BBC said:

"It is a scheme of almost child like brilliance which puts reality into the lazy jargon of community participation."

It works—and we in the House all know the reality of the failure when communities do not gel and do not work together. It is great—it is a shame that no Conservative Members are present—that, at long last, the Tory leadership has come to believe that there really is such a thing as society. But unless society produces communities that work—that control their own destiny and have pride in, and belief in, themselves—it is pointless having a society. Communities must work together.

Tony Gibson and active participants such as the Birtley partnership have put into reality the words of the Minister of Communities and Local Government, my right hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Mr. Miliband), who said that we need to overcome

"a sense of powerlessness in local communities"

by

"devolving power down to street level."

They are walking the walk in Birtley and replacing apathy with action. They are using local resources and skills, and involving their friends, neighbours, children and families. They are bringing people together, identifying and tackling problems and developing solutions. They are identifying the who, what, where, when and how. They are using experts but keeping them on tap, rather than letting them be on top; they are the doers, not the talkers. They have done the groundwork and involved the community across the generations. They have ignored partisanship and rivalries. They are encouraging people to think, rather than to moan; to see, rather than to talk; to act, rather than to debate.

I am glad to report that the Birtley project has just completed a very full programme of activities throughout the town. The maps, models and toolkit have been taken into schools, churches, pubs and clubs—anywhere where people come together—and the people want more. They care about the town and they want to build a future for their community.

My right hon. Friend the Member for South Shields has agreed to visit Birtley in January and to see for himself what we do and where we are going. Gateshead council's best value review is almost in place and plans have been made up to 2010. It is hoped that soon the council will hand over to the partnership the old library, which will be developed into a drop-in centre owned by the town of Birtley and co-ordinated by the partnership. People became engaged in this process because they did not want to see a drift away from their town; they wanted to prevent further decline. They want a main street that acts as living proof of the vibrant community that Birtley has always been.

I said at the beginning of my speech that we are neither unique nor special—at least, not more so than any other town or community that has a pride in its history and a desire to build a better future. If our experience can help others, we will be happy to engage with them. This idea has worked around the world; it can work in Birtley and in other areas.

In closing, I ask the Minister to do all in his power to ensure that all this work—this effort and genuine commitment—is not in vain. Any help would be greatly welcomed and would be a testimony to our Government's real commitment to helping real people on the ground. We can put clothes on the words of the Deputy Prime Minister by not just letting people have "a say" in their future, but by providing the resources to allow them to shape their own future. We are talking about real empowerment and sometimes, for those of us in control, that can be challenging, but we must be up for it. The people of Birtley are, as Tony Gibson said in his book, like people trying to balance "on a bike that stands still."

It is hard and, as he says,

"watch any roller blader weave and glide, it's the momentum that keeps us up and going . . . The only alternative to being taken over by events is to take them over, and that is not easy."

He is right, but we in Birtley are up for that challenge. I ask the Minister to keep our momentum going, to give us his support and to help us to keep moving forward together.

6.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson) for initiating this Adjournment debate and I congratulate him on securing it. I note that he advised the House that the Minister of Communities and Local Government will visit Birtley in January. I am sure that he will study the text of this debate as part of his preparation for his visit.

I understand that the Birtley community partnership is an active and enthusiastic group of people who are committed to making a real difference by ensuring that their town centre in the north-east of England is a lively and attractive, yet safe community environment. That is as it should be. It is essential for the vitality, welfare and safety of every community that people of all ages and from all walks of life engage constructively and effectively with each other and with other stakeholders in their area—such as the local council, businesses and the voluntary sector—to enrich the local economy, to provide jobs, to provide a safe and healthy local environment, and to encourage social cohesion, a strong local culture and pride in the community, much as my hon. Friend described.

Those are just some of the elements of a sustainable community that can help to underpin the action programme of the sustainable communities plan that the Government are working towards implementing. I am delighted to hear of such a fine example of community partnership in my hon. Friend's constituency. I have no doubt that other hon. Members will rush to tell me of equally exciting examples in their own constituencies and that they will have their own versions of people such as the Dr. Gibson to whom my hon. Friend referred several times.

The Government believe that local authorities must involve the people in their communities in developing the vision for their area. People should have more say in the way that places are run. They should have the opportunity to help improve local services, including schools, health services and the police, so that those services respond to the community's needs.

Local communities should be invited to offer ideas about what the vision for their area should be and how that can be achieved. Communities should be given every opportunity to play a full part in the processes of drawing up specific plans and policies, and they should also be consulted on proposals for development and regeneration of their area.

To deliver sustainable communities, we need an efficient, inclusive planning system. To be inclusive, that system needed more and better community involvement. It is for those reasons that the Government undertook a major review of the system that culminated in the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004. Regional and local plan making were reformed, with one of the aims being to enhance community involvement. One of the key parts of drawing up the local development framework is a requirement for local authorities to prepare statements of community involvement.

Primarily, SCIs are statements of the local authority's policy for involving interested parties in preparing and revising local development documents and for consulting on planning applications. They set out the local vision and standards for community involvement and how they link with other initiatives, such as the community strategy. They should also reflect the needs of the whole community, and identify the diversity of local groups that need to be involved.

To encourage that process, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister published a good practice guide on diversity and equality in planning. I am pleased to hear that the Birtley exercise is just such an example of inclusive planning in practice. Community strategies, local development documents and parish plans are all valuable tools in establishing the local vision and putting it into action.

SCIs need not simply be about planning matters. Forward-looking authorities will be thinking about how such statements might be incorporated into their whole corporate culture when preparing other plans and programmes for the full range of their responsibilities.

A key feature of our approach is something called front loading, which means that local authorities must involve communities and stakeholders in their thinking at the earliest opportunity when they are considering the issues and the range of realistic options for dealing with them. Another theme of the new planning system is to examine critically the real geography of places, and we call that spatial planning. The example offered by Birtley, where a Planning for Real exercise has been used to inform a vision for the regeneration of the town centre, is what spatial planning is all about.

The Government recognise that community involvement takes time and resources. We understand that there are real pressures on local authorities, particularly when it comes to achieving targets for dealing with proposals. However, we believe that effective community involvement, although it may require up-front investment, can have real benefits that will enable local authorities to manage better the process for giving effect to their vision for the next 10 years or so.

There are many ways of involving communities and there is no right way or wrong way. Much will depend on the nature of the issue and the nature of the group or community that needs to be reached—and, as we know, some groups will be harder to reach than others.

My hon. Friend mentioned Planning for Real and the excellent work that Birtley community partnership has put into its exercise to improve the town centre, along with the crucial support of the local authority, Gateshead council. That is certainly one way to achieve effective engagement and I applaud the partnership's initiative.

The Royal Town Planning Institute describes Planning for Real as a method that uses simple models as a focus for people to put forward and prioritise ideas on how their area can be improved. I commend it as a highly visible, hands-on community development and empowerment tool, in which people of all abilities and backgrounds find it easy and enjoyable to engage. It seems especially effective for master planning an area or for developing urban design projects.

Hon. Members may be aware that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has helped to fund a useful community planning website that is run by the RTPI. It provides those interested with lots of helpful articles and guidance. In addition, the ODPM gives financial support to the RTPI's planning aid service. In fact, the Government are providing £4 million over three years so that it can expand its services and be more proactive, especially in communities that are harder to reach. An important part of its brief is to help local communities to engage effectively with the local planning system. I understand that at least some of its regional offices have had a significant role in helping local authorities and communities to carry out Planning for Real exercises.

The planning aid service exists by using a regional network of more than 700 qualified volunteers and I pay tribute to them for giving up their time to help communities. As my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister has said, we are putting people first. We must raise the quality of what and how we build. We must improve the quality and delivery of the services that people need. We can do that best if communities are involved at the earliest practicable stage. Once again, I congratulate my hon. Friend and his constituents in the Birtley community partnership on the example that they have set. They have shown us that community involvement can be real and effective. I am sure that they have learned a lot from Planning for Real in Birtley and will be able to build on their experience.

I am equally confident that, with my hon. Friends' enthusiastic support, the community partnership will go from strength to strength. He paid tribute to the town of Birtley and its people, and I am sure that the House is grateful for his contribution.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

The Deputy Prime Minister was asked—

House Building Targets

1. Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): What assessment the Government have made of the infrastructure needed to support their communities plan and regional house building targets. [37194]

The Minister of Communities and Local Government (Mr. David Miliband): The Government believe that infrastructure investment must support housing growth, using funding from mainstream programmes, investment by the private sector and top-up funding from the growth areas programme. For the first five years of the sustainable communities plan, we have committed £1.2 billion of growth area funding to supplement £3.5 billion of transport investment.

Mr. Jackson: I thank the Minister for that answer. Given that in my region, the eastern region, a recent independent report found that £18.5 billion will be required for investment in infrastructure over the next 15 years, may we have a cast-iron guarantee from the Minister that the planning gain supplement announced in the pre-Budget report will not be another of the Chancellor's stealth taxes, and will be ring-fenced to pay for the much-needed infrastructure in the coming years?

Mr. Miliband: A measure that is announced in a pre-Budget statement is an unusual definition of a stealth tax. I do not think that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer could have been clearer and more open about it. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's support for the planning gain supplement, which provides that those who own land and benefit from planning gain should make a contribution to the essential infrastructure. My right hon. Friend has made it clear how that will benefit local people. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's support. I hope that he will persuade Opposition Front Benchers accordingly.

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend accept that this is an important question because house building is important? Is he aware that, for instance, in Birmingham many of the cases that are brought to my advice surgeries involve people who are having difficulty in finding a home? I have some criticisms of Birmingham's handling of homelessness, but there is an urgent need to increase not only house building but the availability of affordable houses for rent as well as purchase.

Mr. Miliband: My hon. Friend makes an important point. The House will know that although about 190,000 new households are formed every year, we are building only 150,000 new houses every year. That explains some of the affordability challenges that we face. That speaks directly to my hon. Friend's point, which is that we must increase house building both in the private sector and in the social housing sector.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend agree that local transport links are essential to successful housing development as part of regeneration? Will he agree to support an alternative to Merseytram to link local areas on Merseyside to employment areas and local amenities now that the Government have rejected that vital Merseytram project?

Mr. Miliband: It is tempting for me to make transport policy this morning. However, I will pass on my hon. Friend's concerns to the Department for Transport.

My hon. Friend is right that transport is a vital part of the infrastructure investment that we are discussing. The Department for Transport is making some allocations today in respect of capital funding, which will be of interest to the entire House.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): Does the Minister recognise that the Deputy Prime Minister's apparent desire to smother the garden of England with housing is leading to badly built houses, unsupported by adequate schools and medical services at primary level and by roads? Does he think that that is desirable?

Mr. Miliband: My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister is standing up for the next generation, who need greater housing provision. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman is not joining him in doing that. He talks about smothering the garden of England. Currently, 11.4 per cent. of the south-east is covered by development. My right hon. Friend proposes to raise that to 11.9 per cent. That is not smothering the garden of England but delivering the houses that the next generation needs.

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): Thousands of new houses have been built in Taunton Deane and elsewhere without adequate shops, public transport or other necessary amenities. Does the Minister share my view that it is one thing to construct a group of houses but another thing to build a community?

Mr. Miliband: I agree completely with the hon. Gentleman that we need decent communities as well as decent housing. That is why we are putting so much stress on building a strong economy. We do not control and own shops ourselves—my party has moved on from that. We are committed to transport and other areas of infrastructure that are essential if we are to build the decent communities that we are discussing.

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden) (Con): It was just a touch stealthy that the right hon. Gentleman did not mention the new land development tax for infrastructure from the outset. Perhaps he shares my scepticism that it may never emerge from the Treasury intact. More importantly, on 5 December it was said that this tax would inevitably have to be controlled by unelected regional bodies. Is this simply taxation without any representation?

Mr. Miliband: We should congratulate the hon. Lady on her reappointment. Other Departments' loss is our gain, because I could not have made clearer the position on the planning gain supplement. We believe that people who hold land and benefit from planning permission should contribute to infrastructure costs—that is the right balance. We have made it clear that the majority of returns from the planning gain supplement will be used within the local authority area. [Interruption.] If the hon. Lady contains herself she might learn something. The majority of the money will be used within the local authority area, and the rest will be used to support local people. I am sure that she agrees that it makes sense to build sewerage works and infrastructure development, which, while they may not be within the local authority area, will benefit local people. The money spent on sewerage works and transport may not all be spent directly in the area, but it will still benefit local people.

Sarah Teather (Brent, East) (LD): What environmental factors do the Government take into account in their assessment of infrastructure and house building? Will the Minister confirm that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has not signed up to any public service agreement on climate change?

Mr. Miliband: The sustainability appraisals that are at the heart of the environmental work of the ODPM are central to such development. I should have thought that the hon. Lady would welcome the new guidance issued by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning, which shows a 40 per cent. increase in the energy efficiency of all new housing.

Sarah Teather indicated dissent.

Mr. Miliband: The hon. Lady may shake her head and say that it is not good enough, but it is better than standards elsewhere in Europe, so I should have thought that it was good enough for her.

House Building

2. Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): What assessment he has made of the effect of international migration on the need for house building in the east and south of England. [37195]

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Yvette Cooper): International migration is a factor in UK population growth, and it is important to the growth of the economy. Household growth is higher than population growth due to demographic and lifestyle changes, particularly an increase in the number of people living alone. The result is growing demand for housing, which affects the south and east of England.

Mr. Turner: I thank the hon. Lady for her reply. Is she aware that Home Office figures accept that migration is such that it requires a new town the size of Slough every two years or a new city the size of Birmingham every 10 years to accommodate people coming to this country? Whose job is it in Government to balance the needs of the economy, to which she referred, with the need to protect the environment? Which Minister is responsible?

Yvette Cooper: I can see the way in which the Tory party wants to campaign on housing policy. We look at the projections for household growth, two thirds of which is the result of more people living alone. The figure will grow from 3.4 million in 1971 to 8.5 million in 2012. It is true that the 29 per cent. of NHS doctors who were born abroad need homes to live in, as do pensioners and widows who live alone as well as the next generation of first-time buyers. In the end, that is the issue. The hon. Gentleman's policy would mean that 70 per cent.—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): Will the Minister confirm that the major sources of population growth in the south of England are migration to the south-east from London and increased longevity? In relation to the second group, what steps are being taken to make sure that new house building in the south takes account of the needs of the elderly population?

Yvette Cooper: My hon. Friend is exactly right. We need to take account of an ageing and growing population. If we do not do so, in 20 years' time, 70 per cent. of 30-year-old couples who are first-time buyers will not be able to afford their own home. That is the consequence of sticking with existing rates of house building, which is the approach taken by the Opposition. Their leader may say all those nice things about not campaigning on immigration—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady defies the Chair when she keeps going on about Opposition policy. She will not do so again.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): I very much welcome the statement that the Chancellor of the Exchequer made about shared ownership in the pre-Budget statement. It is very valuable, and a great deal of money is attached to it. However, will the Minister confirm that it is not new money, as it comes out of the overall housing budget, so every penny spent on shared ownership schemes means that less will be spent on refurbishment or new local authority housing?

Yvette Cooper: No, the hon. Gentleman is wrong. The proposals that we announced as part of the pre-Budget report are about building a public-private partnership to get more private developers and mortgage lenders to increase the amount of investment in shared equity housing. We think it is right to support shared equity housing. We have set out a big increase in investment in social housing and in shared equity housing. We believe it is right to go further and to bring in additional private sector money as well as additional public sector funding, so that we can support the next generation of home owners.

Lyons Review

3. Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): If he will make a statement on progress with the Lyons review. [37196]

The Minister of Communities and Local Government (Mr. David Miliband): Sir Michael Lyons will publish an interim report tomorrow setting out his preliminary thinking, and publish research and analysis that he has undertaken so far.

Mr. Cunningham: Will my hon. Friend assure the House that, as he considers the Lyons report and local government funding, he will consult local government widely? I am sure my hon. Friend knows that there has always been serious concern about local government funding, particularly the formula element.

Mr. Miliband: I can confirm that written into Sir Michael Lyons' terms of reference is a commitment to work with local government. Obviously, it is essential that we do so. His proposals will cover the long-term financing of local government, and that must be done in partnership with local government.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar) (Con): The Chancellor last week abolished the pensioners' £200 council tax rebate after it had been in operation for only one year. Is Sir Michael Lyons expected to estimate the number of additional pensioners who will face imprisonment for non-payment? Does the Minister personally regret that the Government have reneged on their promises to pensioners?

Mr. Miliband: The answer to that question is no. No new estimates are being provided of that, no new powers of entry are being given to the Valuation Office Agency, no new fines are being invented, there will be no new higher bills for inheritance and capital gains tax—all of which have been alleged—and, surprisingly enough, no new proposals for the slaughter of first-borns will be announced by Sir Michael Lyons, either.

Council Housing

4. Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): How many council houses have been built since 1997. [37197]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): Since 1997 1,130,000 new dwellings have been constructed, of which registered social landlords built 177,000 and local authorities 1,365.

Bob Russell: When the Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister arrived at Westminster tube station this morning, did they observe the illuminated poster from Shelter showing the Chamber occupied by homeless families, along with the slogan

"Overcrowded housing robs children of room to grow. Britain needs more homes now"?

Noting that in the eight years from 1979 the Thatcher Government built 415,814 council houses, is it a success of the new Labour Government that in eight years they have built, according to the House of Commons Library, 4,278?

Jim Fitzpatrick: Shelter is a much respected organisation and we welcomed its latest report. However, the hon. Gentleman knows that when we came to power in 1997, our housing priority was the £19 billion backlog in social housing repairs and the 2 million homes that had fallen below the decency threshold. We have attacked that problem. We are well on our way to making sure that, by 2010, 2 million homes will be up to the decency threshold. We have cut rough sleeping by three quarters, and we are on our way to helping 100,000 new people into their first homes by 2010.

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): The Government response to the Barker review last week stated that the supply of social housing would be a priority for the spending review in 2007, but the Barker report was published with the Budget in 2004, recommending an increase of 23,000 new social homes a year. As I told both the Deputy Prime Minister and the Chancellor in 2004, Birmingham desperately needs at least another 3,000 social homes a year. Why must we wait until 2007 for the increase in social housing supply that is so desperately needed in Birmingham and elsewhere?

Jim Fitzpatrick: My right hon. Friends must have listened, because the Government have accepted the key recommendation of the Barker review, which is a step change in housing. We are increasing funding for socially rented housing, and we are also increasing new build from 20,000 a year to 30,000 a year. By 2008, we expect 75,000 new homes in the social rented sector, as well as bigger targets between now and 2015.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Is the Minister aware that there is currently no homelessness provision for adults in my constituency in Shropshire as a result of the mixed messages that the Government have given out since 1997? What will he do for those who find themselves homeless on the streets of Shropshire this year and who do not have access to grace and favour apartments?

Jim Fitzpatrick: As I said, since 1997 we have cut rough sleeping by three quarters and ended the scandal of families with children experiencing long stays in cramped bed and breakfasts. We are providing £5 billion between 2004 and 2006 and £3.9 billion between 2006 and 2008. The Deputy Prime Minister has ensured that housing is a main priority for this Government, and we are very proud of our record.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby) (Lab): Does the Minister agree that it is abysmal that a Labour Government have built only about 1,000 council houses? Most social housing is run by housing associations, which are not accountable to the electorate. When people lived in council houses, they knew that their councillors would take up their cases on matters such as maintenance, but all hon. Members know that that situation has changed. We should reverse the position by transferring stock from housing associations to councils.

Jim Fitzpatrick: With respect, my hon. Friend is wrong. The Government made a clear choice to allow registered social landlords to seek private sector capital, of which an additional £6.5 billion has been spent on social housing, including the social rented sector. The matter involves value for money and choice for local authorities. I do not agree with my hon. Friend that there is no social control—registered social landlords have very good communications and their boards are staffed by councillors as well as representatives of the local community, who are doing their best for their neighbourhoods.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): Back in 1997, the Prime Minister pledged to do all in his power to end the scourge of temporary accommodation. Bearing in mind the fact that the number of people living in temporary accommodation will have doubled by this Christmas, what does that say about the Government's pledges and the Prime Minister's power?

Jim Fitzpatrick: In the past year, homelessness has dropped by 23 per cent. As I have said, we have ended the scandal of families with children living in bed-and-breakfast accommodation. Those who are awaiting permanent accommodation are in accommodation of a much higher standard than anything experienced before 1997. The money that we are putting into housing, including the step change in new build, is unprecedented.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): I welcome the Minister's comments about investment in repairs to council housing, which has transformed the housing stock in my local authority. Does the Minister recognise that some people—in particular, young people—still cannot get into either social housing or the private sector? Will he introduce the plans on shared equity and greater social housing expenditure as a matter of urgency?

Jim Fitzpatrick: My hon. Friend has made a good point. Notwithstanding how much is being done—149 stock transfers, 56 arm's length management organisations, 37 private finance initiatives and £6.5 billion of private sector funding—a lot remains to be accomplished, but as a result of our programme, more than 1 million people now live in homes above the decent homes threshold who did not do so before 1997.

Local Government Finance

5. James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): What representations he has received regarding the local government finance settlement. [37198]

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Phil Woolas): There were 369 representations made to the consultation on options for the grant distribution system that was held over the summer. We also received a variety of correspondence on the options between the end of this consultation and the announcement of the settlement on 5 December.

James Duddridge: I thank the Minister for that reply and I thank the Under-Secretary for agreeing to meet Southend council on 9 January. However, what general advice would the Minister give local authorities across England about the ever-increasing Government requirements for spending on things such as pensions, job evaluation, civil contingencies and waste, which are extra costs that are not covered by inflationary or near-inflationary increases?

Mr. Woolas: I would advise those councils to read the words of the leader of the Local Government Association, a Conservative councillor, who acknowledged that the Government had met their new burdens obligations in the settlement. I would also advise those councils to look at the figures that confirm that by financial year 2007–08 they will have had 10 years of above-inflation increases in their revenue support grant.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East and Wallsend) (Lab): The settlement has left the five district authorities in Tyne and Wear with a shortfall in the moneys necessary to implement the pensioners' concessionary bus travel scheme that the Chancellor announced in the last Budget. I am grateful to the Minister for agreeing to meet me and colleagues from Tyne and Wear to discuss the problem. However, if we are unable to get a satisfactory settlement next week, will it be possible for me and other Members of Parliament representing the county to meet the Deputy Prime Minister to discuss the matter further?

Mr. Woolas: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his work on behalf of his constituents. He, like me, wants to ensure that all the pensioners get the benefits of the extra £350 million that has been provided across the country for free travel for pensioners. I look forward to next week's meeting with my right hon. Friend, the transport authority and the councils. He will of course be waiting for the outcome of that meeting to see how he can facilitate this policy.

Shire Council Finance

6. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): What representations he has received from shire councils about the level of revenue support for 2006–07. [37199]

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Phil Woolas): The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is currently consulting on the provisional local government finance settlements for 2006–07 and 2007–08. We expect to receive several representations on the level of revenue support grant from shire counties and others in response to that consultation.

Peter Luff: Another Christmas, and the people of Worcestershire are being cheated yet again, with the Deputy Prime Minister giving us his traditional but not particularly popular performance of Scrooge. Are not my constituents entitled to ask what the Dickens is going on as they see that the gap between Worcestershire schools funding and that of their neighbours is growing yet again and that their county council is going to make cuts in other services to reach criteria imposed on it by the Minister?

Mr. Woolas: I suspect that the hon. Gentleman would have complained whatever the settlement had been, as indeed he has for the past eight years. I can tell the House that over the 10 years to 2007–08, Worcestershire county council will have had an average increase in formula grant of some 4.5 per cent. per year—significantly above the level of inflation.

Departmental Contingency Planning

7. John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): What discussions his Department has had with the Scottish Executive and the Welsh Assembly on his Department's civil resilience responsibilities in the event of a terrorist attack. [37200]

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): The ODPM works closely with the Home Office, which has the policy lead in respect of resilience and response to terrorist attack. We are leading on several fire resilience projects, in each case working closely at all levels with respective counterparts in Scotland and Wales. As I told the House on Monday, the measures that my Department has put in place substantially improved our ability to respond to emergencies, and yet again we had a key role to play in tackling the fire at Buncefield.

I take the opportunity to confirm to the House that the Buncefield fire is under control and that small fires from damaged valves are being allowed to burn under supervision. Monitoring the effects of the plume on the environment, health and food has been under way since the start of the incident, and I intend to visit the site on Saturday.

I pay tribute to the bravery, dedication and professionalism of the emergency services. The House will be amazed at the criticism that was made of their training and preparedness, especially while they were still fighting the fire.

John Robertson: I thank my right hon. Friend for his comprehensive answer. May I, too, express my admiration for those in the services who fought the fire in Hemel Hempstead? How confident is my right hon. Friend about training sessions in every part of the country and the competence that can be expected from the agencies? How quickly can he ensure that they achieve the same competence as was shown in Hemel Hempstead?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I assure my hon. Friend that training in our services has enabled us to engage in cross-agency training—an exercise that is carried out locally, regionally and nationally. My Office invested heavily in equipment, such as that used in London on 7/7, in the Carlisle floods and in Hemel Hempstead at the weekend. Furthermore, the Civil Contingencies Act 2004 and the Fire and Rescue Services Act 2004 provide the legislative framework. Each of our fire resilience project training programmes enables a consistent, co-ordinated response throughout the English regions. It worked well in Hemel Hempstead and, indeed, in the recent plastics factory explosion in Glasgow.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [37179] Mr. David Crausby (Bolton, North-East) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 14 December.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Mr. Crausby: Antisocial behaviour is of prime concern in Bolton, where the police have used ASBOs and unacceptable behaviour contracts effectively. However, they do that on a shoestring budget. Will my right hon. Friend provide the funds to ensure that the antisocial behaviour of the mindless minority will not be tolerated?

The Prime Minister: Obviously, it is important that we keep the steady stream of investment going into my hon. Friend's constituency and elsewhere. He is right to say what a difference antisocial behaviour legislation has made, as I know from my visit a couple of days ago to Harlow, where I saw for myself how the local police and local community had used the antisocial behaviour legislation to make a real difference to their people's lives. That is why it is so sad that the Conservative party dismissed it as a gimmick.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): Since our exchanges last week, plans for an alternative education White Paper have been published. Reports suggest—[Interruption.] It was not produced by the Liberal Democrats. I do not know—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. No one should shout down the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Cameron: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I simply wanted to clarify that the White Paper was not produced by the Liberal Democrats, who have been concentrating on their decapitation strategy.

Reports suggest that the alternative White Paper calls for a delay in the introduction of trust schools. Will the Prime Minister specifically rule that out?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I will.

Mr. Cameron: Excellent. This is only my second outing. I was told that I would never get a straight answer from the Prime Minister, yet on my second outing, I have done so. We are already working well together.

We are told that the alternative White Paper will propose cutting the power of head teachers, boosting the role of local education authorities, making it more difficult for new schools to be set up and putting the code of admissions into statute. The Secretary of State for Education and Skills said that that would undermine discretion and flexibility. Will not those changes render the Prime Minister's changes meaningless? So will he rule them out, too?

The Prime Minister: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we will stick with the changes in the White Paper because they are the right changes to make. There is a difference between me and those hon. Friends of mine who have put forward different proposals today. There is also a difference between me and the hon. Gentleman, because last week, he confirmed that he was in favour of bringing back academic selection—

Mr. Cameron: No.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman says no. Let me read to him what he said last week on the "Today" programme. Mr. Humphrys said:

"there will be a return to selection by ability if that is what the schools want, just to be quite clear about that.

DC:"—

that is the hon. Gentleman—replied:

"That's right".

So I am not the only one giving straight answers.

Mr. Cameron: The Prime Minister said in his answer that there was a difference between his view and the view of his Back Benchers. So he faces a choice: with our support, he can have the reforms that our schools need; or he can give in to the Labour party. Which is it to be? White Paper or white flag?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman has spent hours practising that one. Yes, there is a difference with the Back Benchers on my side who have published their proposals today; that is absolutely true. But the point is that there is also a difference with the Conservative party. Let us just be quite clear what that difference is. The hon. Gentleman wants to return to academic selection—

Mr. Cameron indicated dissent.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman continues to shake his head. I shall give him another quote. In the Evening Standard, he said:

"I want to give academies—and, over time, all schools—the freedom to run their own admissions policy . . . Some schools will want to select by academic ability".

So there is no doubt about this: he wants academic selection; I do not. I want fair funding and fair admissions, and I want the freedoms to be within that framework. Now, if he supports that, let's hear it.

Dr. Alasdair McDonnell (Belfast, South) (SDLP): May I ask the Prime Minister a question about an item of national importance and public interest? Last week we saw the collapse of charges arising from the IRA spy ring in Stormont that brought down the devolved Assembly. We were told by the Attorney-General that those charges collapsed in the public interest. On the basis of that alleged public interest, of which absolutely no detail has been provided, would it be possible to make a statement or share some information with us on why the charges were preferred, lasted for three years, then suddenly evaporated at the last minute?

The Prime Minister: I entirely understand my hon. Friend's concern. I have to say, however, that the decision whether to proceed with a prosecution is made by the Director of Public Prosecutions. It is not, and cannot be, made by Ministers. Obviously, we were not consulted about this matter; it has to be a decision taken by the independent prosecuting authorities.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Lochaber) (LD): Last week, the Prime Minister acknowledged that he had been aware of the United States' policy of rendition for quite some time. If terrorist suspects are not being transported to a third country for the purposes of torture or mistreatment, will he explain to the House for what purpose they are being transported?

The Prime Minister: First, let me again make it clear to the right hon. Gentleman that this Government are completely and totally opposed to torture or ill-treatment in any set of circumstances. Our country is a signatory to the United Nations convention against the use of torture, and we will continue to uphold its provisions absolutely. Rendition does not simply apply in those circumstances; it can apply in other circumstances, as the United States Secretary of State has made clear. To be fair, they have also said that they are totally opposed to the use of torture or ill-treatment in any circumstances.

Mr. Kennedy: In welcoming precisely what the Prime Minister has just said, does he not therefore acknowledge that our country is surely under a legal and moral obligation to investigate why flights are being allowed to pass through our country for rendition purposes? Full inquiries are now taking place in Italy, Spain, Germany and Canada. Why are they not taking place in the United Kingdom?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has just passed me a copy of his parliamentary answer from, I think, a few days ago, which states:

"Careful research by officials has been unable to identify any occasions since 11 September 2001, or earlier in the Bush Administration, when we received a request for permission by the United States for a rendition through UK territory or airspace, nor are we otherwise aware of such a case."

On United States Government flights coming in and out, those take place for a whole series of reasons. We receive visits from people from the United States Government the entire time.—[Interruption.] I have to say that the Liberal Democrats are quite extraordinary sometimes. The idea that we should investigate every time that a United States Government plane flies into this country is completely absurd.

Q2. [37180] Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): What more is the Prime Minister prepared to do to help Plymouth police to ensure that drug barons and other hardened criminals are not able to profit from their ill-gotten gains?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend raises a point on the action that we are taking against those engaged in organised crime. One of the most important powers that the police have is to be able to seize cash that drug dealers, or those suspected of drug dealing, may have on them. We want to lower the minimum amount that people must have on them before they can be subject to that procedure. We have recovered something like £185 million worth of criminal assets over the past three years. In Devon and Cornwall, which is my hon. Friend's area, the police have obtained cash forfeiture and confiscation orders with a value of more than £1 million just in the past year. We will also, however, give incentives to forces to do more of that confiscation work, and they will be able to keep a proportion of the money that they confiscate. Already, about an additional £180,000 has been paid into the funds of Devon and Cornwall as a result, and we want to extend that further. Again, however, I am sorry to say that the shadow Home Secretary opposed those measures when we announced them the other day.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): Is the Prime Minister aware of the serious matter that has just been raised by the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell)? Does he realise that the people of Northern Ireland, in both sections of the community, are angry that a serious matter has taken place, and all that we receive from the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is the response that no questions will be answered in Parliament? The Northern Ireland people have a right to be heard in this place, and the Prime Minister has a responsibility in this place in relation to the safety of many hundreds of people who were visited by the police and told that they were in danger and the £3 million that has been lost down the drain on the issue. Will he see that the rights of the people of Northern Ireland are defended, and that there will be some place where public representatives can ask those questions and get answers to them?

The Prime Minister: I am certainly happy to see how much more information can be put in the public domain, consistent with the proper legal procedures. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will accept from me, however, that the decision was not taken by any Minister, and neither was there any political interference in that decision. The decision to prosecute is taken by the DPP, and he has decided not to proceed with it. I do not know the reasons for that; I simply know that that is what he has decided. I will, however, examine whether, consistent with the proper legal procedures, we are able to give more information, but the decision was taken solely on the authority of the prosecuting authorities.

Q3. [37181] Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): Will my right hon. Friend join me in condemning Conservative-controlled Enfield council, which only last week turned down £1 million of economic development assistance because it refused to match-fund that sum? That will affect the most disadvantaged and deprived parts of my community. Is not all this talk about concerned conservatism simply hot air? Sadly, the reality is that it is still the uncaring and nasty party that we all know.

The Prime Minister: If it is not out of order in this new era of an end to Punch-and-Judy politics, I suggest to my hon. Friend that it looks to me as though the Conservatives have been a trifle misguided on the issue. Let us put it no higher than that.

My hon. Friend has rightly drawn attention to the fact that the only difference between compassionate conservatism and conservatism is that under compassionate conservatism they tell you that they are not going to help you, but they are really sorry about it.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): Expanding free trade is the most powerful force for the reduction of world poverty, but there are some at the world trade talks in Hong Kong this week who argue that expanding free trade means forbidding developing countries to protect their environments. Does the Prime Minister agree that that is the wrong argument? Does he agree that it is perfectly possible for developing countries to have free trade and benefit from it, while allowing the environmental protections that we enjoy in this country?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I do agree with that, but there is another thing that I consider important. It is also important for developing countries whose economies are at a very low stage of development to get help—aid for trade—so that they can build the capacity that will enable them to trade. I was particularly pleased that the G7 Finance Ministers agreed to increase aid for trade to $4 billion, because that trade capability is also an important part of making free trade work.

Mr. Cameron: The difficulty of this week's talks demonstrates how important it is for the developed world to show real moral leadership. Does the Prime Minister agree that the developed world should show that leadership not by imposing damaging conditions on developing countries, but by taking the first step, and reducing its own tariff barriers?

The Prime Minister: I agree that we should reduce our tariff barriers. That is what we have asked for all along. It is important to recognise that the issue involves not just Europe, but America and Japan. We also want non-agricultural market access to be provided by Brazil, India and other parts of the developing world that are well on the way to becoming developed.

I believe that if we show the right imagination at Hong Kong and afterwards, we will get the right deal for this Doha development round, and I believe—as I have said on many occasions—that if we do not it will be a disaster, and not just for the developing world. Countries like our own stand to benefit enormously from opening up free trade.

Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating Swindon borough council on achieving a two-star ranking? Does he recognise the significant contribution made to its success by Government remedial help, particularly from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister? We thank the ODPM for its help over the past few years. Will my right hon. Friend assure me that that help will be available to struggling councils throughout the country in future?

The Prime Minister: I am happy to pay tribute to the Department of my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister, and to Swindon borough council for the excellent work that it is doing. It shows that with the right level of investment and funding, and partnership between local and central Government, a real difference can be made to the quality of life of local communities.

Q4. [37182] Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): May I return the Prime Minister to the issue of the Stormont spy ring? He says that the decision was made by the Director of Public Prosecutions. Can he say whether the DPP sought or received advice from the Attorney-General, or whether there was any consultation with any other Minister?

Is the Prime Minister aware that three possible reasons for the DPP's decision are being canvassed in Northern Ireland? One is that there was not enough evidence to secure a prosecution; another is that the Government have done a deal with the Provisional IRA; and the third is that they were protecting sensitive, if not embarrassing, evidence and agents. Will the Prime Minister tell us which it was?

The Prime Minister: I do not know whether the DPP was in consultation with the Attorney-General or not, but I can assure the hon. Gentleman that no Minister had anything whatever to do with the decision. I hope he accepts that. If he actually wants to create a stable atmosphere in Northern Ireland, he should bear in mind that it is helpful not to end up with conspiracy theories that owe very little to the facts and a great deal to the desire of people to stir up difficulty.

As for the three points that the hon. Gentleman presented as reasons for the action, I cannot comment on the first or the third, but I can say of the second that it is completely untrue.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend share my anger and concern at the fake photographs published in the Daily Mirror that put British service personnel's lives at risk? And yet, we find that nobody is guilty and nobody is going to be charged in court; the whole thing seems to have been swept under the carpet. What can he do to put this matter right and to restore some credibility to the British justice system?

The Prime Minister: I have to say to my hon. Friend that I entirely understand the concern—and, indeed, the anger—in certain quarters, but again, these decisions have to be taken by the prosecuting authorities. I think that I would quite rightly be subject to a great deal of criticism if I sought to intervene in those decisions.

Q5. [37183] Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): Last week, the National Audit Office, the permanent secretary of the Department for Work and Pensions and the Treasury's own officer of accounts all told the Public Accounts Committee that "The complexity of the benefits system . . . has deterred saving for retirement".

The only people who disagree with that are the Chancellor and the hon. Member for Normanton (Ed Balls). Are they right or is everyone else correct?

The Prime Minister: We are all agreed that there is a need for pensions reform, which is precisely the reason why we commissioned the Turner report. When we put forward our proposals next year, I hope that they will get support in every part of the House.

Q6. [37184] Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): Will the Prime Minister consider, as a well-deserved Christmas present to Labour Back Benchers, giving us a free vote on smoking, particularly as much of the pub and hospitality industry now supports a complete ban?

The Prime Minister: I take it from the fact that my hon. Friend says that it is well deserved that he is going to be fully supportive of the Government in all the Divisions to come in the next few months. I said what I said on smoking last week, and we will continue, obviously, to talk to people about it, but I would point out that, on any basis, the vast bulk of smoking in public places is going to be banned under this legislation. I am aware that a debate continues as to whether we should go even further, and I shall listen to that debate with interest.

Q7. [37185] Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Is the Prime Minister aware that 97 per cent. of executions in the world take place in China, Vietnam, Iran and George Bush's United States, which passed the 1,000 mark this week? Since this is an area in which the European Union has considerable moral and political authority, what role is the Prime Minister playing, as EU President, in exercising international leadership to curb this practice?

The Prime Minister: There is a difference between Europe and America on this issue—there always has been and there will be so long as the death penalty remains in the United States of America. When the hon. Gentleman puts the United States of America alongside China, Iran and so on, it is worth pointing out to him that the rule of law applies in the United States of America. Although I strongly disagree with the death penalty, I think that, if we are looking at human rights abuses, it is sometimes right to look elsewhere and at the severe human rights abuses that happen around the rest of the world, particularly in countries such as North Korea, where we never hear any protests at all.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge) (Lab): The Prime Minister will recall the jubilation last year when the Chancellor announced that from April next year, pensioners and the disabled would receive free bus travel. But is he aware that there have been unintended consequences for Tyne and Wear, where there is a £7.3 million shortfall between the cost of running the scheme and the money being provided through the revenue support grant? If, at our meeting with the relevant Minister next week, we are unable to resolve this problem, will the Prime Minister agree to meet Tyne and Wear MPs to see whether he can find a way through this situation?

The Prime Minister: I would be very happy to meet my hon. Friend and his colleagues. I know that he has a meeting with that Minister next week, and I hope that the situation can be resolved.

Q8. [37186] Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne) (Con): Before he leaves politics, will the Prime Minister tackle the problems in the NHS, especially in my constituency, where there are massive deficits, the worst bed blocking in the whole country and people are being turned away from out-patients? Now, moreover, there is a proposal to close obstetrics and gynaecology.

The Prime Minister: First, let us be clear that overall in the national health service—[Interruption.] I will come to the hon. Gentleman's constituency in a moment. Let us be clear that overall, as well as record investment, we have had waiting lists down somewhere in the region of 400,000 since 1997. There has been a transformation in the position regarding cancer treatment, cardiac care, cataracts and many other diseases. At the same time as we draw attention to the problems that our health care system faces, it is essential that we recognise the huge progress that has been made.

It is true that there are deficits in the hon. Gentleman's area, but that is despite record funding being put in. I have to say that part of the responsibility for the problem must lie with local management, who have to make sure that they keep within their budget. Let me point out to the hon. Gentleman that, in his area, there are almost 3,000 more nurses, almost 400 more consultants and almost 300 more GPs. I agree that there are real issues that we and his local health authority have to resolve, but that takes place within the context of massive improvement since 1997.

Michael Connarty (Linlithgow and East Falkirk) (Lab): Did my right hon. Friend share my pleasure in seeing the national minimum wage rise to above £5 in October this year? He will recall that I drew his attention to what I believe is an error in regulation 31(1)(e), which allows tips in restaurants to be counted towards the minimum wage. Will the Prime Minister give the people in the hospitality industry a Christmas present and bring forward a simple amendment to ensure that all tips and gratuities paid in restaurants cannot be counted towards the minimum wage?

The Prime Minister: It is not me who would be giving them that Christmas present, and we obviously have to be careful about the impact on business. I know that the Low Pay Commission will look into the issue carefully—it has been a longstanding grievance—but it has to be done in a way that also protects people's jobs and business.

Mr. Speaker: I call Sir Peter Tapsell.

Hon. Members: Hooray!

Q9. [37187] Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): As the Liberal leader knows, the louder the cheer, the greater the danger.

Why has the Prime Minister still not gone to Congress in Washington to collect the gold medal that he was awarded more than two years ago for his great help in persuading public opinion in the United States and Britain to support the invasion of Iraq?

The Prime Minister: Because I have one or two other things to do at the moment. I have to say that I do not in any shape or form regret having supported the action we took. Today and this week is a particularly good time to remind ourselves that this week there will be the first ever democratic election in Iraq in which its people will be able to choose their Government for the first time ever. Alongside our alliance with the United States, that is something of which I am very proud.

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): It would, I accept, be ridiculous to check all flights between the US and this country, but would it not be reasonable to check all flights between the US and countries with poor human rights records that happen to stop down briefly in this country?

The Prime Minister: I think that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary went through these issues in considerable detail the other day and, indeed, again yesterday, and I am sure that he will continue to do so. We have set out the position very clearly in respect of this country, and American Secretary of State Condi Rice has set out the position clearly in respect of the United States. Let me emphasise again that we do not support any illegal activity or, more particularly, the torture of people in detention. This country has never supported that and never will.

Q10. [37189] Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): Given the retiring Prime Minister's personal and positive support for London 2012, why is his Chancellor and potential successor blocking plans to give our elite athletes the £45 million a year that they need to raise us in the Olympic medal stakes from 10th to fourth place—a move described by the British Olympic Association as being "devastating" for British sport?

The Prime Minister: The British Olympic Association and everyone else connected with the games will make numerous requests for money over the coming years. I assure the hon. Gentleman that not only are we very proud to have won the 2012 bid, but that we will fund it properly, as the Government should. The amount of money that we will put in will be significant and considerable, and the Treasury is absolutely right to make sure that every penny spent is properly accounted for.

Q11. [37190] Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend tell the House about the progress that we have made in the middle east peace process during the UK's presidency of the EU?

The Prime Minister: It is worth pointing out that, as a result of the EU's engagement with the Quartet—Russia, America, the UN and the EU—we will have the first proper elections to the Palestinian Authority. They will be followed by elections in Israel, and we have also had the disengagement from Gaza and parts of the west bank. If the two elections in the Palestinian Authority and Israel go well, there is every chance that we will make a significant breakthrough on the middle east. I certainly hope that we can.

Q12. [37191] Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): Will the Prime Minister explain why the Government have decided against holding a public inquiry into the events leading up to 7/7? Does he accept that, for the victims and their families, that is the only right way forward?

The Prime Minister: I do accept that people want to know exactly what happened, and we will make sure that they do. There will be some five different Select Committee inquiries into the matter. We will bring together all the evidence that we have and publish it, so that people—the victims and others—can see exactly what happened. However, we know essentially what happened on 7 July, and I really believe that a full-scale public inquiry would divert a massive amount of police and security service time. I do not think that that would be sensible. I totally understand the concerns about this matter, but I hope that people will be satisfied with the large number of Select Committee inquiries, and with the fact that we will publish a full account of all the information that we have.

Housing Development (Infrastructure Requirements)

12.32 pm

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require local authorities and the Government to agree on the infrastructure to be provided for large scale housing developments; and to determine the allocation of costs in advance of the commencement of building work.

The general practitioner's surgery in Whiteley in my constituency is still housed in a portakabin. The primary school serving that community is too small, so five and six-year-olds turned away from it are bussed to another school on the other side of a busy motorway junction. There is only one road in and out of Whiteley.

Residents living in the 3,000 homes in Whiteley see for themselves what happens when large-scale housing development takes place without adequate infrastructure. Thankfully, a new GP's surgery and a one-form-entry primary school will be built shortly, but more needs to be done to tackle the community's traffic problems.

The quality of life for Whiteley residents would be much better if the infrastructure issues had been tackled up front, rather than on a piecemeal basis. After what has happened in Whiteley, it is clear to me that we cannot embark on large-scale building without looking again at how infrastructure development is provided.

In addition, we need to address the concerns of residents, who are anxious that existing services cannot cope with the demands and pressures that come from large-scale house building. When faced with development, it is a natural reaction for people to look at the congestion on their roads, at the queues at their GPs' surgeries and at the problems of getting their children into local schools, and to challenge those plans. They also start to question the willingness of the Government to pay their share of the bill for tackling some of those issues.

In south Hampshire, one of the challenges that we face relates to the transport infrastructure. The main route that links Portsmouth and Southampton—the M27—is struggling with increased demand. The A32 between Fareham and Gosport is already heavily congested. Hampshire county council and Portsmouth city council worked together to design a light rapid transit system to link Fareham, Gosport and Portsmouth, to tackle the growing traffic problems that arise from existing and planned development. Two weeks ago, the Government rejected those plans as being too expensive, but they did not say that fewer houses should be built or that development plans should be put on hold until an alternative transport solution is agreed.

The rejection of the rapid transit system is illustrative—as, indeed, is the delay in getting an extra primary school for Whiteley—of the problems of failing to tackle the infrastructure needs of development at the outset, rather than waiting until a problem emerges to tackle. If the resolution of the issues is delayed, developers' contributions run out, even if they were ever adequate to tackle the infrastructure needs, and other priorities for expenditure become more pressing.

We need to learn from those experiences, when looking at the plans that are being put together at the moment by regional assemblies, and to take a fresh look at infrastructure provision and its funding. If we are to meet the needs of new residents and address the concerns of local people, we need to tackle infrastructure in a new way. We cannot simply allow decisions about infrastructure to be taken once houses are built.

We can forecast what issues will arise from large-scale housing development, and we should plan how to tackle them now, rather than simply waiting for them to happen and trying to find a solution then. By infrastructure, I do not simply mean the estate roads around new developments and shops, but the major infrastructure investment that is needed to fund large-scale development in areas such as south Hampshire, where the plan is to build 80,000 houses over 20 years, 20,000 of which will be in two strategic development areas, one of which is in my constituency.

If we are to proceed with development on that scale in Hampshire and on a greater scale in the Thames Gateway, Buckinghamshire, Bedford, Essex, Kent, Hertfordshire, Milton Keynes, Northamptonshire and elsewhere, there must be a serious commitment to infrastructure investment.

My Bill proposes three steps to tackle the infrastructure problems. The Government and the local authority should work together to identify the infrastructure needs related to large-scale housing development. Those needs should be costed. Agreement should be reached about who foots the bill before development can start. Those steps need to be completed, not when it is too late—not when schools are overcrowded, roads are clogged up and water and drainage systems are overloaded—but before work starts, so that local authorities know what support is there and local people understand what the solutions to those issues will be, so that everyone involved in the development knows what their share of the bill is.

The partnership for urban south Hampshire has already started to assess the infrastructure needs and costs associated with the 80,000 new homes that are planned for the area and recognises, too, the need for measures to tackle the existing infrastructure deficit. It has estimated that the cost of tackling the existing infrastructure problems and meeting future needs that relate to transport alone is £1.6 billion, before taking into account the other needs of those new developments. It estimates that new primary schools will cost about £80 million and that secondary schools will cost a similar amount.

We will need one GP per 1,800 to 2,500 people. The capital cost associated with a new surgery is about £500,000 per GP. We will need new primary care facilities, enhanced water supplies, new or extended sewage treatment services and community centres. The list is long and is not exclusive to south Hampshire—other areas will need the same facilities—but the crucial issue, once the level of need is identified, is who should pay for it?

The partnership for urban south Hampshire estimates that each house in the strategic development area will generate developers' contributions of £10,000. So an SDA of the size planned for Fareham will produce

[Mr. Mark Hoban]

£100 million. That sounds a lot, but let us remember that a secondary school can cost about £20 million, so it will not take too long for those contributions to become exhausted. So the cost of infrastructure must be met from elsewhere—whether from council tax payers in the area or from taxpayers.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has recognised the cost of infrastructure and has set up the community infrastructure fund, but there is only £200 million in that pot—not enough for south Hampshire, let alone areas elsewhere in the country. The position is complicated by the allocation of resources across government. Will the Department for Transport be prepared to pay its share of the bill for road, rail and public transport improvements? Our experience of the rapid transit system is that while one arm of the Government—the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister—is urging us to build more houses, another arm is not prepared to meet the cost of tackling the traffic congestion that housing development has created.

If the Government want new houses built, priorities need to be realigned across existing Departments, so that funds are available in the Department for Education and Skills, the Department of Health and the Department for Transport to meet the cost of infrastructure provision. This is not a plea for more money to be spent, but an argument that existing resources be directed at tackling the issues that will arise from housing development. I hope that the cross-cutting review announced in the pre-Budget report will help in the provision of infrastructure in the areas most affected by new developments.

The essential lock in the process is the requirement that the needs are assessed and agreed, and that before work starts the Government and local authorities decide who picks up the bill. As the people of Whiteley know, it is all too easy to put off those decisions until the housing is built. Other priorities become more pressing and urgent, and it is all the harder to tackle existing problems.

If the Government want more houses to be built, they need to play their part by ensuring that the money is available to provide the roads, schools, public transport and GP surgeries that an expanding population needs. If they are not prepared to meet their share of the bill, they should not be forcing councils to allow more and more houses to be built, putting a greater and greater strain on an infrastructure originally designed to meet the needs of a much smaller population.

I ask Members on both sides of the House to recognise the important issues that arise from housing development and to see the Bill, and the principles it sets out for reaching an agreement on infrastructure needs and costs and payment before work starts, as an essential way of guaranteeing for our constituents a means of securing the services that they need. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Mark Hoban, Mr. Mark Prisk, Mr. David Lidington, Andrew Selous, Mr. Brian Binley, Mr. Mark Francois, Mrs. Maria Miller, Mr. Mark Lancaster, Mr. David Gauke and Peter Viggers.

Housing Development (Infrastructure Requirements)

Mr. Hoban accordingly presented a Bill to require local authorities and the Government to agree on the infrastructure to be provided for large scale housing developments; and to determine the allocation of costs in advance of the commencement of building work: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 12 May, and to be printed [Bill 104].

European Affairs

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watts.]

12.42 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): The debate is about prospects for the European Council, but I begin by welcoming back to the Opposition Front Bench the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague). We remember some excellent parliamentary performances from him—if I may say that, at the risk of damaging his reputation—from the Front Bench, when he was Leader of the Opposition, and some fine speeches from the Back Benches over the past four years, including a notable one on Iraq and a notable but less noticed one in our last debate, in June, on prospects for the European Council.

Having seen 10 Leaders of the Opposition during my time in this place, I am in no doubt of the truth of the old saw that it is the worst job in British politics—[Laughter.] I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman agrees. I hope that it is of some comfort to him when I say that, in my judgment, being shadow Foreign Secretary is probably one of the best jobs in British politics: many trips abroad and few decisions.

As an avid reader of the Darlington and Stockton Times, I noticed how long the right hon. Gentleman has been prepared for his role. From my researches, I saw that in the issue for December 1988 he said:

"I believe that knowing what is going on in the world is a vital qualification for political office."

That is indeed true and only a few months later he was elected for Richmond.

Most of us remember with great affection the right hon. Gentleman's clarion call at the last election, "Two days to save the pound". I am deeply grateful to him for that call, because my electors heeded it; they voted for me and the pound has indeed been saved—[HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."]—as long as the five tests remain unfulfilled. I am pleased to say that whatever else we are talking about tomorrow and on Friday, and perhaps Saturday and Sunday, or Monday, we are not discussing the euro at the European Council.

Tomorrow and Friday, European Heads of State and Government and Foreign Ministers meet in Brussels for the December summit. The agenda is wide, covering many aspects of the UK's presidency. I will deal briefly with these items towards the end of my speech, but the Council will be dominated by negotiations on the EU budget, so let me come to that first.

The House will recall that six months ago, five nations, including the United Kingdom, had to veto budget proposals that were put forward by the then Luxembourg presidency. We took over the presidency 10 days later and since then we have consulted widely about the changes needed to the budget. Last Monday—5 December—we formally published our own proposals.

In summary, our proposals put forward a budget set at €847 billion for the seven-year budget period of 2007–13, which is 1.03 per cent. of the national incomes of member states. That compares with the 1.06 per cent., or €870 billion, Luxembourg proposal, and the massive 1.24 per cent., or €1,025 billion, Commission proposal. Under our proposals, Britain's net contribution would be an estimated €58 billion over the seven years of the budget. The rebate would rise from an annual average in the current budget period of €5 billion to an annual average of €7 billion, but it would be around €1 billion less a year than its default setting so that we would make a fair contribution to the costs of enlargement. I will deal with that in more detail shortly.

Since the publication of the proposals last week, there has been an intensive round of formal and informal discussions. For the convenience of the House in the debate, I published earlier today a written ministerial statement outlining revised proposals following those discussions. Full details have been in the Vote Office since 11 am.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): I apologise in advance for the fact that I will be unable to stay to hear all my right hon. Friend's remarks, although I hope to return later. Does he accept that while the great majority of hon. Members support the Government's position that we should not give up our existing rebate until substantial changes are made to the common agricultural policy, most of us—on this side of the House, at least—would not want Britain to rip off the poorer countries that have just joined by insisting on every pound of flesh that we can get out of them as well?

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend's view is implicit in the support of hon. Members on both sides of the House for enlargement over many years.

Budget negotiations have never been easy. The equivalent European Council seven years ago failed to reach an agreement. We in the UK are working extremely hard for a deal this time, but I believe that no deal is preferable to a bad one. The negotiations are especially complex this time for three reasons: the impact on the budget of the massive enlargement of the EU that took place last May; the consequences of any budget changes on the UK rebate; and the need for fundamental long-term reform of EU policies and spending priorities. Let me deal with each of those in turn.

First, I will address enlargement. Two months ago, on 3 October, the European Union took the historic decision to open negotiations for accession with its nearest and largest Muslim neighbour, Turkey. When I came to report that to the House a week later, I was struck by the way in which the decision was welcomed across the political spectrum. Such an all-party approach to Turkey's membership of the European Union represents something of a long-standing and happy paradox about Britain's relationship with Europe. While the question of our overall relationship with the European Union has often been highly divisive, both among and within parties, enlargement of the Union has always been the subject of a strong and positive consensus. We have all recognised that one of the best ways to further the security and prosperity of the United Kingdom is to ensure that there is an ever-widening circle in Europe of open democracies and thriving economies.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend is apparently considering the accession of Bulgaria to the European Union. Does he consider that the state of Bulgaria's judicial system, as shown in the treatment of Michael Shields, makes it an appropriate candidate for agreement to accession at this time?

Mr. Straw: Ultimately, the judgment on whether Bulgaria is fully ready for accession will take place at the end of this year or on 1 January 2007, or subsequently. It is a judgment that will have to be made by the European Union as a whole on the basis of recommendations by the Commission. The Commission has raised reservations about the quality of Bulgaria's justice system. My hon. Friend spoke powerfully during the Report stage of the European Union (Accessions) Bill of her concerns about Bulgaria's justice system, as illustrated, in her view, by the treatment of Michael Shields. As my right hon. Friend the Minister for Europe told my hon. Friend, we are making, and will continue to make, strong representations to the Government of Bulgaria. I have done so myself, both to the Foreign Minister and to the Prime Minister, and I stand ready to do so again.

We have actively pushed enlargement since taking office in 1997. To the great credit of the Opposition, it was the previous Conservative Administration who prodded and prompted the EU to enter into association agreements with each of the eastern European applicant states to prepare them for membership. In 1995, the then Prime Minister, John Major, described enlargement as "the most important task facing the European Union".—[Official Report, 18 December 1995; Vol. 268, c. 1222.]

Two years later, the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks, when Leader of the Opposition, promised the Government his "full support" for this "long-standing", "British objective", which has been regularly repeated from the Opposition Front Bench ever since.

More than that, the Conservative party has understood the need to back up words with action. John Major's Administration, in the early 1990s, spent hundreds of millions of pounds, quite rightly, via the know-how-fund, on the reconstruction and regeneration of eastern Europe.

When, two years ago, we debated the accession Bills which brought the 10 new states into EU membership, the then shadow Foreign Secretary, the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), was very clear on the need to invest on enlargement. He said:

"Successful enlargement will require commitment and courage from the applicant countries as well as those who are already members."—[Official Report, 21 May 2003, Vol. 405, c. 1036.]

He also said, quite rightly:

"Countries such as Poland are crying out for investment in their infrastructure, and wise use of structural funds could be crucial in helping their economies to prosper."—[Official Report, 5 June 2003, Vol. 406, c. 372.]

So I believe that there is unity across the parties about the policy of enlargement, and about the need for us to help pay for it. That means helping to build up the economic and social infrastructure of these east and central European societies, so long neglected under Soviet control. It also means constructing better roads, railways and industrial estates, regenerating run-down areas, developing the social housing stock, and so on. That sort of investment directly benefits us too.

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): Last Tuesday, I attended the summit of the European Union's small business organisations here at the Palace of Westminster. At that meeting I was struck by the overwhelming view of the small businesses of the new entrants to the EU that under the British presidency of the EU the Lisbon agenda has not progressed one whit. What has gone wrong?

Mr. Straw: I do not accept that for a second.

First, just yesterday, we were able to gain political agreement in the European Council on the chemicals directive, which could have affected very adversely small and large businesses alike throughout Europe in the chemicals industry, including many British businesses. We now have unanimous agreement on what is called REACH—the chemicals directive—which will ensure higher environmental standards without damaging British business.

Secondly, we in the United Kingdom have led what has been called the four presidency engagement to secure deregulation across the Union. The result of that is tangible: at long last the Commission has grasped this agenda—like turning round a tanker. Commissioner Günter Verheugen, who is in charge of deregulation, announced at a conference in Edinburgh not long ago that 68 key sets of regulations would be turned back, and that many others will be revised. In addition, with the Netherlands, we co-chaired a meeting on rolling back the powers of the EU centrally so that much more power was delegated and devolved to individual member states.

Yes, progress on Lisbon has been frustrating for all parties and for all Governments who are committed to seeing an open economy in Europe. That has been because of the difficulties faced by some Governments—not the United Kingdom and not some others—who failed to take account of the fact that the world is changing. We are now subject to serious open competition from countries such as India and China, and the EU must change, or it will not survive. We have done a great deal on that.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): Do not all the reports indicate that Britain has done better on the five-year plan set out in the Lisbon agenda than other EU countries? Under our presidency there has been progress, but will my right hon. Friend assure the House that when our presidency has ended we will push that agenda forward so that other European countries and the Commission are able to co-operate in order to reach the rest of the benchmarks?

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend talks simply about progress within the United Kingdom. We have done extremely well and met almost all the Lisbon targets. The problem has been other EU member states.

I return to the issue of enlargement. The budget that we have tabled proposes that, given the need to pay towards the cost of enlargement, the EU spends about €150 billion on structural and cohesion fund projects in the new member accession states. That is a very significant increase—more than five times the support that they have been receiving up to now. Because relative prosperity and priorities have changed, there is a corresponding and significant drop in structural and cohesion fund receipts for every western European member state. Amounts and proportions vary, but, for example, Spain will receive just over half in the next financial perspective of what it received last time and Ireland will receive less than a quarter.

Significantly, even if there were no change in any of the budget arrangements, our net contribution would stand to rise by €11 billion from €39 billion in the current financial perspective to €50 billion in 2007–13, mainly because of enlargement. I have heard no one from any party in the House say that it should not stand to rise. I therefore suggest that the question before the House is not whether we should pay a fair contribution towards enlargement, but what that contribution should be.

As part of its recommended budget, the Luxembourg presidency proposed back in June that our contribution should rise by €36 billion, or 93 per cent., from €39 billion in this financial perspective to €75 billion—€25 billion above that default setting of €50 billion. We told the Luxembourg presidency emphatically that that was totally unacceptable.

Under our proposals, we have proposed a total net contribution of €58 billion—an increase of €8 billion above the €50 billion floor. We judge that to be a fair contribution. Were we not to make an offer of such magnitude, our contribution would not fairly reflect our position as one of the most prosperous nations in the EU. On the other hand, countries such as the Netherlands, Sweden and Germany would be making contributions way out of line with their prosperity, and that would not be fair either.

Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): The Foreign Secretary will undoubtedly be aware that many regions in the United Kingdom, such as the highlands and islands, for example, have benefited greatly from EU structural funding. I am grateful to see in the latest budget proposals that the Government have given up on proposals for repatriating European funds entirely to countries such as the United Kingdom. Will the right hon. Gentleman assure the House that structural funding for regions such as the highlands and islands will not be negotiated away in the small hours during the final round of talks, and that we can be sure that such places will continue to benefit substantially from EU structural funding into the future?

Mr. Straw: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor set out in—I think—December 2003 his approach and our approach towards structural and cohesion funding in the new financial perspective. I do not know whether a deal will be struck tomorrow, the next day or the next. I cannot say precisely what its conditions will be. I can say that the area for negotiation is narrow. Of course we take account of the needs of regions such as the highlands and islands, which will continue, or should continue, to qualify for structural and cohesion funds. The hon. Gentleman will excuse me if I do not give him an exact guarantee at the moment, because that would be to anticipate the negotiations.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): I thank the Secretary of State for giving away. [Laughter.] I am sorry, I meant giving way. Giving up all or part of our rebate causes my constituents a great deal of concern. It is difficult to sell it to them as a positive, bearing in mind that they face the closure of their accident and emergency department because of a £16 million shortfall in funding. They would much rather that some, if not all, of the money that is to be given up remained in the UK to be invested in the health service.

Mr. Straw: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman, as his constituency does not spring immediately to mind.

Mr. Walker: It is Broxbourne.

Mr. Straw: Indeed. The hon. Gentleman's party has long supported enlargement, and Conservative Front and Back Benchers have called for money to be put into structural and cohesion funds for eastern European countries. That money must come from somewhere, and it can only come from the more prosperous western European member states.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): It should be taken from funds for the common agricultural policy.

Mr. Straw: We have sought to reform the CAP, and we have done a great deal more than the previous Government did under John Major and Margaret Thatcher, when there was virtually no reform year after year. We want more reform, but I do not believe that the Poles, Czechs and Hungarians should be punished for the obduracy of a number of western European member states that have benefited unjustifiably from the CAP.

People in my constituency, which is not very different from Broxbourne, have benefited directly from the money that we have already put into structural and cohesion fund projects in, for example, Ireland and Spain. In the 15 years from 1988 to 2003, we contributed about £500 million towards structural cohesion fund projects in those two member states. In return, there has been a £27 billion annual increase in trade with those countries, which has certainly benefited firms in my constituency and, I suggest, in Broxbourne. We are not beggaring ourselves by offering that money—we are helping ourselves directly. Building up the economies of eastern Europe provides economic benefits and increases the political stability and the overall happiness of those societies.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con) rose—

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC) rose—

Mr. Straw: I always give way to the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash), but first I shall give way to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd).

Mr. Llwyd: I fully accept the logic that the more prosperous states should assist the newcomers, but I remind the right hon. Gentleman that west Wales and the valleys, which constitute a large part of Wales, benefit from objective 1 status. Will he assure the House that whatever deal is struck—hopefully in the next three days—will not affect the amount of assistance that is available, as the gross domestic product of west Wales and the valleys is still, unfortunately, less than 75 per cent. of the average EU GDP?

Mr. Straw: I accept the point that the hon. Gentleman makes. My hon. Friend the Minister for the Middle East will provide more details for him and the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander). We are conscious of the needs of areas such as west Wales, the highland and islands and Cornwall, which qualify for objective 1 status, and we want to ensure that, as far as possible, they are protected.

Mr. Cash: After the rejection of the European constitution by France and Holland there was a period that was described as a "pause for reflection". That was about six months ago. Have the Government been reflecting, and why have we not heard anything in today's debate about the fact that the constitution is dead but certainly not buried? Exactly how does the right hon. Gentleman respond to the recent statement by the German Chancellor that her coalition would reintroduce the constitution in the first months of the German presidency, which starts at the beginning of 2007? [Interruption.]

Mr. Straw: Yes, I shall take my time, and reflect on my reply.

The blunt truth is that we have had rather more important things to do in the real world than try to revive the constitution. If the hon. Gentleman has abandoned the habits of a lifetime to suggest that he wants the document to be revived, I will listen carefully.

Mr. Cash: I want to know what the right hon. Gentleman thinks.

Mr. Straw: I have just explained what I think. The hon. Gentleman knows what I think anyway, so I am not entirely sure why he asked the question. Chancellor Merkel is the new leader of the centre right party in Germany, just as there is a new leader of the British Conservative party which, apparently, is a centre right party, although I shall come to that later. New leaders say new and interesting things, and perhaps it would be appropriate to have a period of reflection to consider them.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): The Foreign Secretary intimated that Britain may be prepared to give up about £1 billion a year of anticipated income from the rebate to try to achieve a deal later this week. Will he confirm that that is not included in the pre-Budget report figures that were published by the Chancellor on 5 December—so there would be a hole of £6 billion if that money were subsequently given up?

Mr. Straw: I think that the hon. Gentleman is correct to say—[Interruption.] Well, the figures could not have been included, because they have not been decided yet. In a column in the world's most important newspaper, the Lancashire Evening Telegraph, which I hope Members read, because it is even more important than the Darlington and Stockton Times—

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks) (Con): Surely not.

Mr. Straw: That is our first disagreement.

In a column to be published tomorrow morning, I have told my constituents that if they are thinking about putting a bet on the outcome of the negotiations tomorrow and Friday they should place it on a horse instead, as I am not predicting the outcome. The pre-Budget report necessarily includes firm estimates of firm commitments, and the Chancellor will naturally seek to adjust it in the light of any negotiations that are concluded.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op) rose—

Mr. Straw: If my hon. Friend will allow me, I should like to make some progress before giving way.

The rebate was designed to deal with the unfair treatment of western European states of comparable prosperity. It was never intended to be a means of redirecting money from much poorer states to the United Kingdom. Indeed, in the early 1980s, when the rebate was negotiated, there was no serious expectation that the European Union could or would expand eastwards into the Soviet empire. I have been unable to find any occasion on which an hon. Member on either side of the House said that the new and poorer accession states should pay, directly or indirectly, the rebate in full. In any event, as I have already told the House, the rebate will rise from an average of €5 billion per annum in this period to €7 billion per annum in the next. It cannot therefore be said that we are giving it up. Our offer on enlargement involves a reduction of about €1 billion per annum in what the rebate would otherwise be. However, the rebate remains on every penny and cent of spending on the common agricultural policy anywhere in the 25 member states of the European Union, and on all spending in the 15 western European states.

When Baroness Thatcher made her statement on the Fontainebleau summit in 1984, you and I will remember, Mr. Speaker, because we were both in the House, that it did not quite receive the rapturous reception that is now written up for it. I asked the right hon. Lady why she had failed in her stated intention of achieving a broad balance between the United Kingdom's contributions and the amount that we got back. I pointed out that in the following year, and the year after, despite the rebates, Britain's net contribution would be more than it had been in the previous three years.

As it turned out, I underestimated the scale of the problem that Mrs. Thatcher was describing, for over the following 20 years the United Kingdom paid—after the rebate—twice as much net into the European Union compared with similar sized economies such as those of France and Italy. Under our proposals, we will for the first time achieve broad parity. For the first time in the 30 years of our membership and for the first time in the 21 years since the rebate was agreed, we will be making a net contribution broadly equivalent to those of France and Italy.

Mrs. Thatcher was unsuccessful in another respect too: she did not constrain the growth of the European Union's budget as a share of the European Union's economy. Under successive Conservative Administrations, it rose by 50 per cent. It is this Government who have led the way to budget discipline—an average of 1.03 per cent. of gross national income over the next financial period and falling to below 1 per cent. on a commitments basis by 2013. Finally, the previous Administration failed to sustain reforms which dealt with the inequalities underlying the rebate—the imbalances of their spending on the common agricultural policy.

That leads me briefly to my third point: the case that we are making for reform. Reform in the European Union is necessary if the Union and its member states are to compete effectively in a world economy that has changed beyond recognition over the past 20 years. We are pushing for parallel reforms in the World Trade Organisation negotiations, which got under way yesterday. We are proposing in our budget a full-scale review of expenditure and revenue, including agriculture, and the right of the EU to make further decisions in this financial period, rather than having to wait until 2014.

When Mrs. Thatcher returned from Fontainebleau she admitted to the House that because her Government had taken so much time on the problems of the budget, they had not been able to turn as much attention as they should have done to some other vital problems in Europe. We have done better. Away from the headlines, the Government have been getting on, successfully, with the vast majority of the business of a presidency.

In pursuing our agenda we have worked closely with the European Parliament. British Ministers have visited the European Parliament on more than 50 occasions. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Europe sends his apologies to the House. He is at the European Parliament today—we have an able substitute in my hon. Friend the Minister for the Middle East—and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will be at the European Parliament tomorrow. This engagement with the European Parliament has been particularly worth while in our discussions with British MEPs. Indeed, I am heartened to say that we have been greatly assisted by British MEPs of all parties.
